There seems to be a reasonable expectation of the discovery of the site of the Garden of Eden, if we may credit Sir Henry Rawlinson, the distinguished Assyrian explorer, President of the Royal Asiatic Society. At a meeting of the Society, held in London, at which he was inaugurated, he made a speech, in which he expressed his conviction that the Babylonian writings and monuments now in possession of the British Museum would turn out to be immediately connected with the earliest Biblical writings, and that before long, the whole of early history given in the book of Genesis, from the time of Abraham, downwards, would be found existing in its original form among those primitive stone records. He also announced that in a short time he would submit to the society evidence that the name 'Garden of Eden' was the old and ancient name of Babylon. He stated there were Babylonian documents which gave an exact geographical description of the Paradise in which the opening scene of human history is laid, answering precisely to the topography and the geodesical particulars of Holy Writ. In them he has found the four rivers, or rather the four branches of 'the river which went out of Eden to water the Garden,' mentioned by the very same names, Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Euphrates. He has also met with accounts of the flood, and the building of the Tower of Babel, which bear with singular directness and value upon the Biblical narrative of those events. If he should realize all that he anticipates, he will have given to the world one of the most interesting archæological and antiquarian discoveries ever made among Biblical critics. It has long been a matter of discussion whence came the two different accounts of the creation of the world, of man, and his history from his emanation from the hand of his Creator down to his destruction by the deluge, which form the first nine chapters of Genesis. These two narratives have been distinguished respectively as the Jehovah and the Elohim records, because in the one Deity is spoken of as Jehovah, and in the other in the plural form as Elohim. Probably Sir Henry Rawlinson's discoveries will throw light on the subject, and thus clear up the obscurity which hangs over that portion of the sacred text. If this should be the case, he will be a benefactor to theology and Biblical lore, as well as to history and archæology. There is nothing amazing in the fact that the sculptured archives of Babylonia, necessarily the chief memorial of tradition and belief among the Chaldeans, should be reflected in the annals of a race which came from Chaldea; still, the prospect of comparing the originals with the derived reports, and of finding the authentic sources from which Elohist and Jehovist drew their statements, is one which will naturally excite vivid expectation among Biblical scholars, and cannot fail to arouse very general curiosity. The cause of religion has always been advanced by discoveries in science, notwithstanding the coteries made against them by well-meaning but rather shortsighted persons. Truth can never gainsay truth, nor can we go back to the practice, whether political, or religious, which is said to have laid hands on Galileo for asserting that the earth moved. Nevertheless it moves, is true of everything as well as of the planet we live on; and if these discoveries, or any others, interpret to us, in a positive and simple sense legends which have been lost in the sacred mist of tradition, the Biblical account cannot but gain in clearness, while the intent which dictated the record must be carried out with increased directness and force. The character of all such investigations has ever been in the highest sense Scriptural and Christian. It may turn out that the Chaldeans had traditions of Eden, of the flood, and of Babel, and that Abraham brought them with him from 'Ur of the Chaldees,' to Canaan, and handed them down to his posterity, and these traditions may also have found their way into other lands long before Abraham's time, which would partly account for their universality. Let us, at any rate, know what the Babylonian records can tell about the Garden of Eden. If Hiddekel, Pison, and Gihon can be identified without geographical bewilderment, let it, by all means, be done. We have our doubts about the probability of this. Euphrates remains, but it seems strange that the three other rivers disappeared so completely in a country where no natural convulsions have taken place within recorded history. Neither the heat nor the sand have been able to obliterate the Euphrates and it is difficult to imagine that they could have obliterated the others, unless that they were insignificant streams. But the turn which Sir Henry Rawlinson has given to the meaning of the term 'Gardon of Eden,' throws light on that passage in Isaiah xxxvii. 12—'Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed, as Gozan and Haran and Rezeph, and the children of Eden which were in Telassar?' And on that Ezek. xxviii. 13—'Thou hast been in Eden, the garden of God.'—Beulah.

THE EASTERN OR TURKISH QUESTION.

The great problem of the age is, Who shall be the owner of Constantinople, and who shall be the ruler? Shall it be England, France, or Russia? We maintain that England or France have not the least claim to the possession of Constantinople, the key of the East, and the control of the inland seas. Russia seems to have a better claim, and is eager for conquest. Since the last will of Peter the Great, she has manifested an aggressive spirit, and hopes yet to plant the cross in the church which is now the Mosque of St. Sophia, and to rule as the head of the Russian or Eastern Church in old Byzantium. But, contemplating the origin of Russia, she being a Slavic nation, her claim to the title of heir to the Eastern Church cannot be sustained, and her territory does not belong to the territory and people called "the Roman earth." We rather humbly suggest that the most rational solution would be that the King of Greece shall become the owner of Constantinople. Thus, the boundaries of that little kingdom will be increased, and a new Grecian Empire established which would have the balance of power, and the present king being connected by marriage with the rulers of England and Russia ("the seed of man" Dan ii. 42), both powers might accept the compromise, and so the image of the prophet shall be seen intact in all its proportions. No doubt Russia will always be the great factor in this vexed question.

It is not only the territory in Europe which draws our attention, it is also the territory in Asia, which must be considered, and, indeed, is so closely connected with "the Eastern Question" that it has equal weight in the scales of the political complication. Palestine, or Canaan, "the land of Immanuel," Isa. viii. 8, is not like other countries on the globe, the property of the nations; it is a reserved spot for more than four thousand years. The Magna Charta of Israel's property is recorded in Gen. x. 5; Deut. xxxii. 8; "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the members of the children of Israel."

That land is given to the seed of Abraham as a gift forever. It is a covenant gift, and "a gift cannot be sold," Gen. xiii. 15; xv. 18; xvii. 7-12. Mohammed was aware of that fact, and acknowledged in his Koran: "That the products of Canaan, not the land of Canaan should be their property."

That land is isolated from all other countries, protected by mountains, by deserts, and by the sea; its geography is unique, and yet it is the centre and focus of three continents. It is of such an importance that the Eastern or Turkish question never can be settled unless the ownership of Canaan first shall be settled and established.

Jerusalem has always been "the caldron or seething pot" of the nations, Ezek. vi. 3-11; the battle-ground during the ages past, it will be the battle-ground of the ages to come. The first battle, and also the first victory on record, did happen in that country, Gen. xiv. 1-24; and so the last battle and the last victory will be fought in the land of Immanuel, Rev. xx. 9. No place on earth has such a record of carnage and bloodshed as Palestine. From the times of the judges, the kings of Israel, the kings of Syria, Egypt, and Assyria, Nebuchadnezzar, the Romans, the Caliphs, the Crusades, Napoleon Bonaparte to Ibrahim Pasha, Mount Tabor and the plains of Judah have been the battle-grounds of the Eastern wars; and as several "Eastern questions" have already been settled in ages past, so the great battle to come will be on the confines of the land where the angels sang: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men," Luke ii. 14. Then shall the language of Paul be understood:—"Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" Rom. xi. 33.

No place on earth has produced such a vexation of spirit as Jerusalem has done. It was a thorn in the eyes of the Samaritans and an eyesore for the philosophical spirit of Greece and Rome. After Mecca, Jerusalem is the next holy city for an Islam believer. It was the goal of the Crusaders, and even at this very day it has an enchanting power. The Jews have there the Via dolorum, and the graves of their fathers. The Mohammedans their Mosque of Omar, from which their prophet made his night's journey to the seventh heaven. The devout Christians feel that Jerusalem is called the city of the Great King, and so it is the same in regard to the nations aboard. England covets that country as the highway to Hindoostan; France, as the representative of the Roman or western church, is claiming the right as the eldest son of the Church, and is making great purchases in Jerusalem and in Palestine; and Russia, as the representative of the Eastern Church, asserts her claim for possession, and has already invested great sums of money to establish herself in the holy city. It is the coveted prize, and for that reason this is the cord which suspends them winds and unwinds. The heads of families are usually the leaders and the beaters. After them go the members, carrying fruits, cakes, etc., for the monks, and food and covering for themselves. They spend the night in some special or common sayat or rest-house near the pagoda. Before this break-of-day the food for the monk is prepared, and at sunrise they are called to receive it. The gong again sounded at intervals to let the inhabitants of the four worlds in Burmese cosmogony know the goodness and kindness of the family party. The Abbot recites the ten precepts relating to worship, some of Gaudama's comments upon them, and then walks away back to his monastery, followed by his disciples shaded by large fans, and his novices carrying the gifts received. The family then cook their own food, freely share it with any hungry stranger or on-looker, and cast the remnants to the dogs and crows: from all of which acts of generosity, hospitality and piety they derive some measure of merit, which they add to their store for their future existence.

Charity has ever accompanied worship. Love to God produces love to man, and especially practical love to afflicted man. The pious have ever been the pitiful. The Jews left portions in their fields and gardens, and gave tithes in the temple for the poor and helpless. The earthly Christians laid by part of their profits on the first day of each week to supply the wants of the needy. The afflicted and diseased went or were borne almost daily to the temple gates and stairs. On every ordinary worship-day, and on every great feast-day, Burmans afflicted with all kinds of wasting and incurable diseases go or are taken to the great pagoda approaches and platform. They are so numerous that they form a line on either side of the long flight of steps of the three entrances. There they sit all day with flat bamboo baskets or lacquer ware trays before them, and either look pitifully or cry plaintively for alms, which they receive in handfuls of rice and curry, or in pice (or farthings). Those who frequent the platform, are not so helpless and ill as those who lie on the steps, have small triangular gongs which they strike at intervals with small mallets, accompanying the long vibration by a wail of want which produces a harsh discord. These gongs are struck to call the attention both of the worshipgate of Jerusalem; now it can be called pre-eminently a city of Jews. Now a Christian church, called "Christ Church," is built upon Mount Zion. It is no dream, it is a reality; the sound of the wheels of the chariot is heard of the coming King of Israel in Jerusalem, "who shall reign upon the throne of David, his father, and whose dominion shall be without end," Luke i. 32, 33.—A. C. Teis, in Christian Herald and Signs of the Times.

SCRIPTURE ILLUSTRATED.

A Rangoon correspondent of the London Presbyterian furnishes that journal with some "Illustrations of Scripture from Burmah." Those relating to strangling, vain repetitions and straining out the gnat make the teachings of our Lord very vivid and real.

STRAINING AT GNATS—(Matt. xxiii. 24).

As the Pharisees and all the strict-or Jews carefully strained their drinks through fine linen, least they should swallow any unclean insects and break their law, Lev. xi. 20, so the Buddhist monks and the more exact of the laity filter all their drinking and cooking water through two or three earthenware jars perforated in the bottom, filled with charcoal and broken bricks and placed on the top of each other, lest they should swallow any of the larvæ of mosquitoes, and so violate the law forbidding the taking away of any life.

OSTENTATIOUS ALMSGIVING—Matt. vi. 2.

Those who in Christ's era pretended to be very generous did not actually blow a trumpet, but went into the public places of business and religion before they gave any alms. Some of the very charitable Buddhists, however, proclaim their good intentions and actions by beating a brass triangular gong, called kyee-zee. On the evening of the day of preparation, which precedes every worship day, a few of the elders of the people, distinguished by the narrow white band of cloth tied round their heads, go round the Burmese quarters and villages, beating these gongs to intimate that they are going to make merit by charity at the payah or pagoda. They attach these gongs and lamps to balances, them to the ends of "pats" of bamboo, which they lay across their shoulders. These gongs sound sweetly and vibrate long, as the cord which suspends them winds and unwinds. The heads of families are usually the leaders and the beaters. After them go the members, carrying fruits, cakes, etc., for the monks, and food and covering for themselves. They spend the night in some special or common sayat or rest-house near the pagoda. Before this break-of-day the food for the monk is prepared, and at sunrise they are called to receive it. The gong again sounded at intervals to let the inhabitants of the four worlds in Burmese cosmogony know the goodness and kindness of the family party. The Abbot recites the ten precepts relating to worship, some of Gaudama's comments upon them, and then walks away back to his monastery, followed by his disciples shaded by large fans, and his novices carrying the gifts received. The family then cook their own food, freely share it with any hungry stranger or on-looker, and cast the remnants to the dogs and crows: from all of which acts of generosity, hospitality and piety they derive some measure of merit, which they add to their store for their future existence.

THE POOR AT THE TEMPLE—John ix. 1; Acts iii. 2.

Charity has ever accompanied worship. Love to God produces love to man, and especially practical love to afflicted man. The pious have ever been the pitiful. The Jews left portions in their fields and gardens, and gave tithes in the temple for the poor and helpless. The earthly Christians laid by part of their profits on the first day of each week to supply the wants of the needy. The afflicted and diseased went or were borne almost daily to the temple gates and stairs. On every ordinary worship-day, and on every great feast-day, Burmans afflicted with all kinds of wasting and incurable diseases go or are taken to the great pagoda approaches and platform. Those who frequent the platform, are not so helpless and ill as those who lie on the steps, have small triangular gongs which they strike at intervals with small mallets, accompanying the long vibration by a wail of want which produces a harsh discord. These gongs are struck to call the attention both of the worshippers to their poverty, and of the nats to the charity of the worshippers. Though the doles of rice and pice thrown into the platters are small, they are numerous, and enable the maimed and diseased to fare better than they would in any poor-house or leper asylum.

VAIN REPETITIONS—Matt. vi. 7.

Repetition is a virtue among the Buddhists of Burmah as it was among the Pharisees of Judea. It is practised by almost all false worshippers, and can be easily and abundantly illustrated. In Burmah, as elsewhere, Buddhists count their recitals by a rosary of 108 beads, made of seeds, wood, bone, or stone. Their worship at the pagodas consists mainly of repetitions of the formula, "Anetta, Dokn, Phra, Tara, Thingo, Yaydana, Chow ba"—i. e. transitoriness, misery, unreality, the Lord, the law, the assembly, the three precious ones. During each recital five of the beads are passed along the string from the left to the right hand. They are more commonly carried in the hand than worn round the neck. Monks, nuns and old men and women may be seen daily muttering the words and moving the beads as they go about begging or visiting. But prayer cylinders driven by wind or water wheels are not seen here, as in Tibet. The only things in the least like them are the long streamers and little flags that are used as offerings before the images or pagodas. The flags are triangular pieces of white paper, stitched or stuck to thin strips of bamboo, by which they are carried and presented. The signs of the eight planets are printed on some of them, and on others a devout expression or pious wish. The streamers are made of tough paper, or thin cloth, fastened round rings of bamboos, shaped like lizards or dragons, and often ornamented with needlework. The conveying and hanging of one to the high poles erected for them is quite a solemn ceremony. From ten to thirty men, walking in single file, bear it upon their shoulders, and hold it there till it is taken up by one who climbs the pole and attaches it to the top. They are usually accompanied by a considerable number of friends and acquaintance carrying other small offerings. Every way of doing and streamers in the wind is considered an offering or petition.—N.Y. Observer.

RESURRECTION.

"Though ye have lien among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold." Psa. lxviii. 13.

Sweetly sleep, ye saints, the brightness
That reminneth for the dead.
Soon shall leave the dusty bed.
Darkness reigns where they are lying,
But they only wait the day
When the Lord shall cause the morning's dawning,
As the Christ-light dawn'd to-day.

Summer with its softly glowing
All around the lily blooms and roses,
Flowers sweet to fragrance springing
As the verdure o'er them waves.
Never more shall they know sorrow,
Never more shall sadly weep;
For there comes a glad to-morrow,
When they rise from sacred sleep.

They shall have the dust all beaming
Like the plumage of the dove,
Clay with gold and silver gleaming,
As it sings in song of love.
Christ shall raise them in his glory,
They shall be his image-stamp'd
And the place of song and story
Shall be dimmed by light divine.

Sweetly sleep, ye kind, the brightness
Of that thro' all the summer day
Yet may leap with wings of lightness,
When the frosts have passed away.
Even now, the silver lining
Is around the gloom we dread,
Glowing with an endless shining
When a night is the blessed dead.

Russia's Place in Prophecy and the Impending War with England: As Seen in Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix.

It is generally supposed that the King of the North, the Chief Prince: or Prince of Rosh (Russia), of Meshech (Moscow); and Tubal (Tobolsk); points to him who sits on the Imperial seat of all the Russias. Hence, all who believe that we are now at the very near end of the "times of the Gentiles," naturally expect that Russia will soon play a very important part in the world's politics. Indeed, all current events point in the same direction.

Another very important sign of the times is seen in the state and condition of the Jews at the present period. They are driven to the front. Persecution is hunting them about; and their resting places amongst the nations are being much disturbed. Another very significant fact is, that the eyes of many devout Jews from Sir Moses Montefiore downwards are being turned to their own land. The time is rapidly approaching when they shall again return to Palestine. In these days, when events move so quickly, it will be but a very short time before this shall come to pass. When these Jews go back they will carry wealth and importance with them; and it would not be long before Jerusalem would become a place of very considerable commercial and mercantile importance.

It seems most probable that the return of the Jews will, in a chief measure, be due to the influence of England. Certainly, we see England, at last, come to the defence of the Jews against Russia.

In those chapters we see that while England has thus been instrumental in bringing the Jews back to their own land, that Russia, true to the traditions, has not been idle in political intrigue. For we find that then shall Russia be allied to Persia, Ethiopia, Libya, which together with Gomar and Togarmah, of the north quarters, shall all unite their strength in one vast force. Truly a prodigious army this shall be, the like of which has never been seen before, nor ever shall be seen again. One glance at the map will show that Russia will have thus drawn a complete circle of power around the whole land of Israel. Surely, Israel will then be championed by a power worthy of having prepared against it such an armament—the greatest that this world has ever seen. What power could this be but England, assisted by her colonies—"the young lions thereof?"

The point of Russia's attack will be on the land of Israel itself, and upon those who dwell therein: and her armies shall cover the land as a cloud. Let it be noted that England, too, shall have her allies: for Sheba and Dedan from the East will have joined the merchants of Tarshish from the West, in questioning the motives that have led Russia to this mighty movement. Then shall the Lord himself be revealed from heaven in awful majesty; no combination shall then withstand his mighty power. Then shall he rescue his people: and they shall know that he is the Lord—the Holy One of Israel. Then we are informed that so mighty and numerous had been the armaments, that they shall burn the weapons of war for seven years, and seven months shall they be burying the dead.

From an intelligent study of Daniel xi., particularly of verse 40 and 41, it would seem that Russia will attack both by water as well as by land. And it does not seem improbable that this two-fold attack will be in two different directions (Ezekiel xxxviii. 10). "Thus saith the Lord God. It shall also come to pass, at the same time shall things come into thy mind, and thou shalt think an evil thought: and thou shalt say, I will go up into the land of unwalled villages. I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates." Daniel says, "He shall come with many ships, and shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow, and pass over." What these "things" are that at all come into his mind we may but conjecture. Perchance, these things may be the many old causes of grudge that Russia has against his powerful rival—against England, they who interfered on behalf of the Poles; who checked the many encroachments in the East; and who, perhaps, finally befriended the Jews, by causing them to be brought again to their land, some of whom they may have conveyed there, and given a settlement therein.

"He shall think an evil thought;" I will go up to the land of unwalled villages. What is that land of unwalled villages? Certainly, we think, not the Holy Land. In the prophecy, this "evil thought" is spoken of as an additional purpose. The point of attack would seem to be a different place. What place is meant?

What place can answer to the description so much as England? The inhabitants of the British Islands are, as it were, dwelling without walls, and having to their cities neither bars nor gates. England, then, as well as Palestine, may be the point of Russia's attack. Though the attack should be in two different places, the war would be but with one people. Russia might issue an army from her northern quarters, through the Baltic, while her Eastern army could be supplied from her southern quarters.

Of one thing are we sure. The Lord God Almighty is in this future—in all things he works according to his sovereign will. This is clearly shown in these particular chapters. At the commencement of the times of the Gentiles, the world power was by the will of God; and it is he that will bring about its end. And, truly, its end is now close at hand.

As we think of this remarkable prophecy, let us remember that it was written 2500 years ago. Written before Russia and England were nations; and centuries before they came face to face as such. And, yet, as we read this prophecy, it seem to be but current politics, and as if written only yesterday. Truly, this is the word of God; and holy men wrote it as they were inspired by the Holy Spirit.—G. N. Willoughby in Israel's Watchman.

SHOULD A SMALL CLASS RULE THE NATION?

Why should a few persons claim the right to override the laws made for all? In this fair and free land we boast of all men's equality before the law. There are over fifty millions of us who, according to this, stand upon the same legal level. No one can legally have any advantage over another in the administration of the civil government. This is our theory of government, and it is beautiful in theory. It is the ne plus ultra of equity. Justice herself could not frame a more beautiful ideal. But how is it in practice? Are all, in fact, treated alike by the administrators of law? There is a very manifest and unreasonable exception made in favor of a few thousand liquor dealers. These men claim, and the claim is allowed, to exercise peculiar and special privileges granted to no other class, occupation, or trade in the land. In what particulars?

1. That of poisoning others.

This privilege is denied to all other classes. The butcher that sells unwholesome meat is arrested the moment the fact is made known. The grocer that sells poisonous canned goods, habitually, is shut up at once when the cruel practice becomes public. The ragman is not even permitted to sell old rotten rags infested with disease. But the liquor seller deals in nothing but poisonous wares, and claims that he shall have license from the government to do this thing. He commends his poison to deluded customers, and sweetens and prepares them so as to make them pleasant, that he may induce the more to drink and destroy themselves. He does not ware his victim of the danger by telling him there is poison and death in the cup, but the reverse. Yet his claim to do this is granted to no other class of men. He has a kind of monopoly in the death-dealing business, by which so many hundred thousands of strong, healthy, and brilliant men are brought to premature graves.

2. Those liquor dealers claim the privilege of carrying on their work on the Sabbath. We have Sabbath laws. All other classes are required to observe them and refrain from their business except as a necessity on this day. The farmer must leave his plow in the furrow, and the merchant shut up his doors, and the mill cease its grinding on the Lord's day. But the liquor business claims the right to go on as usual on that day. Too generally it is permitted to defy the law and disturb the quiet and peace of the community by its noise and rioting.

3. It demands special indulgence in the matter of taxes. All other classes must promptly pay their taxes when due, according to law, or suffer the legal penalties for non-payment. But bonded warehouses have been standing full of strong drink on which the legal revenue has not been paid. The liquor interest demands exemption from the legal penalties in such cases. The government waits patiently the convenience of these delinquents, but seizes the widow's goods for taxes at once to make sure the revenue.

Now we may properly inquire on what grounds such claims are put forth? The country might perhaps afford this bonus or special favor if the business produced such extraordinary good results as to justify it. But is it so? It eats up the hard earnings of the poor. It wastes and squanders the wealth of the rich. It consumes the bodies of valuable citizens, and disables them for their share of the burdens of the world. It erases the brain and unfits the mind for the wise management of any business. It turns good and peaceable citizens, men and women, into demons, endangering life and property on every hand. It is constantly turning happy homes into bedlams of crime and sorrow. It takes the youth of our land and educates them for the jail, the penitentiary, and the gallows. It perverts the fountains of justice, and corrupts legislation. It hinders education and the elevation of society. It corrupts political action, and endangers free institutions. It inflames the basest of passions and makes men harder to govern, increasing the necessity for more laws, officers, prisons, and gallows. Thereby it greatly increases the burdens of taxation. It consumes vast quantities of good, wholesome food, given to sustain, not destroy, life. It hinders the progress of truth, and drowns men's souls in selfishness. It bloats the flesh, spoils the breath, and destroys the beauty of the human form, especially of the face divine, and renders it hideous and loathsome. It brings misery, poisoned with the curse of God, into the possession of a few, to be squandered upon their lusts, or to be left as a burning plague to posterity. These are some of the things which this favored business does for the nation and world. Do they present a valid claim for preferment, that the business should be pampered and protected in its violations of all laws human or divine? Where is the good in all this? It is not a dead loss in all respects, with no compensating features? It is astonishing that it can find advocates among any reasonable class of people. —Christian Instructor.

Fear Not, Little Flock.

Though the church of Christ is a little flock, it is of priceless value. It has been purchased with blood. It is the one flock of God, however divided and distracted: and though scattered in the dark and cloudy day, yet it will be gathered together at last by "our Lord Jesus Christ, that Great Shepherd of the sheep."

But even now it is under his care, his supervision, his control, and no grievous wolves can divide and devour those who listen to God and to the word of his grace. No one can pluck even the feeblest lamb in all that flock from the hands of the Heavenly Father. The Great Shepherd cares for his little ones; and as there are flowers that bloom in desert wastes and in lonely valleys, which are seen by no human eye and watered by no human hand, but are as fair and as fragrant as those which share the most costly culture, so the Great Shepherd feeds his own flock in the wilderness, in green pastures, and by the side of still waters, restores and guides, and comforts, and protects them, even to the end.

"He shall feed his flock like a shepherd," and while he feeds them, how blessed to know that "He that keepeth Israel shall never slumber nor sleep." "The Lord is our shepherd, our guardian and guide.

Whatever we want, he will kindly provide.
To the sheep of his pasture he carefully attends,
He calls and guides them his flock to surround.

The Books of Babylon.

In the latest publication of the Assyrian and Babylonian inscriptions from the British Museum, edited by Sir Henry Rawlinson, assisted by Mr. T. G. Pinches, a report is given of the valuable discoveries made by Mr. Rassam. Among the inscriptions of historical importance here published are the tablets of Nebuchadnezzar I. (B. C. 1120) and Nabubaliddins (B. C. 850), from Abou Habba. The former of these is the charter of freedom granted to the Kassite of North Elamite City of Bit Karziyabku, by the Babylonian king, in return for aid rendered by its ruler, Ritti Menodach, after the Babylonian forces had been defeated by the allied tribes of Elam. The document contains strange stipulations as to civic laws, freedom from taxes and conscription for the army. The cylinder of Nabonidus, found in the record chest of the great temple of Sippara, containing about 170 lines in most perfect preservation, may be considered the most important inscription published in this volume. In this text the king states that while restoring the temple of the Sun-god he came upon the foundation record placed there by Naram Sin, the son of Sargon, 3200 years before his time—that is, in B. C. 3750. The Babylonians, like the Chinese, were an essentially literary people, and every event in life found its record on the clay tablets. The castle of the Scribes was the most honored and ancient in their land, called Musarrus, "the scribe" who rose from the sea to teach man the elements of civilization. Xisuthrus, the Noah of Chaldean tradition, was the writer of the first book of origins, which he deposited in the temple of the Sun-god at Sippara, to be removed after the Deluge, and thus continued unbroken the roll of Chaldean history. If any proof were needed of the literary character of the Babylonians it is found in the tens of thousands of inscribed tablets now stored in the cases of the Assyrian department of the British Museum. The discoveries made during the last half century, which have restored to us the history of Western Asia, have all been tending to carry us further and further back into remote antiquity; while each year fresh finds have been filling up the lacunæ in the roll of history thus open before us. The recovered literature is by no means solely historical, being as varied in character as that of the present day, embracing in its large area tablet books on religion, botany, zoology, astronomy, and even works of fiction, fables, and stories, as well as a most important class of philological works, grammars, lexicons and bilingual hand-books relating not only to the language of Babylonia, but to those of surrounding lands.—Leisure Hour.

Egyptology and the Bible.

There is no point, says the Sunday School Times, where the Bible record and the claim of infidel scientists—not sincere and reverent, but sceptical and scoffing scientists—are at greater variance than as to man's beginning in knowledge and character. The Bible says that man started on a high plane and gradually declined through sin and neglect of his privileges. The scoffing student of science says that man started on a level with the brute, and has been gradually making progress from that beginning until now. Whenever a rude stone hatchet, or a bit of primitive pottery has been found in some subterranean cavern, it has been claimed by the doubter of the Bible as a new witness against Genesis. But the believer in the Bible has rested on the Bible story without having his faith cut to pieces by a stone hatchet. From no land has there come better material for the study of the comparative chronology of learning and art than from Egypt.

In view of the recent remarkable discoveries there, a Cairo correspondent of the Nation has referred to "the growing conviction of Egyptologists (not of Bible defenders, but of Egyptologists, mark you!) that the earliest Egyptian civilization we know of is the highest, and that all that we know of it is its decadence." Why, the Book of Genesis tells us that! "The oldest pyramid is the largest and best built; the oldest temple—that besides the Sphinx at Gizeh—shows masonry since unapproached; the oldest papyrus—though as yet hardly understood—is the wisest; and the tombs and temples of the Theban period are filled with extracts from ancient books not yet found complete." That's it! All that is necessary to bring a scientist to the defence of the Bible story is—science.

Nebuchadnezzar's Dream Certain; and the Interpretation Sure.

When the children of Israel had, as it were, exhausted the patience of Jehovah, or reached the limit of his forbearance, consistent with his purpose to educate them for his service, and constitute them "a kingdom of priests unto himself," then it was the Father disclosed his secondary purpose, namely: To set over the children of men "the basest of men" and yet maintain his own prerogatives as the rightful Ruler of the whole creation. Thus after Nebuchadnezzar had been permitted to disclose his true character, to show what was in his heart, its enmity and selfishness, then he drove him from his kingdom, and from his fellowmen to herd with the beasts of the field, and to eat grass with them, and to be exposed to all the vicissitudes of the weather with them, "till he should know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will."

As Jehovah first proposed to constitute the house of Israel a kingdom of priests unto himself, providing they would keep this covenant, that is, submit to him as their rightful, though invisible King, so when they had rejected him from being their King, and chose one of their fellows whom they could see and follow, and as a consequence given perfect development to their hereditary enmity in violating every requirement of their covenant, he committed them to Nebuchadnezzar's tender mercies as the executioner of his wrath. Thus he made their self-will the cause of their own punishment, or a visible ruler the executioner of it.

Like as he first covenanted with Israel, and then tested their obedience or character, so he first gave absolute dominion over all that could be ruled in this world to Nebuchadnezzar, and then tested and proved him, and rejected him as he had Israel. Nevertheless he continued the scepter of dominion over all he gave to Nebuchadnezzar, to him and the other Gentile powers whom he designates as silver, brass, iron and clay as the legitimate successors, one after the other, of this head of gold, and as the rightful inheritors of all he gave Nebuchadnezzar, which inheritance was to continue unmolested by him, till "the little stone" had been cut out of these great mountains without hands."

I quote the deed of gift to Nebuchadnezzar and his successors, Dan. ii. 37, 38. "Thou O king, art a king of kings, for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength and glory. And wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the heavens, hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold." That is, the head of this image, to which this gift is made—and which you now represent. Hence you see your perfect identity, and the perfect oneness of the power I constitute, in the text, when I smite the image on its feet and toes, then the entire image in all its elements is broken to pieces together. Thus this gift is not simply to you personally, but to you as the head of the image, and to every constituent thereof. So that the kingdom of Israel and the kingdom of the image covers every period of the history of the race, and the race itself, from Sinai to the setting up of the stone kingdom. There is no power or prerogative of government known to man, that is not included in this deed of gift, therefore no right of rule, no power of government can be exercised over man but this image power and right, until the stone kingdom is "set up." All the governments that have existed have been representatives of the image, hence, "God's ministers," and all that exist now are likewise representatives of the metalic image, be they imperial, representative or ecclesiastical. There is no standing place for rule or authority on God's earth but the representative of the metalic image. Towards this its end, it may be partly strong and partly broken, nevertheless it is still image power, image rule, and God has permitted and will permit no other, till he sets up the stone kingdom. It is its mission to break in pieces and to destroy the metalic image, hence it must continue till then, and as long as it continues the attributes and character of God are pledged to it, as the rightful possessor of the dominion of the earth, and of the rule of its people. There can be no evasion of this.

The pride of the human heart has vainly imagined that it has and is compassing wonders by its wisdom, and that it has established many sources of rule outside of Nebuchadnezzar's, especially its ecclesiastical rule. Vast and glorious in its own imagination is its missionary and other enterprises; wonderful and extensive its varied Christian organizations. If we admit that these are the instrumentalities by which living stones are hewn and polished, that they may be cemented into the little stone kingdom, we give the lie to Daniel's testimony, that "the stone is cut out of the mountain kingdoms without hands," or rather visible agency, and to the Savior's testimony, that the process is a second or a new birth, and consequently not the result of visible organizations, that the kingdom "cometh not with observation." That the children are all taught of the Father. That the Comforter is the representative of the Savior in his absence. That the world knoweth not his brethren as they knew him not. His teaching that local relations have nothing to do with the worship of the Father, "neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father"..... "But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a Spirit and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth."

The "little flock" are not recognizable to the world, they, the world "cannot receive the things of the Spirit of God, neither can they know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Hence the moulding and transforming power of "the spirit of adoption" is neither seen nor recognized, no human hand or agency manipulates these plastic spirits, or presses them into the mould whose impress they receive and bear. This is the work of the Comforter, to guide into all truth, to speak and declare whatever he hears, and show things to come. "All these worketh that one and the self same spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will," even as it is written, "For it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." Hence Paul writes the Ephesian Gentiles, "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow citizens with the saints, and of the household of God: and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus the Christ himself being the chief corner; in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord: in whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit."

There is no ecclesiastical organization in existence that bears these evidences of God's workmanship. They are each man-made organizations, and consequently visible, while God's living stones are cut out of these mountain governments "without hands," without visible manifestation, and will not be manifested till we reach "the restitution of all things spoken by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began." "The earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God." We also wait for the redemption of our body," "the regeneration." C. B. STACY.

WATCH.

"Watch, therefore, for ye know not on what day your Lord cometh. But know this, that if the master of the house had known in what watch the thief was coming, he would have watched and would not have suffered his house to be broken through. Therefore be ye also ready, for in an hour that ye think not the Son of man cometh. Who then is the faithful and wise servant whom his lord hath set over his household to give them their food in due season? Blessed is that servant whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing; verily I say unto you that he will set him over all that he hath. But if that evil servant shall say in his heart, my Lord tarrieth, and shall begin to beat his fellow-servants, and shall eat and drink with the drunken, the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he expecteth not and in an hour when he knoweth not, and shall cut him asunder and appoint his portion with the hypocrites; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins which took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom; and five of them are foolish and five were wise, etc. 'A wise man's heart discerneth time and judgment. Keep my commandments and live and my law as the apple of thine eye. For the commandment is a lamp and the law is light and reproofs of instruction are the way of life. A wise man will hear and increase learning and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels to understand a proverb and the interpretation of the words of the wise and their dark sayings.' For the foolish, when they took their lamps, took no oil with them, but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. Now while the bridegroom tarried they all slumbered and slept. But at midnight there is a cry, Behold the bridegroom, come ye faithful to meet him. Then all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps, and the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil for our lamps are going out. But the wise answered, saying, Peradventure there will not be enough for us and you, go ye rather to them that sell and buy for yourselves. And while they went away to buy the bridegroom came and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage feast and the door was shut. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you I know you not. Watch, therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour." "The bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee. I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night. Ye that are the Lord's remember, keep not silent and give him no silence till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth." Isa. lxii.

Christ when upon earth laid some imperative commands upon his disciples. "Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptising them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I commanded you, and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the consummation of the age." Again we read, "It is appointed unto man once to die, and after this the judgment." When the disciples of Jesus are buried in baptism, symbol of death and resurrection, they emerge therefrom to walk in newness of life. They have died once to sin, and entered the judgment condition, namely, a trial for immortality. "Judgment must first begin at the house of God." The elect are chosen and tried here, after baptism, to become rulers, kings and priests of the judgment age of the world after resurrection. "To every thing there is a season and a time to every purpose under the heaven." Here is "discerned time and judgment." "And, moreover, I saw under the sun the place of judgment that wickedness was there, and the place of righteousness that iniquity was there." See also Eccl. xviii. "I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked, for there is a time then for every purpose and for every work."

The parable of the virgins is descriptive of the house of God. Five were foolish and five were wise; they all woke, responsive to the midnight cry, and set forth to meet the bridegroom, but the lamps of the foolish flickered and went out for lack of oil, while the five that had plenty of oil in vessels with their lamps, failed not of light, while waiting patiently with lamps burning ready for the bridegroom; when he did come, they "went in with him to the marriage feast and the door was shut." The foolish had gone away to buy oil, they missed meeting him for they were not ready. God's word says, For the commandment is a lamp. It is this, "Take ye heed, watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is. It is as when a man sojourning in another country, having left his house and given authority to his servants, to each one his work, commanded also the porter to watch. Watch therefore, for ye know not when the Lord of the house cometh, whether at even or at midnight or at cockcrowing or in the morning, lest, coming suddenly, he find you sleeping; and what I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." Mark xiii. We here find the commandment and lamp to be, watch through all the watches of the night, even until the morning. Be ready when he comes. The "law which is the light" is this, "Let not your heart be troubled, ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so I would have told you, for I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am ye may be also. And whither I go ye know the way.....I am the way, the truth and the life."

The oil in the vessels is this, "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong; let all ye do be in love." "If ye love me ye will keep my commandments; and I will pray the Father and he shall give you another Comforter that he may be with you forever, even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, for it beholdeth him not neither knoweth him, yet ye know him, for he abideth with you and shall be in you. I will not leave you desolate, I will come unto you. These things have I spoken unto you while yet abiding with you. But the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you. Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled neither let it be fearful.....And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass ye may believe. I will no more speak much with you, for the prince of this world cometh (the Papacy with its church kingdom ruling the earth) and he hath nothing in me, but that the world may know that I love the Father, and as the Father gave me commandment even so I do. Arise, let us go hence." In the parables we recognize the church of God. Some were wise obedient to commands, ever watchful and expectant of the great event, prepared and ready, faithful and wise servants, giving the household food in due season. They were ready when he came.

Again we note the evil and foolish servants, who, at the "midnight cry," arose and trimmed their lamps, but at the disappointment of that watch, the oil in the lamp was exhausted, faith wavered and died out, and he was left in darkness; then he began to berate his fellow servants and to say in his heart, my Lord tarrieth, concludes it was all a mistake, this watching, yet his coming is not due.

The events of the 5th seal have not all transpired and we look for great things first before Christ can come; they eat and drink with the drunken who say, "Oh, yes, he will come. But the world must be converted first, it may be thousands of years hence; yes he will come to judge the earth." This class has no living faith in his coming. But the foolish virgins went to buy oil; they were anxious to go in to the marriage feast with the rest, but they arrived too late; they are looking for things to come that are already past, and they did not discern them, but they did not find it out until too late. Then they say, "Lord, Lord, open unto us. Verily I say unto you, I know you not." He came when they were not expecting him.

Now we will trace the four watches that we were commanded to watch through, "evening, midnight, cock crowing and morning. We remember the last night of our Savior's natural life, he bade his disciples watch while he went to pray; when he came they were sleeping. He spoke to them and said, could ye not watch with me one hour. Just before this he also said to Peter, before the cock crows twice thou shalt deny me thrice. It is a matter in history that in the 1000th year A. D., some in the church were looking for the coming of Christ. This was the evening watch. Luther, Wesley and many leading religious teachers believed in the soon coming of Christ, and thought he would come from 1836 to 1844. This was the second watch, the midnight watch, and here was heard the midnight cry, Behold the bridegroom, fulfilled in the Advent movement.

Why is it termed the midnight cry? As we have before shown, soon after the opening of the 6th seal, the Now Hypothesis doctrine was obscuring the Sun of Righteousness with darkening effect in the church. That if we allowed the 138 years and 3 months, the time that all the tribes of Israel were being carried into captivity, for the season of the working of this leaven in the church, we would find that one-half of this period would reach from 1764 when this foundation was laid in the church, to 1831, at the raising of the midnight cry, when the virgins arose and trimmed their lamps. When the watch was past, in 1844, and the bridegroom did not come, bitter was the disappointment experienced. The wise said, wait and watch again. The foolish could not bear the reproach heaped upon the movement, and their light went out. They would not watch for the due time again.

The third watch occurred when they thought in their heart he was coming from 1873 to 1884, at the cock crowing. Again disappointment awaited the church of God, and before the cock crew twice Peter denied his Master thrice.

Watch, brethren, for the 4th time through the morning; watch if need be for the Morning Star. "Hold fast till I come." It is objected, "The sign of the Son of man has not yet made its appearance, and as these events were to immediately precede this sign, it follows they are yet future, while those predicted by Christ will be known and witnessed by the whole world. It will cause the whole world to mourn and cry for a hiding place from the wrath of the Lamb." Now we do not think that what he told his disciples privately will be witnessed or recognized by the whole world. Up to the sign of the Son of man we find the other signs were seen by the few, and although recorded, nearly forgotten by the world, cherished only by a few believers. "The wise man in heart will receive commandments and the knowledge of the Holy is understanding." "Wise men lay up knowledge." "A scorner seeketh wisdom and findeth it not, but knowledge is easy to him that hath understanding."

Now it is notable that to his disciples he did not explain what this sign of the Son of man in heaven should appear like. But he spoke in dark sayings of this sign in heaven to the Pharisees and Sadducees as belonging to the "signs of the times." "They came and tempting him asked him to show them a sign from heaven. But he answered and said unto them, when it is evening ye say it will be fair weather for the heaven is red, and in the morning it will be foul weather today for the heaven is red and lowering. Ye know how to discern the face of the heaven but ye cannot discern the signs of the times. An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign and there shall no sign be given to it but the sign of Jonah, and he left them and departed. From our standpoint we seek after no signs, for to us they are all fulfilled; our objectors have yet to see any signs in heaven, as there is a time to every purpose and to every thing there is a season." The last sign was seen and discerned in the fall of 1833, just 50 years from the sign of the falling stars. In this sign of the "evening red" and the "morning red" we see the last one of all the heavenly "signs of the times." This was seen world wide, for he spoke of it to others as well as to his disciples, to whom he calls it "the sign of the Son of man in heaven."

A most beautiful sign it was, one whispering of peace and joy and expectation of his soon coming. We looked upon it with glad surprise, saying in our heart, "It is the sign of the Son of man in heaven, even so ye also when ye see all these things know that he is nigh, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all these things be accomplished." To the believing heart it came with unspeakable delight as the herald of his coming. There was nothing repelling or fearsome in this sign. It was one of glorious light, not dreadful darkness, or a strange vision of falling lights in the dead of night. What do we look for next? And then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send forth his angels with a great sound of a trumpet and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. This will also be seen world wide. Let us live up to the commandment, "Watch ye at every season, making supplication that ye may prevail to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man."

It is objected, "But the end is not yet. That time of persecution when the few remaining witnesses to truth shall be called upon to illustrate new chapters in the church's martyrology, has yet to dawn, and until its disclosure minds of believers, though prayerfully watchful, need not be vividly expectant. But they who were not watching expectantly when he came, found the door shut. Do not the Papal victims of persecution, millions in number, as they were following the Pagan persecution of the early Christians, fill the prophecy of the 5th seal as well as time of the great tribulation before the opening of the 6th seal in 1755. I know and can see it is in historical order as well as prophetically fulfilled in order.

We can see disturbing influences at work in the nations, but we can also see the "more sure word of prophecy" fulfilled which enables us to see that the end is very near. The one class fears the obloquy and scorn meted out to disappointed watchers; the other class remembers that John preached the kingdom of heaven was at hand, and the disciples exultantly believed. Their disappointment was great at the Master's rejection, and their mourning was bitter; when the Jews derisively scorned the dying Savior and mockingly hailed him as King of Israel, "We hoped it was he which should redeem Israel" was the mournful cry of their heart. After he rose from the dead they expectantly asked, "Lord, dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" Again disappointment was their portion. During Paul's ministry the church was expectant until Paul told them there must be a falling away first and the man of sin be revealed. They watched three times and no have we, but the fourth watch is to come, the last one given us, the morning watch, when they with us shall be made perfect. "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief, for ye are all sons of the light and sons of the day; we are not of the night nor of darkness, so then let us not sleep as do the rest, but let us watch and be sober. For they that sleep, sleep in the night, and they that be drunken are drunken in the night. But let us, since we are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation. For God appointed us not unto wrath, but unto the obtaining of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ who died for us, that whether we woke or slept we should live together with him. Wherefore exhort one another and build each other up even as also ye do." 1 Thess. v.

Quench not the spirit, despise not prophesyings, prove all things, hold fast that which is good, abstain from every appearance of evil, and the God of peace will sanctify you wholly and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you who will also do it. England is the land of my birth, but I cannot walk with the English brethren as to the time of Christ's coming. I stand rather with the American brethren "vividly expectant." They first look for the coming of Antichrist now. We look for Jesus Christ our Lord to come in the clouds of heaven as next in order, for mourning is here with us now. Blessed are they that mourn. E. K. HOLT.

MICA-PEN NOTES.

So the week of the grand funeral has come! Henceforth for six days there will be all the ingenuity and grandeur of tribute, in parade and pomp and pageant, in bayonets glittering and infantry marching, in tolling bells and thundering cannon, in cavalcade and procession! But I have thought how differently our Lord was buried and how unlike were his obsequies. A few grieved men, with scant liberty perhaps, slowly and carefully detach their dead and mangled hero from his cruel cross, and carry him to the cell in a rock, thinking to give him the simple honor and sweet quiet of a rest where never yet a lifeless body had been laid. Some rustic women, with rueful look and aching hearts, are helplessly looking on, and there are ill suppressed groans and heavy footsteps, (if so be, indeed, utterly overcome with the terrors of the dreadful day, they have not ere this tottered slowly and wearily to their homes.) The Lord of glory had a burying, humble enough surely. There was no sarcophagus, no lying in state, save as he lay two nights and a day in the profoundest silence, with a guard, quite other than friendly, grimly watching the great stone that closed him in.

But a great honor did come on the third day. An angel glowing, as if he had come from the white fire of a celestial furnace, opened the portal of the little chamber where the dead majesty lay, and the king came forth victorious. But there was no earthly pageant, even then; not a bell rang a jubilee, not a trumpet sounded a welcome, not a soldier presented arms. But all around there may have been invisible troops of mighty angels, or if not, there was joy unspeakable in heaven, where the tidings of the grand event had come by true telegraph. Think of how much was included in the word sensation, then and there! How the incorrupt, nervous, but spiritual organism of angel legions thrilled with exultation, and the heart of the uncounted loyal host bounded with gratitude and delight!

Yet Jesus moved about quietly and all unobserved by the world. There was no cloud on his face, no look of displeasure, of resentment, of feeling and intent hostile to the mob that were yesterday hauled to destroy him. His soul is serene, his temper is sweet and his spirit as gentle as ever. There is infinite quiet, gladness and thankfulness in his heart that the darkness and agony are all gone, and that he has gone thoroughly and perfectly through all the suffering and trial. He has obeyed his Father implicitly. He has followed where his Father led, obediently. He has done all, suffered all, borne every burden, met every requisition, mastered every difficulty. All anger, anguish and adversity had exhausted itself on him and he as the dutiful son and faithful sacrifice comes forth free, and walks the earth, a hero forever, but lamb-like and to the utmost self-contained and utterly unselfish; generous, kindly, in every possible respect fit to be crowned and received as king, with every temper quality and accomplishment from nature and discipline and destiny to make him the most glorious head of universal empire.

I trust we are patriotic and by no means ungrateful for the service and achievements of the earthly and human leader of our armies in the terrible civil conflict of twenty years ago. But I must guard my heart against over-admiration and that feeling of homage which may too easily have in it something of the quality of idolatry. Never, never let any object of my esteem or reverence under the sun, put the new Adam, the white, the Divine lamb of sacrifice, the Lord released from death and now conqueror for ever, into the lightest shade of contrast. Forbid it, love, forbid it, loyalty, forbid it, gratitude, forbid it, memory of grandest achievement, memory of what Jesus is and has forever done, and forever shall be, and while he sees the fruit of his once utter humiliation and astonishing extremity of suffering, increasing ages to come, may you and I partake of his joy with deepest and sincerest thanksgivings and glory in the final and eternal fitness of things.

Aug. 15. All is over, and we rest from the earthly glory of the great funeral week. The dead is in his tomb. The martial mourning pageant is done. The strains of music have died away, and we return to life with its labor, its routine, its sacrifice. And what is Jesus of Bethlehem to us in the quiet of these August days, and in the quiet of our truthful, thoughtful minds? Our glory is in him who broke the power of death, and for whom we wait to break the slumber of the millions who loved him, and with whom we are joined in great alliance, though we yet breathe the vital air of conscious, but mortal life. There is a grander pageant coming than that from the City Hall to Riverside. It will be the glory of the returning Prince, shouting to rouse his beloved, and greeted with an answering cry of immortal gladness as they rise in a grand and shining congregation at his call. The eye of the waiting saint may well be single. To him Jesus is chief, wholly, instantly, and forever. He or that which should threaten to rise in rivalry, or even in temporary obscuration of the vision of God, and the love of the Nazarene, is an enemy.

As to the glowing eulogy of Gen. Grant by the clergyman at McGregor, there is with all the pictorial splendor of the tribute, (detracting nothing from what is honest and just and true) a misunderstanding of Scriptures, in putting the soul of the deceased now in the presence of God, and in representing Lincoln, McPherson, Rawlins and Washington as coming "to greet him with the kiss of immortality, and to escort the conqueror over the last enemy, to a coronation never seen on thrones of earthly power and glory." Statesman and warriors sleep in the dust. They are not in heaven, nor do we think their thin and ghostly shadows flit about in invisible ether. The spirits go to God, the souls to sheol, and in sheol there is no wisdom, and there is no consciousness to soul or spirit till the shout, the voice and the trump. Thus, at least, it seems to some who have not the gift or power to make a noise in the world, but only a quiet word of testimony.

Aug. 18. One's pen moves slowly sometimes. I have just been over to a little hamlet nestled in the coziest of hollows among mountains. Rocks, woods, brooks, slopes, thickets, catch the eye and lure the feet. There are two neat little churches there, and the Sabbath meetings were thinly attended. I could but think there was a field there, ripe for the harvest. What might humility, fidelity, love and truth do, or what might they not do? I put humility first, and I would put faith and love to man along with it. I would have no pride of opinion making itself evident in a garb of pious zeal. But there is spiritual dearth and death in that New England vale. Goodness, rightly shown, the goodness of God, kindly, quietly, patiently, faithfully preached, with some notes of the coming glory and kingdom of Messiah aptly sounded, ought to touch and draw the people. But think of two little congregations, meeting in two separate houses within half rifle shot of each other. I would say, "O, you two little handfuls! you never will agree in all points of doctrine. Why then do you not disagree lovingly, and each labor for the other's good as well as your own? O how little in this world, of honestly loving others as well as ourselves! Of course it is preached, but ah, the practice! People, in their zeal, forget pity and sympathy, and God-like and Christian love. But here I stop. C. C.

Editor Restitution:

A short vacation enables me to write to you from the mountains of Virginia. How beautiful are these hills. Every time I look upon them I see the appropriateness of God's own land being a land of mountains. They are always, to me, intimately associated with thoughts of sublimity, with the power and majesty of God's work. I am convinced, too, that one who understands the future of the earth, and of man on the earth, must necessarily appreciate more fully the beautiful and sublime in nature. This lonely country governed by righteous rulers. These fertile fields tilled by people "who know the Lord from the least unto the greatest," surely it will be a paradise indeed.

I hear men every where on the cars, at the hotels, talking about the future of our country. How little do they dream what it's future will be. If they would only be enlightened by the truth, how differently they would talk. Do you not think that many of the clergy will have much to answer for in the coming age? Calling themselves leaders yet denouncing the literal acceptations of the literal and oath-attested promise of God? Calling themselves teachers and yet telling the people it is not essential to be baptized, it is not essential to believe in the literal and visible coming of our Savior.

They have riveted the chains of theology so fast upon their hearers that it is almost impossible to free them. Imagine one million men shaking their shackles and crying out, "the truth has made us free." Such is the spectacle presented to us every Sunday throughout the United States. Conscientious they are, no doubt, moral in large measure and zealous, but conscientious, moral, and zealous slaves to a dogma of the soul's immortality, anyone may write a code of morals, and almost any one may be conscientious, and zealous in advocating it, a man may as conscientiously believe a lie as the truth. I wish with all my heart and soul I could make men see it.

As advocates and followers of the truth we have no much to be thankful for and I now pledge myself dear brethren to use more earnestly the talents entrusted to my care, and to work more steadfastly in the Master's vineyard. May you be spared for much useful labor in building up the cause of Christ, in encouraging the brethren in their most holy faith.

Whatever befalls us in this mortal life
'Tis span of alternating cloud and light,
We will not feel beforehand heaven bars right
To our companion in the rugged way
Pointing to us the fadeless star of day!
Though friends forget, and cruel death may blight,
Truth rainbow-like makes all the future bright
Gleaming with hope above the clouds of strife.
Ever in Jesus.

Discoveries at Rome.

An interesting discovery illustrating the commerce and the luxury of ancient Rome has been made close to Monte Testaccio and the English cemetery. The whole of that district to the west of the Aventine, outside of Porte Tregemino, was occupied by the granaries and warehouses for the storage of imports of all kinds. Between the northern side of Monte Testaccio and the Tiber there still exist colossal remains of the great emporium built by Marcus Emilius Lepidus and Emilius Paulus nearly 200 years before the Christian aera. In the year 1868 a considerable portion of the quays was discovered, together with some 600 blocks, many of them of large size, of rare, variegated marbles of all kinds, lying just where they were landed from the galleys which had brought them from Numidia, the Cyrenian Islands, and Asia Minor fifteen centuries ago.

Now in the course of the building operations in this locality, two warehouses have been discovered, one filled with elephants' tusks and the other with lentils. It is curious to find such products stored side by side; but as bags of lentils were sometimes shipped as ballast, they may have served that purpose. The discovery would have been a very valuable one if, unfortunately, the ivory had not been much decayed.—Rome Correspondence of London Times.

THE RESTITUTION.

J. A. CRAFTS, Editor.

Plymouth, Indiana, September 2, 1885.

SEVERAL communications must be deferred to future numbers.

SOME days ago it was stated that the cholera epidemic in Spain had attacked 156,077 persons, and that 61,521 thus attacked had died. There is no abatement of the plague in Spain, and it is spreading into other countries.

The Phrenological Journal.—The September number of this popular and widely read serial has come to hand. An article entitled, "The Character-Race, or Anglo-Saxon" is particularly notable. It is well known that some advocate the theory that this race is in the line of direct descent from the lost tribes of Israel, and although the author of this article says nothing with regard to this view of the subject, still those advocating the theory will read it with much interest.

The International Standard. This is a literary bi-monthly published at Cleveland, Ohio. One grand object of this Magazine is to aid in the preservation and perfection of Anglo-Saxon weights and measures. Another leading feature is the discussion and dissimination of the wisdom contained in the Great Pyramid of Jeezeh in Egypt. Among the articles contained in the last number is one devoted to the Anglo-Israel theory, in which the writer—Edward Hine—labors to prove the indentification of the English and American peoples with lost Israel. Its other articles are of an instructive character; among which we may note one on the Druids, and another on the Geography of Moses.

PEN PICTURES OF ORIENTAL SCENES.

From lengthy articles, written by Mrs. Susan E. Wallace for the Independent, we take the following descriptive extracts of scenes in Bible Lands. The word-painting, by the distinguished Authoress, is well calculated to please, while the subject matter, so beautifully delineated, is certain to be very interesting to all who have ever familiarized themselves with what the Scriptures say regarding these very subjects. It is singular that almost everthing in those Eastern Countries is stereotyped, and the impress of to-day is so like what was seen three or four thousand years ago. Speaking of Syria, Mrs. Wallace says:

"Soon as you set foot on Syrian soil your Bible readings, forgotten or overlaid, so as to be crowded out of memory, come back again with the same force they held in childhood. You see Abigail, wife of Nabal, astride a white mule driving other mules; these are the bells of Eleazer's camels, tinkling by the fountains at evening. Blind Bartimeus begs by the wayside, and green and fresh are the gourds of swift growth, such as shaded the Prophet of Nineveh, and solitary lodges in the gardens of cucumbers. From tombs and dens in naked rocks rush weird shapes like fabled ghouls, or searchers of graves, hideous with knotted hair and cancerous faces. The cry for help, holding up hands with fingers rotted away and skin-like scales of fishes. Fling a coin before they get nearer, for they are lepers.

Syrian villages are much alike, low mud houses, bare of ornament, a plaster floor, a flat roof laid with lime and sand, where the family may sleep, where maize is spread to dry, and pigeons flock and feed. An outer stair leads to this useful roof, the doorway is a great arch covered with a hanging mat, answering to the Arab tent, just as the fathers of these people in the wilderness closed the Tabernacle entrance with a veil. At sunset, as of yore, men and women gather about the wells and gossip. None but the rich can afford to sink a shaft through solid limestone a hundred and fifty feet, and once made, the spring is a precious heritage, belonging forever to one family and his tribe; no law or combination can wrest it from him; and it is the saying when Bedawin are hard pressed: We can stop the wells. Water is life; how, then, can the horsemen follow?

The villages are picturesque in the distance, at near view filthy and poverty-stricken past telling. In the narrow streets, roofed to keep the sun off, among famished beasts, squat, worn-out women, with diseased children who are taught before they can speak, to put out hands for alms to the traveler. Beggars, in every stage of sickness and deformity, miserable dogs, quarreling over dry bones, the blind, the lame, the mixed multitude which followed the Master, beseeching that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment; and as many of twelve tribes dim eyes made whole. As you advance into the Holy Land, at every turn is new and startling evidence of the truth of sacred history, and forgotten texts start into remembrance with vivid meaning. In the midst of this squalor and misery a shining minaret points with slender finger to the one God; a square of green turf is nicely kept about it; and a prayer stone shows the direction of the Kaaba, the center of the world to one-third of the human race. A few plane trees, which are our sycamore, with dangling balls, fringe the place of prayer and the fountains. Without this oasis are heated rock and scorching sand, bare except for a shrub, like our sage brush, the food of the camel.

Circling waves of mountains bound the horizon. One pleasant spot in these forlorn towns is the burial place, not sequestered and forgotten, but a sort of park, where Moslems, old and young, hesitate not to stray; where children play hide and seek, black goats browse, and the dead seem in a sort of fearless companionship with the living. Once a week, on Friday, the Mohammedan Sunday, great ladies picnic among the tombs, carrying white umbrellas, lined with green (a sign of rank), and lay on the graves an herb called rihan, which is our sweet basil. In dreamy quietude they sit beside the turbaned headstones, motionless almost as the still sleepers below."

Speaking of the birds she thus describes the feathered denizens of the air: "Everything is unfamiliar, except the birds; for of the three hundred and twenty-two varieties of Palestine, one hundred and seventy are English. The timid lark starts out from her nest on the ground, and goes singing up to Heaven's gate, circling the sky with waves of melody. The hedge-sparrow twitters tamely about to pick up scattered grain, reminder of the care of the All-Seeing One. Swallows skim the sky at twilight, and gentle are the notes of cooing doves and tame pigeons on the roofs, as they twine their silver beaks, repeating the old, old story, which is new every morning and fresh every evening. The titmouse flits unresting as the birds of the Bosphorus, which never alight, les ames damnee, and the carrier bird scatters cinnamon seed into fresh fields. Sweeter than these is the nightingale in the pomegranate tree, wooing, with ravishing note, the rosebud and the rose to read their thin veils and lay the soul of their beauty and love all bare. Sing the poets, you may place a hundred handfuls of fragrant herbs before the nightingale, yet he wishes not in his constant heart for more than the sweet breath of his beloved rose."

Next we give a description of the city that existed in Abraham's time, from the same graphic pen:

"I am not here to prose, guide-book in hand, on the Pearl of the Orient, the most ancient city on this planet, which has survived every Empire since the Flood, and under every change of dynasty, Assyrian, Persian, Macedonian, Roman, Saracen, has kept its loftiness and prosperity. For more than 4,000 years it has risen from its green sea of verdure in bright buildings, airy, ethereal, as some deceitful mirage which looms up to the vision of the traveler, maddened with thirst in waterless wastes. The vale in which Damascus lies was in forgotten centuries named Belt Eden, the Abode of the Blest, where are fountains enough to slake the thirst of ten armies. Everyone knows the story of Mohammed's refusing to enter its walls, saying it was too delicious." The enjoyment of that Paradise would make him forget the Eternal One, on the shores of the quadrangular lake where stand one thousand goblets made of stars, out of which spirits predestined to felicity drink of the crystal wave. The spot where the Prophet resisted the fascinations of the tempter is consecrated by a mosque resplendent with green tiles. After the pitiless, blinding glare of white rock and arid gray sand, you feel the unspeakable beauty of this luxuriant valley (really an oasis), and the force of the Arab saying, The mere sight of Damascus is food for vision, and pure water to the parched throat. Entrancing as fabled Fields Elysian, it lies like some enchanted city of rounded domes, towers, and minarets, with shining crescents above below the speckless sapphire. Here are the shady rose gardens where the shrubs are trees, and all of the kind we call damask, loading the air with wholesome perfume; here are the rushing waters Barrada (the Abana of Naaman's time), and the Phoge (the Pharpar), better than all the waters of Israel. Yonder is dewy Hermon, and this wall of amethyst and beryl, edged with pearl, is snowy Anti-Libanus.

But why try to describe the indescribable? One glance is to thrill the coldest nature, and bring tears to your eyes with the more sense of the beautiful."

Home.

"Our home is not where we are, but where we wish to be."—Diamond Dust.

"The home where the heart is, wherever that be,
In city, in desert, on mountain, in sea;
Not the grandest, the number, the objects we see,
But that which we love is the magical spell.

"'Tis this gives the cottage a charm and a grace,
Which the glare of a palace but rarely can know;
It is this, only this, and not station or place,
Which gives being its pleasure, which makes it decrease!

Like the oasis on the waste, a rest-place to find,
In vain for enjoyment o'er nations we roam:
Home only can yield real joy to the mind,
And there where the heart is, there only is Home.

What Boys Should Learn.

Not to tease girls or boys smaller than themselves.

Not to take the easiest chair in the room, put it into the pleasantest place, and forget to offer it the mother when she comes to sit down.

To treat their mother as politely as if she were a stranger lady who did not spend her life in their service.

To be as kind and helpful to their sisters as they expect their sisters to be to them.

To make their friends among good boys.

To take pride in being a gentleman at home.

To take their mothers into their confidence if they do anything wrong, and, above all, never to lie about anything they have done.

To make up their minds not to learn to smoke, chew, or drink, remembering that these things cannot be unlearned, and that they are terrible drawbacks to good men and necessities to bad ones.

To remember that there never was a vagabond without these habits.

To observe all these rules, and they are sure to be Gentlemen.

The Love of God.

"God so loved the world."

In a sermon on the love of God G. F. Pentecost gives the following narration of the power that divine truth had, in its influence on the mind of a little girl, when her childish heart was brought to realise that God is love. We take this from an excellent discourse in the last number of the N. Y. Independent. We hope our little readers will learn to realize that God is love, and that he has given his own dear Son to die for our sins.

"I am reminded here of a beautiful little incident which I have somewhere read or heard. It was when Luther was having his Bible printed in the vernacular of his beloved German people. A little girl, the daughter of one of his printers, had learned to spell out the words of the book which her father was printing, though largely ignorant of what it was. She had been reared in the faith (?) of Rome, and her whole thought of God was, that he was a great and dreadful Judge into whose presence she must finally come, to give an account for her sins. To her all religion was a series of works; prayers, penances and such like acts, by means of which his wrath might be measurably appeased, and his punishment somewhat mitigated. She knew nothing of the "love of God," even if she had ever heard of it. One day she picked up a fragment of paper on which she spelled out these words "For God so loved the world that he gave——." This was all. But it was a new revelation to her. She knew that it came from God's book which her father was printing; but it was a statement which she was entirely a stranger to. She pondered it long and well. Her little sensitive heart became quickly alive to its importance, and as she thought more and more upon it, the Spirit opened her mind and heart to take to the full import of it. With this word, now not only in her hands, but in her heart, her legal fear and dread of God vanished, as darkness before the rising sun. Her heart responded to the revelation, and soon began to sing with joy. She hid the little piece of paper containing this wonderful fragment of truth, in her bosom, as she would have done an amulet, and feasted her heart on it from day to day. Presently her mother noticing so great a change in her spirits (for she had always been a serious child, and her dread of God had made her a sad one), especially in that she had grown cheerful and happy, and was often found singing some little songs, as if to herself—the mother said to her one day: "Why, Gretchen, what ails thee, child. Thou hast grown wondrously cheerful and happy of late. What is it that has come to thee?" The child pulled forth her wondrous piece of paper, and said: "It is this that makes me so happy, mother." "And what is there in that scrap of paper to make thee happy, child?" "O, it is because of what it says out of God's book." "And what does it say, child; read it to me" (the mother could not read). So the child read her wondrous word: "For God so loved the world that he gave. . . ." This did not seem very clear to the mother. So she asked, again: "Gave what, my child? I do not see why that should make thee so happy." "Oh, mother," said the child, with the light of heaven filling her whole face, and joy thrilling in her voice, "I do not know what he gave; but if he so loved the world that he gave anything, I will never be afraid of him again." Ah, dear child, thou hadst the secret of secrets in thy heart, though thou didst not know the fullness of it. I cannot but think if little Gretchen had known what we know, and what no doubt she came soon to know herself, that "he gave his only begotten Son," his well beloved, in whom he was well pleased, and that to take our sins and put them away in his own body upon the tree and bring us back to himself, her little heart would have well nigh burst for gladness."

BIBLES BEFORE THE REFORMATION.

Germany produced the first printer, and the Latin Bible as the first printed book. Germany also produced the first Bible printed in a modern tongue. For several centuries the Roman church had forbidden the reading of the Scriptures by the laity, especially in the vernacular. It is not known at what time the Bible was translated into the German; though fragments of such translations have come down from comparatively early times. There must have been a German translation early in the fifteenth century, for about ten years after the invention of printing, the First German Bible was printed at Strasburg about 1266, by Johannes Mentelin, the printer of the Third Latin Bible. It is a folio, containing 466 leaves, printed in double columns, 50 lines to a column. Two copies of this Bible were in the Caxton Exhibitation, one lent by the Queen, the other by Earl Spencer. Both are richly illuminated in gold and colors, but in entirely different styles. The size and richness of the book indicate that it was not designed for popular reading. The Second German Bible is also a folio. It is attributed to Heinrich Eggestoye, Strasburg, 1466, and like the preceding has 465 leaves, printed in double columns, 50 lines to a column.

These earliest Bibles in German were followed by twelve more editions in High German and three in Low German, all printed before Luther issued his New Testament in 1522. A writer in the Athenæum says that intelligent Protestants knowing these facts about early German Bibles will discard the familiar statement that Luther gave to the people the Bible in the vernacular. He is entirely mistaken, however. Protestants are also intelligent enough to know that all these fourteen editions in High German and three in Low German are known and classed and described by bibliographers as important, splendid, sumptuous. In this respect they were like the numerous Latin Bibles of the fifteenth century, which we have enumerated and described in a series of articles during the last few months. Even now, when learning and wealth are widely distributed among the masses, it would not be possible to give the Bible to any nation, if it were printed only in magnificent Library editions. No book of any kind ever became a people's book which was not printed in an inexpensive form. No other books compete with the Bible and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, and no other books have been issued in so vast a number of cheap editions. Let us bear this in mind in enumerating the expensive folio German Bibles which preceded the translations of Luther. They are thus recorded (i.) Johannes Mentelin, Strasburg, circa 1464–66; (ii.) Heinrich Eggestein, Strasburg, circa 1466; (iii.) Jodocus Pflanzmann, Augsburg, circa 1470-73; (iv.) Frisner and Sensenschmidt, Nurnberg, circa 1470-73; (v.) Gunter Zainer, Augsburg, circa 1473-75; (vi.) Gunter Zainer, Augsburg, dated 1477; (vii.) Anton Sorg, Augsburg, 1477; (viii.) Anton Sorg, Augsburg, 1480; (ix.) Anton Koburger, Nurnberg, 1483; (x.) Johann Grueninger, Strasburg, 1485; (xi.) Hans Schonsperger, Augsburg, 1487; (xii.) Hans Schonsperger, Strasburg, 1490; (xiii.) Hans Otmar, Augsburg, 1507; and (xiv.) Silvan Otmar, Augsburg, 1518. Besides these splendid editions in High German, there were three equally grand editions published in Low German. (i.) Quentel, Cologne, 1480; (ii.) Stephan Arndes, Lubeck, 1494; and (iii.) Halberstadt, 1623.

Of these Bibles eight are in the British Museum. Dr. Ginsburgh is said to have all the fourteen in High German. The Eggestoyn Bible is in the Lenox Library. One of the Augsburg 1477 Bibles is the first German Bible with a date. In this connection we would ask those of our readers who make inquiries in regard to old Bibles in their possession that they examine an old Bible carefully for a name and date. If it is perfect and yet has no title-page, it is worthy of much investigation. If it has no title-page it may have some indication of its origin at the end, in the closing words or in an inscription called a colophon. If the Bible was not printed before or soon after 1500, whatever may be its interest or value, it is not very old. If it was printed before or soon after 1500 it may be identified with one of those just mentioned, and thus its relative position and interest in the history of early Bibles will be determined.

Italy comes next to Germany in obtaining the Scriptures printed in a native tongue. Two translations were issued in 1471. Both were printed at Venice, one by Vindelin de Spira, the other by Nicolas Jenson, the best printer of the fifteenth century. Earl Spencer's copy of the Italian Bible, printed by N. Jenson, at Venice, 1471, was in the Caxton Exhibition. Like the other Bibles of the period, it is a folio 10¼ by 14 inches, without title-page, pagination or signatures, fifty lines to a full page. Its date in Roman letters is at the end of the New Testament. An Italian Bible, with the history of the Septuagint by Aristeas, translated into Italian by N. de Malermi, was printed in Venice, 1477, by Antonio Bolognese. It is a folio in two parts. Another folio Italian Bible was printed at Venice by Joan Rosso Vercellese, 1487.

France furnished still less of the Bible in the vernacular during this period. There was a New Testament in French, quarto, printed by Buyer, at Lyons in about 1477. There was a Bible in French paraphrase printed about 1487.

Even the Dutch language does not furnish much more than this. Mr. Hawkins mentions the Bible in Dutch, as the first book printed at Delft, 1477, by Jacob Jacobs Zoen and Mauritius Yemants Zoen. It is a folio in two volumes.

Bohemia produced a Bible in 1488, a folio printed at Prague. Mr. Hawkins mentions another Bohemian Bible, as one of the very rarest of early Bibles a folio printed at Kuttenberg, 1489.

We do not present this as an exhaustive list of ante-Reformation translations of the Scriptures, but it represents just about what had been accomplished at that time in making known the Word of God through printing. As to our own tongue, it is well known that our Scripture poverty in this respect was almost absolute. In the technical sense there are no old English Bibles, none of the fifteenth century, none that are called incunabula. All that can be said is that early English printing is not actually destitute of all traces of the Scriptures. William Caxton, our first English printer, whose life and work were very obscurely known until our own day, printed in 1483, the first year of the reign of Richard the Third, a folio called The Golden Legends. This contains an English translation of nearly all the Pentatouch and the gospels. How much it was read we do not know, but we believe that it was the forerunner of Tyndale and Coverdale, preparing the way for the Reformation. In Gen. iii. 7 it reads: "And thus they knewe that they were naked. And they toke figge leaves and sewed them togyder for to cowre their membre in maner of breches." This anticipates the coming of the famous "Breeches Bible," which is the Genevan Version of 1560.

All that bibliographical students have discovered in regard to early issues of the Scriptures confirms the statement that before the Reformation they were comparatively unknown. They were not printed in any country, in a way that would bring them within the reach of large numbers. Perhaps it would have been impossible to do this, there were so few who knew how to read. Reformation brought not only printed Bibles but the desire and capacity to read. As the world grows older and wiser, it will be more and more understood that it was the Bible which gave liberty to Luther, and that Luther with the Bible in his hand gave liberty to the world.—*N. PISA, August 31.—A terrible thunderstorm visited this city yesterday. The lightning was awful, and caused great destruction. It struck and shattered the tower of the Church of St. Cecelia, and that of the Church of San Giuseppe. The former was so badly split that it is expected to fall at any moment. Although subjected to the hardest storm known in Pisa during the present generation, the leaning tower remains uninjured.

Two ladies belonging to families of rank in Mezzovo, in Epirus, European Turkey, were some time ago abducted by brigands from Epirus Mountain. The abductors demanded a ransom of $20,000 for the return of each or either captive. The families of the women have just paid to the agents of the brigands the $40,000 demanded, and the ladies have been safely restored to their homes. They say they were well and honorably treated by their captors.

What would be thought if the Metropolitan Opera-House of New York were soon filled with people assembled to hear the simple preaching of the gospel by any—the most eloquent—preacher in the country? Yet, not as a supposition, but as a fact, the largest theater in Japan has been packed, on two successive days, by attentive listeners to plain sermons by native preachers. Only fifteen years ago there was not a Christian Church in Japan, and probably there was not a half-dozen native Christians in the Empire.

I thank Brother Read for his vindication, in Aug. 19th number, of the angel's account of Jesus' begettal. Brother Weethee's thought, in same number—"the force of Abrahamic blood," as well as of Abrahamic faith—is a grand one. I see no need of limiting the blood to Saxon veins. The philology may be correctly traced, but that is the husk; the kernel is the blood touched with the faith.

Editor Restitution:

In a letter lately received from Mr. Rolla Floyd of Jaffa Palestine, I learn that the cholera last summer in the Mediterranean cities and other places, and consequent quarantine, greatly interrupted the travel in the Levant and especially in Palestine. But Mr. Floyd says, the Jews are arriving in rather greater numbers than the year previous when I was there. He spoke of the arrival of two very wealthy Jews who stayed at his house over night on their arrival, and before proceeding to the city of their great King. One of them contemplated purchasing a large house and fitting it up for a hospital on a liberal scale. He intending it, not only for Jews, but for all denominations. Mr. Floyd says, he has learned since the arrival of this man at Jerusalem he has purchased the large house out-side the city wall, and a little to the north of the Jaffa road, that has lately been occupied by the German Counsel, which contains about fifty rooms. If this man carries out his proposed plan, it will be a great boon to the poor Jews in Jerusalem.

But a hospital does not fill the greatest want of the poor Jews of Jerusalem. They want work. They need bread. They need clothing. They need comfortable rooms to live in, and every necessity that goes to make up the comforts of life. Many of them came from Russia, many from Roumania where they were despoiled of every thing that they possessed, and then begged their way to the Holy City to suffer, and in many instances, (as Mr. Taylor informed me,) to die by starvation in the streets, under the shadows of walls, and wherever their enfeebled limbs refused further to carry them. The sights I saw while I was there would be sufficient, I should think, to make the hardest heart recoil, and open up an avenue of sympathy in their greatest enemy. I was told that an English lady that preceded me in trying to see for herself the sufferings and wretchedness of those poor Jews, after visiting a few families, recoiled in horror, and said her nerves were not sufficient for the task. I saw one man who, Mr. Taylor told me, had suffered for food until he was nearly famished, and I think he was certainly the thinnest and poorest mortal that I ever saw unless it were some one reduced by disease.

These people want work by which they can earn their daily bread. They are able and willing to work, but there is little or no work that they can get to do. There are many undoubtedly who are indolent, and who would rather half starve on charity than labor, and live well, but there are many no doubt, judging from appearances, and probably the greater proportion of the sufferers who would halt with delight and rejoicing, any plan by which they might earn their daily bread.

Another item of local interest which I received from Jaffa is to the effect that the French apiarian with whom I had dealings while I was there, located last fall at Jaffa with the intention of staying there with their bees until after the spring crop of orange blossom honey, when they will remove all to Ramleh, a distance of about twelve miles from Jaffa. Here they will stay for a crop of Cactus and sesame honey, thence later in the season they will remove their bees to the vicinity of Bethlehem where there is an abundance of Thyme, from which the bees obtain a large crop of most delicious honey, but I think not quite equal to the orange blossom.

They have now about four hundred stands of bees. Last spring they had only about sixty swarms and took 5,800 lbs in about sixteen days. They move their bees from place to place on the backs of camels. Sixteen swarms being a camel load. They are enterprising young men, and have demonstrated clearly that the land of Canaan is a land flowing with honey as of old, if not with milk. But the question of milk is only a question of time and a good government. The land is capable of producing the milk, if only an enterprising people were there with the cows to convert the nutritious vegetation into that precious nectar.

I expect to hear from Jaffa again in a few days, and look for a favorable honey report from these Apiarians.

Yours, brethren and sisters in patient waiting for the coming kingdom.

"SOME TIME."

Some time, when all life's lessons have been learned
And sun and stars forevermore have set,
The things o'er which our weak judgment here has yearned—
The things o'er which we grieved with bitter wet—
Will flash before us out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deepest tints of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans were right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true.

And we shall see, that, while we frown and sigh
God's plans go on as best for you and me;
How, when we called, he heeded not our cry,
Because his wisdom to the end could see:
And e'en as prudent parents disallow
Too much of sweet to cloying babyhood,
So God, perhaps is keeping from us now
Life's sweetest things, because it seemeth good.

And if, some time, commingled with life's wine,
We find the wormwood, and rebel and shrink;
Be sure a wiser hand than yours or mine
Pours out this portion for our lips to drink;
And if some friend we love is lying low,
Where human kisses cannot reach his face,
Oh! do not blame the loving Father so,
But bear your sorrow with obedient grace.

And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God sends his friends,
And that sometime the sable pall of death
Conceals the fairest boon his love can send.
If we could push ajar the gates of life,
And stand within, and all God's working see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery find a key.

But not to-day. Then be content, poor heart:
God's plans, like lilies pure and white, unfold;
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart;
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.
And if through patient toil we reach the land
Where tired feet with sandals loose, may rest,
When we shall clearly know and understand,
I think that we shall say that "God knew best."

LOCALITY OF EDEN. No. III.

STACKHOUSE'S VIEW.

The following extract from Stackhouse's History of the Bible furnishes some of the most complete details we have ever met with:—

The instances already brought are sufficient to show, that the word Eden was imposed as a proper name on several places. And it is certain, that none of the fore-mentioned places was the Eden, whereon the earthly Paradise was seated; and that for this reason, because the marks, whereby Moses described the situation of the earthly Paradise, are not to be found in any of the said places. We are therefore to proceed, and inquire where the said marks are found; and in order thereto it must be considered, what are the marks themselves, or what in short they amount to, which is this, viz. that the Eden, wherein God planted the Garden of Paradise, lay on a river or single channel, which out of Eden was parted into four heads or rivers, by name Pison, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Perath or Euphrates. If therefore those four rivers can be found, having somewhere a single channel common to them all, then we may rest assured, that on that single channel or river, lay the country of Eden, wherein was seated the earthly Paradise.

We are therefore, in the first place, to find out the true situation of the four rivers here specified by Moses. I shall take them in the same order they are mentioned by Moses, and shall therefore begin with Pison; the situation whereof is thus described by the sacred historian: 'The name of the first (namely, river) is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx-stone.'

From hence it is evident, that, in order to find out the river Pison, we must first find out the land of Havilah here mentioned. And in doing this, we cannot follow better guides than the sacred writers. We read then of a country called Havilah in two places of Scripture, viz. Gen. xxxv. 18, and 1 Sam. xv. 7. In the former of these two places Moses informs us, that the 'Ishmaelites (or posterity of Ishmael) dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt,' etc. In the latter we are informed, that 'Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah until thou comest to Shur, that is before Egypt.' In both which places by this expression, 'from Havilah unto Shur,' is probably meant the whole extent of that part of Arabia, which lies between Egypt to the west, and a certain channel or river (which empties itself into the Persian Gulf) to the east. For that Shur was the western extremity of this part of Arabia, is evident from Exod. xv. 22, where we read, that 'Moses brought Israel from the Red Sea, and they went out into the wilderness of Shur.' So that Shur was that part of Arabia, which came up to the bottom of the Red Sea or Arabian Gulf, and so joined on to Egypt. And as it thus clearly appears, that Shur was the western extremity of that part of Arabia we are speaking of; so it seems no less clear, that Havilah was the eastern extremity of the same; and that not only from the import of the foretold expression, but also forasmuch as, in common authors, we find here placed, a people whose name, though somewhat varied by various authors, yet in all the several variations of it retains visible footsteps of the name of their forefather Havilah, or, as it is written more agreeably to the original Hebrew word, Chavilah. Thus by Eratosthenes are placed in these parts the Chaulothæi; by Festus Avienus the Chaulæi, by Dionysius Periegetes the Chalæi, and by Pliny the Chavelæi; all retaining in their name most of the radical letters of the word Chavilah. So that from hence may safely be concluded, that this eastern tract of Arabia, lying near and on the bottom of the Persian Gulf, was formerly and in the time of Moses known by the name of Havilah. Hereupon many learned men amongst the modern writers have acknowledged this to be the situation of Havilah, as Steuchus, Boreoldus, Grotius, Hornius, and Bochartus.

But yet this is not enough for our purpose. Before we can be assured, that this is that Havilah which was washed by the river Pison, we must be assured also, that there is, or at least formerly was therein 'gold,' and that 'good gold;' as also that there is or was therein 'bdellium' and the 'onyx-stone.' And of these particulars we may be well assured without great difficulty. For authors both sacred and profane, do very much commend the gold of Arabia. Diodorus writes, that in Arabia was found natural gold, of so lively color, that it was very much like the brightness of the fire; and so fixed, that it wanted neither fire nor refining to purify it. It will appear hereafter, that Ezekiel had regard to these parts when he says to the city of Tyre: 'The merchants of Sheba and Raamah, they were thy merchants: they traded in thy fairs with the chief of all spices, and with all precious stones, and gold.' 'Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Asshur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants,' etc. Ezek. xxvii. 22, 23. There was a great communication between all these nations through the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf; and we must particularly observe, that the Prophet expressly names Eden among the countries or places lying in these eastern parts, and some of which lay in the neighborhood of Havilah. So that there being both an Eden and an Havilah situated in these eastern parts, there are further grounds to conceive, that these were no other than the Eden and Havilah mentioned by Moses in the description of the earthly Paradise. Moreover, Arabia thus abounding with gold, and that very fine gold, no doubt but it very much dealt in it with the neighboring provinces, situated along the Euphrates, which was then very populous, if not the most populous country in the world: and the province of Havilah, lying between those countries, besides the gold of its own, had, we may reasonably suppose, a great deal also from the neighboring provinces, by the traffic and intercourse of merchants. And thus much for the gold of Havilah.

The sacred text informs us, that the same country was remarkable for (what is called in Hebrew) bedolach,' or (as it is usually rendered) 'bdellium;' which word is very variously translated by interpreters. But of all these various opinions, the most probable, and which most divide the learned, are, that which takes 'bedolach' for an aromatical gum, and that which takes it for pearls. The place of the book of Numbers, (viz. Numbers xi. 7) which is wont to be quoted in defence of this last opinion, seems to be so plain and decisive, that no good exception can be made against it. For Moses, intending to describe the manna, says, that it was 'like the seed of coriander, and the color thereof like the color of bedolach.' Now it is evident from another description of the same manna, which is to be found in Exodus xvi. 14, 31, that it was white, (according to the translation of the Seventy Interpreters, and followed, verse 31, in our common translation,) which is opposite to pearls, as also the roundness of manna, but in no wise to the bdellium gum. Hence it is, that the Talmudists, (as Mons. Bochart has learnedly observed,) mentioning this description of manna, as it is in the book of Numbers, instead of saying, that it was of the color of bdellium, said that it was of the color of pearls. But we need take no part in this dispute; it will be enough for our purpose to show, that whether the Hebrew word bedolach be taken for pearls, or bdellium gum, both are to be found in the land of Havilah.

For, as for pearls, it is most certain, that there is no place in the world, that produceth so fine ones, and in so great a quantity, as the sea about Baharen, an isle in the Persian Gulf, ten leagues off from Catif; that is to say, the sea that lies next to the land of Havilah. We shall not load this treatise with a vast number of citations, to show how great a quantity of pearls there are in the Persian Gulf, and how much they are valued both by ancient and modern authors...

It remains now to speak of the 'schoham,' which the sacred text tells us was in Havilah, and which is commonly rendered the onyx-stone. A great variety of opinions might be produced, to show that nothing certain can be affirmed of the stone schoham; and so it will be enough to make it evident, that Arabia was formerly very abounding in precious stones. The first proof shall be taken from the place of Ezekiel already quoted; where the prophet, among the chiefest commodities that came from Sheba and Raamah, places in Arabia on the easterly coast, not far from Havilah, and whose inhabitants dealt with the Tyrians, reckons the most precious spices, precious stones and gold. Nearchus, who had sailed the Persian Gulf, affirmed (as Strabo tells us) that there are many islands in that gulf, in which there was extraordinary fine precious stones. The same Strabo says that the riches of Arabia, which did consist in precious stones, and excellent perfumes (the trade whereof brought them a great deal of gold and silver, besides the gold of the country itself,) made Augustus to send Ælius Gallus thither, in order to make those nations his friends, and draw to himself their riches, or to subdue them. Diodorus describes at large the advantages of Arabia, and especially its precious stones. He says, that that region affords some of all kinds, that they are very much to be valued by reason of the variety and brightness of their colors: and he enquires into the natural causes of it.....

Proceed we now to the second river, concerning which Moses says thus: 'And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Cush.' Here it may be observed, that Moses had not affixed so many marks on the Gihon, as on the Pison; and that probably for this reason; because the Pison being known, the situation of the Gihon would be much more easily discovered. For the Pison being known to be the first river in respect to the place where Moses was writing; it is but natural to suppose, that the Gihon, as being the second, was the river next to it, and consequently the easterly channel of the two, into which the Euphrates, after its conjunction with the Tigris, is again divided.

And that it is so, we shall further make out, by showing by the mark given by Moses to know the Gihon, does agree to this easterly channel. Moses then marks out the Gihon by telling us, that it is that river, 'which compasseth the whole land of Cush.' If then it can be shown, that the name of Cush did formerly belong to the country washed by the forementioned easterly channel; it will (at least in conjunction with what is else offered) amount to a reasonable proof, that the said easterly channel is the very Gihon mentioned by Moses.... All the journals of travellers do then inform us, that Susiana is now called Chuzestan, which carries in it plain footsteps of the original word Cush, or, as it is written by some, Chus or Chuz. Benjamin of Navarre says, that the great province of Elam, whereof Suza is the metropolis, and which the Tigris waters, is called so. That province of Elam is Elymais, which extends itself so far as the coast of the Persian Gulf. The Nubian geographer and some other Arabians call it Chuzestan, but it is probably an oversight of the copiers. The inhabitants of the land call it Ohuz, if we will believe Marius Niger. The same region is called Chusah in the Book of Kings (2 Kings xvii, 24).....

Go we on, then, to the third river, of which Moses writes thus: 'And the name of the third river is Hiddekel; that is it which goeth before Assyria.' Now, the Hebrew word Hiddekel is by the Seventy Interpreters rendered the Tigris; and that the river, called by Moses Hiddekel, is in truth no other than that river, which by the Greeks and Latins is commonly called Tigris, will appear from the following considerations:—First, the name of Hiddekel, which Moses gives this river, that of Digleth, which they give it in the Levant or East, and that of Tigris, which the Europeans give it, are one and the same, varied by different nations. Taking away the aspiration of the word Hiddekel, the word Dekel remained, which the Syriane disguised, and made Diklat out of it. Josephus and the Chaldean paraphrasts, the Arabians, and the Persians turned it into Digleth; other modern Orientals into Degil and Degola; Pliny, or those who informed him, into Diglito, and the Greeks, who give to all strange words the turn and genius of their own tongue, instead of Digla called it Tigris. That the Diglito and Tigris is but one and the same river is clear from Pliny; only he is mistaken when he says that the Tigris is called Diglito at the beginning of its stream, when it runs slowly, but is called Tigris when it becomes swifter. Secondly, the method observed by Moses in reckoning up the four rivers further proves that the Hiddekel is no other than the Tigris. For as in respect of the place where Moses was writing, the Pison was the nearest to him, and so in natural order was to be named first; and then the Gihon second, as being the channel that presented itself next: so, having passed over this channel or river, and turning to the left hand, to come back to the place where Moses was writing, we met with the Tigris in the third place; which, therefore, it was but natural for Moses to mention third. Lastly, the mark whereby Moses describes the situation of the Hiddekel, does plainly confirm that it is the same with the Tigris. For Moses describes its situation thus: 'That is it which goes before Assyria.' The word may be taken, either properly to denote that only one province, which was first so called, and whereof Nineveh was the capital city; or else in a larger sense, so as to comprehend many great provinces belonging to the kings of Assyria, and which made up the Assyrian Empire. The word was not taken in the latter or larger sense till long after Moses, who therefore could understand by the name of Assyria only a small province about Nineveh. Now, the river Tigris does run along 'before Assyria,' so taken, and considered in respect of the place where Moses was writing.....

We are now come to the last of the four rivers, which Moses only names, without affixing any mark of distinction on it; and that for those two reasons, partly because the three other being discovered and known, this last could but be easily known also; partly because its largeness and neighborhood rendered it sufficiently known in the places and amongst the nations to whom he wrote. On these considerations, Moses only tells us in short, that 'the fourth river is Perath, or Euphrates.' For the Grecians changed Perath in Euphrates, adjusting this word, as well as other strange words, to the genius of their own tongue; and at the same time probably alluding to the pleasantness, or at least fruitfulness, of the adjacent country, washed by the same river, and thought to be rendered so pleasant or fruitful of the waters thereof. Or possibly, not minding any such thing, they made Euphrates out of Perath, as out of Tabor they made Atabyrius. We shall only observe further, that this river was naturally the fourth in order, according to the method followed by Moses in naming the four rivers relating hereto; and that both it and the Tigris join together in one channel, which is afterwards divided again into two channels, the westerly one of the two being the river Pison, the easterly one the river Gihon.—Bruhah.

THE HOLY LAND.

According to previous announcement, Rabbi H. Z. Sassersohn, lately from Jerusalem, gave a very interesting lecture on the above subject, at the Synagogue on North St. Paul Street. The attendance was anything but complimentary to the Israelites of this city, whose numbers, we should think, are sufficient to have given a full house to one of their own people direct from the cradle of their nation. Many of those present were from various religious bodies, and quite a delegation from the Christadelphian Ecclesia here, who believe in common with Israelites, the literal application of the promises of restoration and blessing made to that people in the Old Testament Scriptures.

The Rabbi is a man below medium size, with an unmistakable Syrian physique. He was dressed in the Rabbinical costume, and has an impressive and commanding presence. He speaks with a sonorous voice, and the deliberate and elegant address peculiar to the East, and much of the poetic expression and imagery of the real Palestine Israelite. His English is very plain, and he holds the interest of his audience throughout.

The lecturer commenced by a comprehensive historical sketch of the Land and the Holy City since its destruction by Titus, described the sufferings and down-trodden condition of its few remaining people under the different nations who have held sway over it, to its present sovereignty—the effete Ottomen. Jerusalem has been subject to seventy-two different kingdoms, and twenty-three changes of government, and has been five times destroyed since Titus. The condition of the country, the oppression and down-trodden position of the Israelites during this period, was portrayed with mournful and touching pathos, and with the earnest expression that that people recognized in their heavy chastisement the hand of God; and they see in the ameliorating influences which are now at work around them, the working of Deity, indicating the near approach of the day of deliverance. The lecturer said that these signs had never been shown so favorably since their dispersion as at this day. Jerusalem, he said, would never have peace till their children were gathered again to their own land, and owned her soil—which everyone must admit who really believes God's word in relation to them. Then, and not till then, will she resume her former glory. Jerusalem is not forsaken of the Lord; the signs indicate his approaching mercies. He commissions princes, and the hearts of kings are in the hand of Jehovah. His spirit still hovers over the city, and the remembrance of his dealings of old seems to give life to her very stones. This is what every true Israelite (and Gentile, too,) should pray for, and the lecturer said he would never rest contented till he sees her salvation.

Very interesting statements were made in regard to the excavations which have recently been made in the city. Immense stones, and even heavy walls have been found under ground, which have never seen the light since the destruction by Titus, and large buildings beneath Mount Zion, which have astonished architects—such buildings and walls as are not often seen by them. The water courses mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxii, have been discovered and explored. Two excavations on the site of the Temple brought to light a column at the depth of 100 feet from the surface; and in Wilson's Arch the secret passageway from the palace of King David to the Temple on Mount Morish, has been traced.

The streets of modern Jerusalem were described as long and narrow. Houses of the Jews, small and poorly built, and very high rents, payable two years in advance, and charged them by their Turkish and Asiatic oppressors. There are 700 Jews who lived by trade or labor in the city, and 300 possessors of houses. The city depends on rain for its supply of water, which is stored away in tanks and cisterns. The rains commence about November and continue until March; in the latter month storms and high winds. In summer rain seldom falls. Temperature in winter ranges about 50 degrees; in summer about 90.

Fruit is very plentiful in its season, and a great deal is exported to other countries. The Turks are landed proprietors, and have splendid gardens and orchards. The earth is highly productive when tilled, which has been much interfered with by depredations of wandering Arabs. No Israelites have hitherto been permitted to own the land, but the Sultan has recently given this permission, and they can now buy, own, and sell the land.

There are over 100,000 Arabs scattered over the country, who live a predatory life in the deserts and mountains. They pasture their flocks on the shores of the Jordan and around Jericho. They are the disturbing element which prevents a more general cultivation of the land.

There are 3,200 Hebrew families in Jerusalem, from all parts of the globe, principally Portugal, Turkey, Syria, Persia, Babylonia, and from Germany, Poland and Russia. There are 14 congregations—Portuguese most conspicuous. The Chief Rabbi is invested by the Turkish Government with power to decide disputes. The Jerusalem Israelites are strict observers of the law of Moses, according to Talmud traditions, and no innovations are allowed and nothing abolished. Their moral character is said to be excellent.

Large sums of money have been contributed by Israelites in other parts of the world to assist their poor brethren in the Holy Land. Sir Moses Montefiore and Albert Cohen were highly lauded for their charitable labors of love.

The Rabbi recognizes the visible hand of God in signs which indicate speedy deliverance of the people, and that the day of salvation is at hand. The Arabs are disappearing. The Israelites are increasing. The aspect of the Holy City is being changed very much by the coming of foreign capitalists, and the great fact is announced that Israelites are now allowed for the first time in eighteen hundred years to own and possess real estate. The set time to favor Zion has come, and there is hope that the poor Jews will no longer walk with their heads bowed down, looking like shadows of death, and weeping for the desolations of many centuries.

The lecturer concluded with an affecting invocation of the Psalms of David in Hebrew and English: "Thou shalt arise and have mercy on Zion, for the time to favor her, yea, the set time is come. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof. So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, and all kings of the earth thy glory. This shall be written for the generation to come; and the people which shall be created shall praise the Lord. For he hath looked down from the heights of his sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth. To hear the groaning of the prisoner; to loose those that are appointed unto death; to declare the name of the Lord in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem, when the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms to serve the Lord," etc.

Should sufficient encouragement and interest be evinced, the Rabbi may give other lectures which would be interesting to the public to hear, especially relative to the destiny of Israel. We hope our Israelitish fellow-citizens will take this matter in hand, and make arrangements to give the public another opportunity of hearing this distinguished Oriental Rabbi on all matters that pertain to the Holy Land, and in which all who believe in Divine Revelation must always feel an abiding interest.

The lecture occupied about an hour and a half, and was listened to with marked attention.—Rochester N. Y. Express.

NOT THE TRUE REASON.

A favorite theme of the scoffer, and a stone of stumbling to the earnest-minded unbeliever, is the imperfections of Christians. Glaring as those imperfections often are in the lives of those who are on the whole honest in endeavor to follow Christ, they are outshone by the vices of those who make no pretense of living a religious life. Is not the latter fact worthy of attention as well as the former? There is certain significance in the fact, if it be a fact—that Christian people as a whole are better men and women than those who live for themselves and profess to do no more. That this is the fact no candid man has ever questioned.

It is worthy of note, also, as a companion fact, that nobody has ever charged that Christianity has made the world worse than it was before Christ came. No man was ever depraved by attempting to lead a Christian life. He may not be made especially better, or he may not be made so much better as other people think he ought to become, but he is certainly not made worse. A Christian profession encourages the growth of no vices; it affords no excuse for selfish indulgence or for dishonest conduct; it offers no opiates to relieve the stings of outraged consciences; it does not "debase the moral currency" by clothing sin in the garb of virtue, by speech or act. In short, so far as it has influence at all, a Christian profession braces a man's moral nature, makes his conscience more tender, elevates his standard of duty, and makes of him in every way a better man.

If a religious life never harms but always helps a man, if Christianity blesses not blights wherever it goes, the man who points to the imperfections or inconsistencies of Christians as his reason for not entering the service of Christ convicts himself of the very sin he reprobates in others—insincerity. For nothing can be plainer than the fact that he is not giving his true reason for refusal. He is bound to admit—he always will admit when pressed—that there are genuine Christians, and that a genuine religious life is a noble thing. That others are not living that life is a lamentable fact, but it has no bearing whatever on his own duty. "You admit that genuine religion is good; very well, why not be genuinely religious?" you say to him. And his reply is: "Because Smith and Jones are hypocrites."

The absurdity and irrelevance of his reason are evident—as evident to himself, one must think, as to anybody. No transparent a subterfuge can not long impose upon any one, even on him who uses it to deceive himself. The man must wake up to the fact in brief time that his answer is not an honest one. His admission that genuine religion is admirable leaves him no escape from the duty to become himself an example of that admirable thing—no escape, that is to say, but a simple refusal to do what he acknowledges to be his duty. Ah! there we have it, at last, the true reason why men will not be Christians. Their reason is the essence of unreason; a stubborn refusal, grounded on nothing of which they can give account to themselves or to others. Their "why not" is a will not, nothing more. They do not decline to follow Christ because of the imperfections of Christians, but because of a settled unwillingness to submit themselves to a Master. Their wills are set against God. They it is of whom—Christ said; "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil." John iii. 19.—N. Y. Examiner.

HAMILTON.—At Meudon, Mich., July 28, 1885, John Hamilton, aged 77 years.

Brother Hamilton was born in Bovina, Delaware Co., N. Y. April 17, 1808, where he resided until 1836, when he removed to Michigan. In 1840 he made a settlement in Meudon township, where he lived the remainder of his days.

He was married Nov. 7, 1844, to Ann Merritt, who survives him. More than twenty-five years ago they became obedient believers of the gospel, and were baptised by E. Miller, father of the writer, and ever since have remained firm in the faith. Bro. Hamilton was a man of few words, but always gave liberally to aid in proclaiming the gospel and for the relief of the afflicted. He suffered a stroke of apoplexy in April, 1880, from which he partially recovered, but at the time of the Michigan Annual Conference in June last, he was again afflicted and was a great sufferer until his death.

Owing to a failure to secure the services of one of our preaching brethren the customary funeral sermon was omitted, and Bro. D. P. Spencer read from 1 Cor. xv. and Thess. iv. and with singing and giving thanks at the grave our brother was laid away to rest till Jesus shall appear.

"A Little While."

A little while, and we shall see the Savior;
A little while, and we shall gaze upon his face;
A little while, and we, in endless glory,
Shall sing of mercy and redeeming grace.

A little while: all how the words re echo,
How joyously they fall upon the ear;
A little while, and he that shall, will come,
Jesus our King in glory shall appear.

A little while, and life's rough journey ended,
And earthly cares and earthly sorrows o'er;
A little while—oh, joyful expectation!—
And we shall see him whom our hearts adore.

Only a little while! and then the shadows
Which cross our earthly path shall flee [away;
Only a little while, and then earth's darkness
Shall be exchanged for heaven's eternal [day.

Only a little while; as yet how often
Our hearts grow weary, and the way seems long!
A little while, and then our eyes shall see him,
And all our sighing shall be turned to song.

Only a little while! oh, then in gladness
We'll walk life's journey [with his loving smile,
And when the road is getting long and dreary
We'll murmur gaily, "'Tis a little while."

THE BLOOD OF THE ABRAHAMIC COVENANT.

Blood is a prominent feature in the scheme of redemption as it is revealed in the Scriptures, and a correct understanding of the relation it bears to that scheme is without doubt of great importance. Paul's statement that "without shedding of blood is no remission," shows to us that it is absolutely necessary for salvation. Paul also says: "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls, and of goats, should take away sins." From this latter statement, it is evident that the blood of animals, so largely shed under the law, and also before it, shed as a means of approach unto God, must have been only allowed as a figure pointing forward to the blood of Christ.

Paul makes this clear in speaking of the high priest, under the law, going into the most holy once a year, for he adds, "not without blood, which he offered for himself and the errors of the people, the Holy Spirit thus signifying that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing, which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience. . . . But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, . . . neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption." From these words we learn that Jesus obtained eternal redemption through the shedding of his own blood, and by this means opening the way into the holiest of all (which is the divine nature), and so became the way himself for all who come unto the Father by him. It is in accordance with this that we read: "The God of peace brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant." From these two passages we have clear evidence that the blood of Christ was the blood of the covenant pertaining to the future age, inasmuch as resurrection stands related to it.

Also the Lord Jesus in instituting the memorable supper, said: This cup is the new covenant in my blood." Whatever the new covenant may mean this is certain, that the blood of Christ was shed for its confirmation, and his blood being the only blood that could take away sin, it follows that that covenant is the only one under which eternal inheritance could be obtained. Now as there are only two covenants revealed in the Scriptures, the old and the new, we have only then to determine which is the new. Paul says: "In that he saith a new covenant he hath made the first old; now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away," the context proves the first or old covenant to be the Mosaic. Let us follow Paul where he goes on to say, "Be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises, for when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater he swear by himself. . . . Men verily swear by the greater, and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife. Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath, that by two immutable things (the counsel and the oath) in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us, which we have as an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail, whither the forerunner is for us entered, Jesus."

Here then we have the believer's hope connected with the promises made to Abraham, and his assurance of inheriting the promises based on Christ as having entered within the vail, the vail being the flesh; this is a statement equal to that of his obtaining eternal redemption by his own blood. The first covenant Paul styles "the ministration of death, written and engraven in stones." Its blood was of no value for resurrection. Moses and Aaron both died before it was administered, but Joshua, whom Paul styles Jesus, lived after their death, and entering into the land, administered the promises of the covenant. It required all the three to typify Christ, whose death was also for the redemption of the transgressions under the first covenant of those having the faith of the promise which existed before the law. But to return to Paul's reasoning on these matters, we read that: "Abraham when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance obeyed. . . . By faith he sojourned in the land of Promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise, for he looked for a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God."

Again, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off." And again, "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac. . . . of whom it was said, that in Isaac shall thy seed be called, accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure." A figure of resurrection, certainly an appropriate figure, seeing that the covenant of which Abraham and Isaac were heirs, referred to inheriting the land afterwards, that is beyond the grave. The term covenant literally means cutting off, and is a most significant term when we consider its use. It is used for the declared will or decree of God in relation to the blessing of his fallen creature, whom he has condemned to death, condemned in words of the most absolute nature, so that no power could save the creature from dying. Accordingly Christ was delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, and his soul made an offering for sin.

For God changeth not. His sentence cannot be reversed, it must be fulfilled; the fulfilling of it is the cutting off, and so God has named his will, decree, or promise, by the term covenant, as indicating that death must take place before it can be accomplished. In dealing with his fallen creatures, God has always made sacrifice the means of approach unto himself; so that by this sign there was a recognition of the fulfilment of the sentence. In speaking of the sacrifice of Christ, Paul quotes the words of the psalm: "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first (will) that he may establish the second: by the which will (the second), we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once."

Again, Paul states, "that Abraham is the father of all who walk in the steps of his faith," "for the promise that he should be the heir of the world was not to Abraham or to his seed (the Christ and all in him) through the law, but through the righteousness of faith, for if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made of none effect. . . . Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace, to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed."

Notice also what he says to the Galatians: "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made, he saith not and to seeds, as of many; but as of one and to thy seed, which is Christ; and this I say, that the covenant that was confirmed before of God, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect, for if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise; wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made."

The covenant was made to Abraham four hundred and thirty years before the law was given to Israel; the law was added to the Abrahamic covenant as a typical and temporary measure till Christ should come. Paul here shows that the law was inferior to the Abrahamic covenant, and could not disannul it; and that the promises of the covenant made to Abraham were also to Christ, that he is the seed referred to in the promise as heir.

To those believing Gentiles he adds: "Ye are all the children of God through the faith in Christ Jesus." Also, "if ye be Christ's then ye are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Also, "Now I say that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God to confirm the promises made unto the fathers." And as it was declared that he should be a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, Paul says: "By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better covenant;" and again through his sacrifice he established the second will, and so through the prophet the Father says, I will "give thee for a covenant of the people."

From these Scriptures it is plain that the blood of Christ was the blood of the Abrahamic covenant. The heifer, the she-goat, and the ram, all three years' old, with the turtle dove and young pigeon, were the four forms of sacrifice which were necessary to represent that of Christ. They could not take away sin, their nature had not transgressed the divine law; but in Christ we see the same nature that transgressed the law in Eden violently cut off by the command of the Father. Of Christ Paul says: "For in that he died, he died unto sin once; but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God." Again, "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." Had there been no other sacrifice than that of the animals to confirm the Abrahamic covenant how could Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and the seed have obtained a resurrection from the dead to inherit the promises? Paul speaking of them and others who had obtained a good report through the faith, says: "God having provided some better thing for us that they without us should not be made perfect." That better thing was the confirmation of the covenant by the blood of Christ, and his being raised again for the justification of the heirs of the promises. And again Paul shows that the sacrifices of animals, which they offered year by year, could not make the comers thereunto perfect, but that Christ by one offering hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

One of the holy men of old whom the Spirit moved to speak says—"Hearken to me ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord, look unto the rock from whence you are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged, look unto Abraham, your Father, and unto Sarah that bare you, for I called him alone, and blessed him, and increased him." Again—"Hearken unto me ye that know righteousness, the people in whose hearts is my law." Why are Abraham and Sarah placed before them under the figure of the hole and the rock? Because they represent the covenant in which are all those following after God's righteousness; they follow through the faith of the covenant being written in their hearts, and were sprinkled by its blood in being inducted into Christ; and although Gentiles afar off by nature, they have been brought nigh, even into the commonwealth of Israel and the covenants of promise, and Abraham is entitled their father.

As Paul puts it, It is of faith, that it might be by grace, to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed, not to that only which is of the law, but to that also which is of the faith of Abraham, who is the father of us all." One marked difference between the old covenant and the new, or the Mosaic and Abrahamic, is, that under the old the law was written on stones, while in the Abrahamic it is written in the heart, and so the spirit styles those under it, "the people in whose heart is my law." Of the believers in Corinth, Paul says—"Ye are an epistle of Christ, ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the Living God; not in tables of stone, but in tables that are hearts of flesh." The Spirit of God, referring to the time when the Abrahamic or new covenant shall be made with both the house of Israel, says—"I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts."

When this new covenant is made with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah, they are to be made one nation, and one king shall be king to them all. He is the prophet like unto Moses, whom the Lord promised to raise up unto them as Moses was the mediator of the old covenant, he is the mediator and high priest of the new covenant, of which the first was but a type. In and through him there is remission of sin for individuals laying hold of the covenant promises; and in and through him there is also remission of sins for the nation when it is brought into the covenant; for we read, "In those days, and in that time saith the Lord, the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none; and the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found." "They shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord, for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more."

Such is the effect of the new covenant written in their mind that they become God's people—a willing people in the day of their anointed one's power. And men shall be blessed in him; all nations shall call him blessed. Blessed be his glorious name forever, and the whole earth shall be filled with his glory. Amen, yea, Amen.—The Truth.

SUBTERRANEAN HISTORY.

In the July number of the North American Review President Bartlett, of Dartmouth College, has an article of great value on the results of subterranean research, which closes as follows:

If we turn from the extra-historic to the early historic races, we find ourselves greatly indebted to explorations beneath the soil for the solid facts of history. When the French artillery officer, Bouchard, in August, 1799, while digging for a redoubt at Rosetta, struck a large stone of black basalt inscribed with Greek, hieroglyphic, and demotic characters, he found the key that was to unlock the history of Egypt and has given the impulse to a remarkable movement of Oriental research. It took fifteen years to make any considerable progress with the hieroglyphics. But the final result is a knowledge of the public, private, social and religious life of Egypt, thousands of years ago, more complete and vivid than that of most intervening periods. This knowledge has come largely, though by no means solely, through subterranean investigations. The papyri have all been taken from the tombs. There also have been found the delineations of daily life in every form. The Apis mausoleum, with its store of statuettes and votive tablets, the fine temple of Edfou, the temple of Abydos with its famous tablet, were all resolved by excavation. Thus too was the full structure of the Sphinx ascertained. The portrait statue of Cephrenes came from the bottom of a temple well, the tablet of Sakkara and the "Sheikh el Beled" from the grave-mounds of Sakkara, the most ancient and life-like statues of Nefert and Rah-hotep, and of Sepa and Nesa, oldest of all, from those of Meydoum, the fine jewelry of Aahhotep from the mummy of that queen. Such is the history of a large part of the instructive Egyptian relics now found in Boulak and the museums of Europe. The spade had just settled it that Tel el Maskhutah was not Rameses, but Pithom, and has dealt the last blow to Brugsch's theory of a northern exodus. Not unreasonably are great expectations turned to the excavations at San, for further light on the mystery of the Hyksos kings, and possibly some traces of Israel; and Mariette Bey has left on record the belief that further knowledge of the first six dynasties must be sought at the foot of the pyramids of Sakkara. Egyptian remains older than the Great Pyramid, still extant in the Sinaitic peninsula, show it to be no absurd supposition that the spade might yet reveal some imperishable relics of Israel around Sinai and Gadis, although nearly three thousand years of Amalekites, Nabathæans, monks and Arabs would have left no vestige above ground. Important questions received some light from the excavations of Wilson and Warren at Jerusalem, and still more important historical and topographical information would probably come from further excavations, were they practicable. We wait impatiently for free admittance to the caves beneath the so-called Tomb of David at Jerusalem, and the Haram at Hebron. The site of Capernaum will be determined only by the spade.

It is almost superfluous to refer to the knowledge of Roman life, history and art thus gained; for we think of Pompeii and Herculaneum, the Roman forums, the Palatine Hill, the baths of Caracalla and Titus, the Roman catacombs, the old church of San Clemente, and the like. From the baths of Caracalla alone came an immense number of works of art, including the Farnese Hercules, Bull and Flora, while the Laocoon came from the Vigna de Fredis, and so on. Raphael resorted to the wall-paintings in the baths of Titus for suggestions in his work upon the Loggie; and to these and similar excavations at Pompeii, the Palatine Hill, the baths of Livia, and elsewhere, are we indebted for all our definite knowledge of classic painting. What we know of the Etruscans comes mostly from their tombs. The indebtedness of Christian archæology to the Roman catacombs is not yet fully written.

But it is in Babylonia and Assyria that we find the most remarkable instance of a well-nigh complete history recovered by excavation. From beneath the mounds of Kouyunjik, Khorsabad, Warka, Mugheir, and elsewhere, we have not only reconstructed in good degree the monarchies and their wars, but have ascertained their religion, art, science, employments, social, commercial and civil life, and the lines and extent of their traffic. We recover, too, a singularly copious and varied literature.

When we follow the indefatigable labors of Schliemann at Hissarlik, Mycenæ and Tiryns, and the still later researches on the Hittite empire, we seem to be rapidly nearing the power of connecting the threads of ancient and lost history into a continuous web. Did our space admit, we might refer to the great number of buried coins that have come to light from innumerable places, some of them to determine critical or disputed points, such as the office of proconsul in Paul's time at Cyprus. For it is noteworthy how these researches are affecting the old authorities. Herodotus, Manetho Ctesias, and most early writers suffer greatly by the contact; Berosus less though we know him but in fragments. The only ancient historical authority that walks in safety down the centuries by the side of all these unexpected disclosures, and is constantly becoming vindicated from hostile criticism, is the sacred Scriptures. While, in all this vast range of research, very few authenticated facts even seem to conflict with those frank narratives, many a new discovery is coming to their confirmation. The old Table of the Nations (Genesis 10) acquires fresh interest and value. A land of Cush (Gen. 2:13), long remanded to Africa alone, is found in Western Asia. The land of Shinar reappears in old Sumir, with its burnt "bricks for stone" and its "pitch for mortar." The life and times of Abraham fall into their proper setting, both in Assyria and in Egypt. The marauding monarchs of the Euphrat in an appearance, and Arioch (Eriaku) dwells in Ellasar or Larsa. Belshazzar also, long lost and even denied to history, comes forth from a buried inscription, and Cyrus declares the capture of Babylon, "without fighting," to have been made on just such a riotous feast-day as the Scripture describes. The whole book of Daniel, notwithstanding one or two remaining difficulties, is found to be so suffused with Babylonian life, customs and institutions, as to make it entirely impracticable, says Dr. W. H. Ward, to bring down the date, as has been attempted, three hundred years. And whereas the book of Judith is thus revealed a sheer invention, the book of Daniel, on its historic side, stands firmer than ever. In Egypt, where Herodotus is found wanting, Genesis steadily gains new confirmation. Von Bohlen, who assailed its historic accuracy fifty years ago, was extinguished in the encounter. And so great an authority as Mr. R. S. Poole has not hesitated to assert, that the effort to reduce the date of these narratives many hundred years is wholly incompatible with their minute conformity to all the circumstances of the age of the Ramessides, and that the late Egyptian discoveries "emphatically call for a reconsideration" of that position. The excavation in the earth will undermine the castle in the air. And so great have been the results attained, and so vast is the range for further research, as almost to inspire the hope that at some future day the work of excavation, supplemented by monumental records, comparative philology, anatomy, and tradition, may lift the veil of mystery that overhangs so much of the past, and give a somewhat coherent history of the dispersions of the human race.—New York Observer.

REMARKS ON THE BIBLE.

It is madness to suppose that we have exhausted the Bible, that there are no more riches in the treasury than we have already brought out, that there are no more precious jewels in the mine that we have brought up to the surface, that we can find nothing new even though we may search again all over the wide, wide field of revelation. Yet this is the supposition maintained, in effect, by those who uphold human creeds, and without alteration or improvement, endeavor to bind them on the consciences of one age after age.

The Bible is an inexhaustible book. It has mines of wealth which will never be worked out. The learned and pious of all the centuries past, since the Book was first completed, have been digging into it and bringing up its precious treasures; yet it is not exhausted. There is never any scarcity of treasure. It never fails to reward the diligent searcher. This book has been the marvel of the ages past; it will be the marvel of the ages to come. There is no book the devil hates so much as the Bible; there is no book the angels and the saints love so much as the Bible.

There is no book now circulated and read so old as the Bible; yet the interest in it, instead of decreasing, is increasing. Though the oldest Book, its truths are ever new; they are ever fresh and inspiring and ennobling. Every lover of the word soon makes this discovery for himself. A convert from heathenism, wishing to obtain a Bible, sought to procure one from the missionary. The missionary said, "I have not a new one that I can give you; I have a second-handed one, but it is old." "O that is nothing," said the heathen convert. "If the book is old, the word is new."

The Bible is a common book. It is not for the learned alone, but for the unlearned; it is not for the rich alone, but for the poor; it is designed for all. Neither pope nor priest has any right to withhold it from any one. It is a treasury where all may gather wealth and gems and pearls. It is an open fountain where all may drink life-giving streams. This grand old Book is designed for all, is suited to all, is adapted to prove a blessing to all. None are so learned but it can instruct them; none are so good but it can make them better; none are so useful but it can increase their usefulness; none are so happy but it can make them happier. Every man therefore should make the Bible his daily study. Every man should make it the rule of his faith. No creed should be allowed to take its place.

But there are some would-be-wise philosophers in our day who think that the Bible has about answered its end; that science has advanced with such rapid steps that it has superceded the Bible; that man's mind and conscience have become so enlightened and educated that he can guide himself into the truth and into the way of righteousness and peace; that man's natural reason is a light more clear, more safe, more certain, and more to be depended upon than the Bible; yet strange to tell all such persons generally land themselves in a fog, in a maze of darkness and error.

Many men of science treat the Bible unfairly; they treat it as beneath their notice. Instead of bestowing upon it a careful examination, and judging honestly of its claims to divine inspiration, they take it for granted that it is just as human as any other book, and to be treated the same as any other ancient writing, and therefore that the witness that Christ bore to the superhuman character of his teaching, was a false witness. They do not show even as much respect to words which claim to be the words of God, as they show to the words of men written and published in their own day. Conjectures, guesses, and inferences of philosophers like themselves have more weight with them than facts recorded in the Sacred Scriptures.

The Bible has a wonderful moral power. It has raised and lifted up nations as no other power could have done. If has changed barbarian tribes into civilized people. It has converted warlike tribes into peaceful citizens. It has turned idolaters into worshipers of the true God. It has transformed man, wicked as demons, into saints, holy ones, children of the Most High.

The greatest blessing that a nation can possess is the free circulation of the Scriptures. From this source of blessing an incalculable amount of good may be expected. Crime will be diminished; law and order will be more generally observed; life and property will be safer; political economy will be improved; prosperity will increase; and justice and freedom and peace will more abound.—Elias Hens in World's Crisis.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the doctrine "that God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." And means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

MICA-PEN NOTES.

In some things our beloved Peter manifested infirmity, in many others, he was faithful and noble. He truly and grandly said to his Master, "Thou art the Son of the living God." It was an utterance from the heart of an honest man who had clear and deep conviction, who had that sacred interior sense of the Divine greatness of Jesus, that in the declaration was the very soul of faith and loyalty. Often and often, as Peter looked on his sovereign beloved, he felt the blessed truth like a lance of light, enter with new power into his heart,—"This is the Christ—this is Immanuel—God with us,—this is the Prince of life, the treasure of heaven on earth, the Son of the Highest, the King of Israel." The knowledge of this did not make Peter immortal, it did not save him from all errors, or prevent those evolutions and discoveries of human weakness, which served in the end, to give him strength through faith, by the knowledge of dependence. But it was a conviction by the spirit of God, that the leader of that twelve, was truly high-born, God-given, and Divinely begotten. The truth deepened in the disciple's mind, through the eye that saw, the ear that heard, and through the charm of unerringly educating association. Peter noted the nobility of Christ, in a certain cast of countenance, in the gravity, the gentleness, the knowledge, the innocence, in an unutterable simple superiority of bearing and manner, always suggesting depth and heights, and something out of sight, grave and fascinating in the mystery of concealment. "Flesh and blood," alone could not fasten the conviction of Divinity, as Peter felt it. Perceptions inherent in, or arising out of his humanity, his natural observation of qualities and character were not enough. Carnal and animal man, however shrewd, would not acquire Peter's assurance, without a spirit-ray from the Father's light. A man must be enlightened by God, to know that in the humble man they journeyed with, was the elect of God, and his only begotten. Divine light shows Divine Son-ship, and God gives the conviction as to that which comes from God. As to this, may the Lord of grace give me a place side by side with Peter. May I have not one whit less frankness of confession—deathless truth of conviction, and immovable comfort of consciousness. I would as soon doubt that God made the heavens, as that he is the Father of our Lord Jesus. Strike out this corner stone from the foundation of our temple of truth, and all is ready to fall. Let us desire companionship with Peter in the great confession, and thou, guileless Israelite, Nathaniel, I love thee, for thy note of testimony, harmonious with Peter's, and thou, intrepid and loyal John, I am thy brother in this, that to me, the begottal of Jesus by the Holy Spirit, is a very gate of heaven. Therein is the sweetness and greatness of the heavenly grace.

Is there one chapter of sacred glory, of stainless spotless awfulness, of purity and majesty and power, it is that very chapter wherein comes to us the knowledge of the umbrage of Deity over the elect daughter of David. Every least thought of aught, or all but most grateful reverence, be forever gone, and as far from the mind as the poles of heaven asunder. There, we stand with devoutest heart and purest imagination, crying "Holy is the Lord God Almighty." And, in thee, O faultless Jesus, we see the form of the very begotten of God, yea, the Lamb of God has thy unerring stamp of God; and before him, let darkness keep silence, till the knowledge of Jesus, being, is so wrought and begotten within, that the faith inexpressible begs the boon of confession.

Why multiply Scripture citations? it is too unnecessary. They are like the great mountains. Count them. They are like Ben Lomond, Ben Nevis, Ben Attow. They are like Simplon and Bernardin, like Ararat and Choumalaris. Why there is the thunderer in the wilderness, hear him. "The only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared," the uncreated Almighty God. John saw and knew the precious miracle, and we have thus a John on either hand, saying the same thing. I look with affection on the Jordan-side preacher. Tell me, O thou who hast the tongue of the learned, if thou art now with us, with what a noiseless force conviction flashed into the immerser's soul, as he looked on that new comer from Nazareth! With what fascination and conviction and joy, he marked him as the Lamb of God, for had he not seen the dove come to the lamb? The spirit, gentle aerial flame, came to crown its own. And let me look with John, again and again, and see the wonderful, in the form of a servant, but having in his face, his bearing, and in something beyond all the power of language to express, the stamp and quality of God. Herein is our joy. Here is our open secret, here is our loyal confidence. Here is our gold-ledge of riches in the sunshine, Jesus is of God, aye, every whit, that he is; true-born, high-born, pure, immutable, divinely-begotten, fixed in pedigree, of blood royal, for by the blood of a king is lost Adam redeemed. As God said "let light be, and it was," in the beginning—and so he said again, when the word became flesh, and the star came and stood over the recess in the rock, where the light of the world was born. It is to me joy to know and confess that Christ in every syllable and iota, what he said he was. And though earth were a wilderness without beauty, it were a joy and an honor to live, to bear witness to this, that the Son of man, is royal by birth, and that in him the sea of glorious grace, is connected by the strait of true divine lineage, with the bottomless ocean of infinity.

Peter, Peter! though we see thee not, since thou art sleeping, we take up thy tribute an eighteen centuries and a half, after thy day, and say with thee and say well, and say in the spirit and with understanding, thy Lord and our Lord is forever and indelibly and irrepealably stamped with the sign and mark of birth and being from the Eternal Maker of all things. And thou Philip, if thou wilt but wake a moment, and we ask thee of the sweet accent of thy soul, wilt thou not confirm recording brother John, who gave us thy position of nine words, nay of only five—"Lord, show us the Father." And what said Jesus? Ah.—What said he? "Have I been so long time, with you, Philip"—(a matter of forty months or so,—blessed and wonderful months,) and thou hast not known me?" What answer is coming now? "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father,"—for the perfect Son is the perfect transcript of the perfect Father, the express image, the copy, the counterpart, the vital verisimilitude, the reproduction in kind, saving and only that the glory is for a moment veiled in flesh, and immortality reserved till the resurrection. O, the power and unmistakableness of the testimony! There, Philip, sleep on now, and in the tomorrow, that is quickly coming, thou wilt shine in the likeness of the Divine, for thou wilt glow in the light of those eyes that are like a flame of fire, and they are the eyes of him that looked on thee kindly in Jerusalem, and of whom John says, that he that spoke to the Thyatirian church, was the Son of God.

In that same Jerusalem, (with the air ever redolent with some stray fragrance of sacrifice,) are restless Jews standing with stones in their hands, and looks of menace,—and near them and with them is the blessed stranger and pilgrim, the marvellous teacher. How now? By what incongruity or impiness, stand thus these Jews, in impatient audience of the innocent one whom God sent? "For what good work stone ye me?" he asked. "We stone thee for blasphemy" they said. "Thou art but man—thou makest thyself God." "Do ye say I blaspheme because I say I saw the Son of God, and since the Father sent me to you, and I am anointed and devoted for his work, and do it by virtue of our mutual indwelling, do ye say I blaspheme?" What say we listeners to this conversation, down in another age, with twice a thousand years almost elapsed? What says love, what says faith, what says intelligent assurance,—instructed loyalty. I will tell you what they all say. They say, "beloved, this is no matter of doubt, none of controversy or opinion. It is settled, as the foundation of a mountain chain is settled. In the tribute to thy born nobility and nobleness we most heartily and lovingly join. It is our joy to join in the song of praise, that thy head is radiant with divine glory, that thy hands and thy feet, once pierced with iron, are the hands and feet of a born King and Son. Love hastens to echo back and glorify the word. Through two thousand years, like listening we send to thee, Amen,—that thou sprangest from the Eternal, as any precious shoot springs from its parent precious seed. We stand around thee, with hearts burning to know thee better. O, thou beloved, who didst carry thine own cross, as Isaac carried his faggots. Did the Jews take stones to hurl at thee? When thou givest us crowns, we will hold them in our hands, that we may cast them at thy feet, and our hearts' love and honor in them."

(Note in a parenthesis.—That Jesus Christ is say thing less than born of God—is to me no more than a straw effigy. But if it were to be treated as some pale corse, awfully galvanized into a semblance of entity, or into a counterfeit of life—I would say, let us let it alone. But if there be any need we will rewrap it in its mouldy shroud, and let it down into the dust and darkness. If there be need, throw gravel on it, and make the earth either once and forevermore level, or let loam and pebbles yawn, for the only token of the night-mare life it ever had. The will-o'-the-wisp may dance over it at midnight. But the sons of God, sons by spirit union with Jesus Christ, may well be glad that the doctrine of our Lord, like himself has its peak in the everlasting sunshine of glory and of God.)

Ah! it is well worth remembering, how in Scripture there is a uniform fact that faith in this beloved is put as faith, not in the Son of man, distinctively, but as the Son God. To this height do we ever haste to raise him, or rather from it do we ever refuse to lower him, refuse by instinct, by loyalty. Our honor is in his honor, our life is in his life, our everlasting highest hope in his unsullied, undisputed, undoubted pre-eminence. Young man born blind, on whose sensorium light had never printed a color or a form—when Jesus hath anointed thee with the unction of hope from his own mouth, and thou has come back astonished and happy from Siloam, what sayest thou; now, enlightened Jerusalem lad? Thy heavenly healer has found thee, after the church people thrust thee from their circle, and when he has found thee, he has seen thee laughing in thy heart for joy of thy coming into sunshine, (and the joy and faith had made thee fearless of angry Jewish catechisms,) what sayest thou, boy? The beloved will ask thee a question. "Dost thou believe on the Son of God?" And thy heart is not a stone, nor thine ear a senseless void. The query is on thy tongue by the next clock-tick or heart beat. "Who is he?" The question is in thy very new seeing eyes, and O, happy thou, that with thy God-given sight, thou canst see the best of all men, and on thy nerve and brain, canst have the face of the king set as a type, or a printer's form. Jesus said, "I am he. You see him, you hear him, he talks with you." And as thy spirit is brave and buoyant, so is thy heart loyal, and thy confession ready. For I doubt not, whatever thou speakest vocally, thine eyes, thy face, thy look, thy manner, thy attitude, thine action, all say. "It is so, it is so. I know it. A man of God has done it. The Son of God! I believe it. I believe him. It is he." But I must conclude this mere preface to an easy volume of proof. Proof did I say? Do the Sierras need praying, Sierra Madre, Sierra Nevada, Sierra Morena? The glittering ice-peaks bathe in blue, and who shall harangue a group of travelers gazing at their majesty, and count their homage with useless conquetries of speech? Their power and state need no poor pleading of any counsellor down in the valleys.

O, come with me, all souls aglow, and "praise and magnify the Lord forever." Or if vocal motions, and phrases of speech are tame, come then and let us sit down as Mary did, and there in sacred silence, with eyes riveted on our great redeeming Chief, our first and foremost, dwell in the very presence of God, for the Father dwells in the Son. The fulness of God is in Christ. So it is, must and will be forever.

C. COLEBROOK.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD.

These are the closing words of Rom. xv. 11, and separating them from the context, they will lead us into the subject of the resurrection from among the dead ones. Which is a subject of great importance. It was a grand topic in Paul's preaching, for he preached "Jesus and the resurrection" to both Jew and Gentile. And the whole of 1 Cor. xv. is devoted to that subject. He there shows that immortality depends upon the resurrection of the dead, or a change at the coming of Jesus the Christ. Yea, Scripture after Scripture shows the importance of this subject.

But by the context we see that Paul's subject here is: the resurrection of Israel. In verse 1, he says, "Hath God cast away his people? God forbid." He then shows who God's people in this case are. "For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew." In verse 11 we read, "I say then, have they stumbled that they should fall? God forbid: but rather through their fall (trespass) salvation is come unto the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy. (Verse 12). Now if the fall (trespass) of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them, the riches of the Gentiles: how much more their fulness? (Verse 15). For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead."

The Israelite. How repulsive to the Gentile. The Jew, we look upon him with disdain, we say of him: He is a cheat, away with him; we have no use for him. Well did Moses say to them, "And thou shalt become an astonishment, a proverb, and a byword, among all nations." Deut. xxviii. 37. Here we have God's people, the people whom God foreknew, who once formed a kingdom. Over whom Saul reigned king, afterward David, then Solomon. It was one nation, it was the kingdom of God, or, kingdom of Israel.

After the reign of King Solomon it was divided into two kingdoms, known as the kingdom of Israel, and the kingdom of Judah: and after twenty kings had reigned in succession the kingdom of Israel passed away, and became lost to men. But God says to them through the holy prophet, "Mine eyes are upon all their ways." Jer. xvi. 17.

Twenty kings also reigned in succession over the kingdom of Judah: till Zedekiah the last king was taken captive by the Babylonian army, and they "put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon." 1 Kings xxv. 7.

Here the kingdom of Judah is led into captivity, till the end of the seventy years, and Cyrus by command of the Lord, released them, and built the temple again in Jerusalem, but no longer did they have a king of their own flesh, still they retained their nationality and their worship, until Christ came, and their leaders said, "This is the heir: come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance." Matt. xxi. 38. So Jesus said to them, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate." Ch. xxiii. 38. It was not long after (about the year seventy), when their house was laid waste, their capital destroyed, and the inhabitants scattered, and buried in the nations of the earth, and from that time on, they have been politically dead, and in Hades they lift up their eyes being in torments, and see Lazarus (the Gentiles) in Abraham's bosom. So because of unbelief these natural branches were cut off from the true Olive tree, that the wild (Gentile) branches might be grafted in, and in this way salvation is come unto the Gentiles. Now if the diminishing of this people, is the riches of the Gentiles, what shall their fullness be? And if the casting away of them is the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?

Thus we see that the rich man's time in hades is limited; he will come forth from his political death state, and become a prominent factor in the blessing of the world. For God spake before unto Abraham and said, "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee, and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." Gen. xii. 2-3. "Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him." Ch. xviii. 18. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice. Ch. xxii. 18.

"And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south: and in thee, and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." ch. xxviii. 14.

Now Paul says, "To Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many, but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ.... And if ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Gal. iii. 16, 29.

So when the Israelites had filled their cup of iniquity to the full, God then visited "the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name." Acts xv. 14.

Therefore, if by the transgression of the Israelites, the Gentile world is elevated to the embrace of Abraham, what will the result be when they shall be restored from their political death, to their political life again.

God will restore this people and again make of them a nation through which the nations of the earth will receive a capital blessing. "In that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign for the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek, and his rest shall be glorious. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the Islands of the Sea. And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth." Isa. xi. 10-12. "Therefore, behold the days come, saith the Lord, that it shall no more be said, The Lord liveth, that brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt. But the Lord liveth that brought the children of Israel from the land of the north, and from all the lands whether he had driven them: and I will bring them again into the land that I gave unto their fathers." Jer. xvi. 14, 16.

Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is his name whereby he shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness. Therefore, behold the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth, which brought up the children of Israel out the land of Egypt. But, the Lord liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them, and they shall dwell in their own land." ch. xxiii. 5-8. "For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out from all countries, and will bring you into your own land." Ezek. xxxvi. 24.

In Ezek. xxxvii. in that parabolical vision of the valley of dry bones, these people are set forth as dead: and the question arises, "can these bones live?" The answer is, "O Lord God, thou knowest." Ezekiel was told to "prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord." The prophet observed in that vision "a noise," and "a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone," and sinews, and flesh and skin came upon them, yet they had no new life, but after that, "the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army."

Now the elucidation of the whole matter is, "these bones are the whole house of Israel. Behold, they say, Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost; we are cut off for our parts." verse 11. "Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as one that cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth." Psa. xxii. 7.

So these people are dead, not literally dead, they are buried in the nations of the earth, but not literally buried, they are politically dead, and politically buried. "Have they stumbled that they should fall? (forever) God forbid." For we read, "Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel." For, "There shall be a highway for the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria: like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt." Isa. xi. 16. "And a highway shall be there.... And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." ch. xxxv. 8-10.

Now God says, "Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel." Ezek. xxxvii. 12. So when they shall have come up from their grave, (the nations of the earth,) God says, "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean, from your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit.... I will put my spirit within you, and cause you to walk in in my statutes," etc. Ezek. xxvi. 25-27.

Moreover, as the stick of Joseph, and the stick of Judah become one; so shall the nation of Israel and the nation of Judah become one nation again; and they shall not "be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. And one king shall reign over them, and God will make a covenant of peace with them, an everlasting covenant; and multiply them, and set his tabernacle in their midst, and will be their God: then the heathen shall know that the Lord is God.

Therefore it is that Paul said to the Romans, also for our sakes, "I would not brethren, have you ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins. As concerning the gospel, they are enemies for your sake; but as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sake. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." Rom. xi. 25-29. So in Abraham and in his seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed. This is God's plan; so he will give new life to the new dead nation, and they shall live, and become leading factors in fulfilling the promises of God. We can therefore rejoice with the heavenly host, and say, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." Luke ii. 14.

"CONVERTED TO THE CHURCH."

The season of camp-meetings is now about closing and the several managers are sending their reports to the papers. As usual they all claim a grand advance and an utter rout of the enemy.

The success in some cases was not so much in making converts as in raising funds, or pledges, would perhaps be a better way to put it.

One camp manager reports that a number have been "converted to the church." This does really appear to be the chief aim of—well I may say all the Church people with whom I am acquainted. I should in justice however state that I know a few exceptions. I do know a few names like those mentioned in Rev. iii. 4. Men who love the truth above everything else, but alas, they are but a "little flock."

"Converted to the Church." What is it? Who will explain just what it means? Is it to open your mouth and shut your eyes? Is it to receive, endorse, all that the Church teaches, whether in harmony or not, with the inspired Word? Is it to surrender the God-given privilege of seeking to know the truth for yourself without contract, and without prejudice to one's status in the Church? Yes, it means all that and more. A man who is soundly "converted to the church" will not object to sing the poem "O to be nothing, nothing, one." of course not. He is nothing, his personality is gone. And he is glad of it. He has nothing now to bother him, his reading and thinking and planning is now taken off his hands, he is like those persons who secured a substitute during the late war, he is not bothering his head about the meaning of this or that part of Scripture. He sleeps in his pew and he pays for it, and what has he to fear? The pastor calls on him regular, goes fishing with him, talks over business, new methods, etc. But never once annoys him with Scripture questions. The convert to the church interprets all this as a token of the utmost confidence and of course he is happy.

How different the man who has been converted to the truth as it is in Jesus—as taught by our Lord Jesus. He too has made a surrender, but it is to his Lord, he receives orders direct from him, he is looking unto him, he is following him, he has ceased from man; whose breath is in his nostrils, he searches the word for himself. He thinks for himself, and acts for himself. One is his master even God, and men he regards as his brethren, nothing more, he recognizes no human master in sacred things. The truth has made him free. Pat White during Lent asked if he might eat another egg; the boarding mistress inquired, "how many have you ate now, Pat;" he answered in a pitiful tone, "never a one but two." "Well" said she, "that's enough, this is holy Thursday," that settled it, Pat White was converted to the church, was owned by the church. All the churches, I had like to say love "timber" converts like Pat White.

Ah, do you doubt it? well I don't. A man converted to the truth, such as I have here described, will be let severely alone unless he is a substantial contributor to the Sexton's salary, and other incidentals. A private Christian who claims equality with the "officers" of the church, if poor, will be regarded as a troubler of Israel, and if the Ahabs don't find out some way of spiking him, Jezebel will. If he stands his ground it will be a miracle.

Yes, "Converts to the church" are what are wanted now. It has become just now a very expensive luxury, namely; a fashionable church establishment. Not only the sexton wants a salary, but the singers now won't sing God's praises unless they are paid for it. I mean in the fashionable houses. And the parsons can't live like John the Baptist. They are all willing to run the risk of the rich man in the parable, and have a good time of it here. A person's wife wanted some time ago to pay me a small claim by installments. She said her husband only got $1000, a year for preaching.

The people here seared go what I am here trying to expose. The poor here forsook to a great extent most of the churches. They meet with a cold reception there as a rule.

Last Sunday I spoke to an earnest company of listeners down on the steam-boat wharf. I don't believe I converted any of them to the church. I do hope though that I helped some of them to a right understanding of the truth. This is what mankind need every where. This is life eternal, to know thee the One living and true God, and Jesus the Christ whom thou hast sent. This is better than to be "converted to the church."

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, September 9, 1885.

OUR readers will be made sad to learn that Bro. A. B. Magruder is numbered among the dead. As a writer of remarkable ability he had endeared himself to the readers of THE RESTITUTION. His communications were weighty, instructive, unambiguous, and always to the point. While for these traits he might, to some extent, have been indebted to his legal training, there was, nevertheless, an intellectuality, that, like the gem, shone amid these adventitious surroundings. His correspondence was by no means limited to THE RESTITUTION. Many articles from his prolific pen found a welcome place in other religious and scientific journals both at home and abroad. Among the talented writers for the Rainbow our departed brother held a conspicuous place. But his work is done and his record is on high. He now sleeps awaiting the Life-Giver's advent and the victor's crown.

S. LAING, a member of the Parliament of Great Britain, says, "There are, approximately, 3,600 millions of deaths of human beings in every century, of whom at least 20 per cent., or 720 millions, die before they have attained to clear self-consciousness and conscience. What becomes of them? Why were they born? Are they nature's failures, and cast as rubbish to the void?"

Alas what a dark picture is presented to every thoughtful mind in contemplating humanity in all the depths of its woful destiny. It was, however, a world in its ruin that God loved. It was for just such a lost world that Christ, the Son of God, died. Can it be that the gospel, as now preached, is only a sparso-evayyelion, a proto-evangelium, a primal-evangel? What will the evayyelion aiwvrion, the aionian gospel, i. e., gospel of the age—the coming age—accomplish? Rev. xiv. 6. How absurdly has this expression been rendered—"Everlasting gospel" in the Common Version, and "Eternal gospel" by the Revised. What conception can the human mind form of an everlasting or eternal gospel? A gospel adapted to an age or dispensation is conceivable, while an eternal gospel is a self-contradictory expression* The gospel, as preached in this age, is designed to take out from the Gentiles a people for God's name. Acts xv. 14. After the Bride of Christ is selected and glorified, we ask again, what will be accomplished by the aionian gospel? Is it not proclaimed that a certain residue of men—Acts xv. 17—might seek the Lord? Whether this be so or not, let us preach an evangel to the world now, and not preach or write a gospel (?) of reprobation. Such a gospel, as, that Christ died only for a few, does not harmonize either with the great commission or with apostolic teaching. "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again." 2 Cor. v. 14, 15.

*What an empty conceit it is to apply this proclamation to the advent message of 1843 and 1844. A two-year's message—an eternal gospel! Age-gospel fits no better. And the message one grand mistake as to time. The mere statement is a sufficient confutation.

The Air's Electricity.

Prof. Palmieri, of the Vesuvian Observatory, finds that the atmospheric electricity is usually positive in clear weather; if negative, a fall of rain may be inferred to be in progress at some little distance. Two maxima and two minima daily are noticed in the electric indications, this periodicity being disturbed by atmospheric movements. With dew, rain or an overcast sky the indications increase in intensity, and are stronger in spring and autumn than in summer and winter. A rain zone is positive, but is surrounded by a negative zone, which in turn is surrounded by a zone of positive electricity. Thunder and lightning, according to this observer, do not occur without rain.

How to Walk for Exercise.

If walking alone is adopted as the means to counteract the effect of too much sitting, then care should be taken that system enters into the walk. A slow, desultory sort of walk is of no earthly use; it simply tires one without any beneficial result. The walking should be brisk, with the head up and the chest thrown forward. The breathing should be regular and as free as the swing of the limbs. The distance is optional, of course, but two miles ought to be no task for the man who wants to improve his health. The distance can be increased as the pedestrian begins to feel the benefit of the walking.—New York Star.

Selections.

ASSYRIAN INSCRIPTIONS IN THE WOLFE COLLECTION.

Among the inscribed Babylonian and Assyrian documents brought home by the Wolfe Exploring Party, are specimens of most of the varieties of such writings, historical, grammatical, mathematical, commercial, and ritual documents. As in the case in all such collections, some of the documents are of baked clay, and some unbaked, the latter having suffered most injury. There are hundreds of fragments, and scores of whole tablets, some of which are wonderfully preserved, looking as fresh after nearly twenty-five centuries as if they were made but yesterday.

In the Babylonian-Assyrian history there are periods which are very fully known. Over others hangs the veil of darkness. One always hopes for new light on coming into possession of new tablets, especially on the period preceding and following the Sargonidæ, before 722 and after 606 B. C., the times of the Shalmanesers, Tiglathpileser, Nebuchadnezzar, and his successors. The collection has historical cylinders and fragments from four kings, two Assyrian, Sennacherib (705-681, B. C.), and his grandson, Assurbanipal (668-626? B. C.), and two Babylonian, Nebuchadnezzar (604-561, B. C.), and Nabonidus (555-538, B. C.). It is not unlikely that close examination of the fragments may reveal the presence of other historical documents.

The bit from the reign of Sennacherib contains parts of several lines and belonged to a document which recorded this king's campaign against Hezekiah, that wonderful narrative so similar to the account given in the Old Testament. The fragment contains nothing new, but if we had the whole, we should perhaps obtain interesting variants to the versions on documents in the British Museum collection. There is a small cylinder apparently from Assurbanipal (Sardanapalus). The name is broken off, but it was either son or grandson of Sennacherib, the latter king's name being preserved. Undoubtedly from an Assurbanipal cylinder is a small bit containing parts of two lines with the mention of Assurbanipal's appointing his brother as governor of Babylon, and parallel to two lines in a cylinder already published (W. A. I. v 62, 11, 12). This is a cylinder from Sippar containing an account of the restoration of the temple of the Sungod at that place (cf. 2 Kings xvii. 31) and a prayer for himself and his brother, whom he had appointed governor at Babylon "in order that the strong might not injure the weak (ashshu dannu ana inshi la khabali).

From Nebuchadnezzar, the second of this name, the King of Babylonian Exile, there is part of a large cylinder, well preserved, containing the beginnings of forty lines of inscription. The cylinder had, perhaps, originally two columns, in which case there would have been eighty lines. Like nearly all of this monarch's inscriptions, the cylinder is occupied with his building operations. Special interest attaches to the mention of one of Babylon's gates called sirihi mashakki tlani i. e. "entrance of the mashakki of the gods." This passage is connected in an interesting way with one on an Assurbanipal prison, from which we learn that there was at Nineveh also a great gate called sirih mashaniti ariati (W. A. I. v. 9, 110), a name evidently given in imitation of the great gate at Babylon, so closely did the colony copy the mother city. There are three small Nebuchadnezzar cylinders, all containing the same inscription, and all being of a kind which the king caused to be prepared in large numbers. Already there are two of these cylinders in the Metropolitan Museum in New York. Each contains two columns of writing, and records the restoration of a temple at Babylon for a goddess, who is described as the "exalted lady," the "merciful mother." The chief item of the prayer at the close is for numerous offspring, the wish being expressed in several different ways. Alas! that we have not yet recovered Nebuchadnezzar's annals. They still await the spade of the archæologist, and will certainly cast much light on one of the most important periods of Jewish history. Let us hope that American liberality and American industry may make the discovery.

From Nabonidus the collection contains almost entire the third column of a cylinder parallel to that published in W. A. I. v. 64. This is the cylinder recording restorations of temples in Harran and Sippar (the Sippar temple being the same one that Assurbanipal had previously restored), and ascribing the original construction of the second building to Naram-Sin, three thousand two hundred years previously. (My Assyrian Manual, to be issued soon, will contain this cylinder in full, transliterated, as well as that of Assurbanipal.) The date, having been at the end of column two, is broken off in the fragment. There are many variants in spelling to the published form, but no variants in meaning. Next to Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus is for biblical students the most interesting Babylonian king, because he was the last native ruler of Babylon, and because under him the Jews lived during the last years of the Captivity. Elsewhere, we have preserved a prayer of his for his son, Bel-shar-uzur (Belshazzar). In the cylinder of which the fragment was a part, Nabonidus mentions the subjection of the Medes by Cyrus, as a divine judgment for defaming a temple; and Cyrus, in an inscription written in Babylonian, records the capture of Nabonidus as a divine judgment for neglect of the worship of Marduk (Merodach). But like his great predecessors, Nabonidus was first of all a builder, and his military annals are yet to be discovered.—D. G. Lyon, D. D. in N. Y. Independent.

Philadelphos asks, "If those who deny the premillennial advent, or refuse to search into it, come under the head of those who despise the hope set before them? and may not many very good Christians thus lose part in the millennial kingdom, though they are saved in the judgment of the great white throne?"

To this twofold question we would reply,

1. That indifference to any truth revealed by God betrays a wrong state of mind in the Christian. Indeed, in any sphere of knowledge, indifference to what it teaches is unworthy of the intelligent creature. Hence real philosophy (the love of wisdom) has been defined as a sort of home-sickness. The aspirant would be at home everywhere. Yea, the Lord Jesus teaches his disciples that not merely his pregnant sayings, but "all things" in the universe constitute the lesson book of the Holy Ghost, wherefrom to enlighten the Church.

"He shall glorify me, for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. All things that the Father hath [thus the universe is comprised] are mine; therefore said I that he shall take of mine and shall show it unto you." John xvi. 14-15.

And it is further observable that the blessed Lord, in inviting to his bosom of rest "all who labor and are heavy laden,"—every thirsting spirit of man—predicates of himself that into his hands, as the Revealer of the Father, "all things are delivered" Matt. xi. 27-29, implying that from every humble exploration of nature, as well as of grace, soothing comfort may be derived.

That all knowledge is not of the same relative importance is of course to be admitted; but nothing extant in God's word or works is without its use, and when this is denied or demurred to by either the man of science or the Christian, God is so far dishonored. What he has thought fit to create or to record, it is for us to search into, as means and opportunity are afforded to us.

Now herein reproach attaches to numerous Christians, even in Protestant England. For while they [profess to honor the Bible as the inspired revelation from God, and have [accordingly combined to translate it (the whole book) into so many languages, they practically decry the greater part of its contents as unprofitable by foregoing its study,—even discountenancing it. For example, unfulfilled prophecy, with which the greater part of the sacred volume is taken up—every strain inaugurating the coming in glory of Israel's [Messiah, the Head of the Church. This large continent of Scripture is comparatively neglected by the mass of Christian people.

They believe, we doubt not, in the Lord Jesus as their only and all-sufficient Savior, and thus they are reconciled to God—his children. But they are content to regard salvation as simply their own personal redemption, so far as even the future is concerned, and they realize not that, in the full sense of the word, as God is fellowship with their Father in heaven; his "thoughts and ways," as regards the destiny of the earth which "he has given to the children of men," being quite ignored!

Surely we may say, then, that such Christians must "suffer loss" in their communion with God. For there is a lack in them of the material wherein that communion subsists. He would take them into his holy, sanctifying confidence, and they hold back. On the other hand, if they blindly accept the mere traditions of men as to a converted world before the Lord comes; then the charge of compromised communion with God becomes aggravated, in that their hopes flow in a counter direction to his purposes.

All this spiritual loss and mischief they undergo at present, and when their Lord appears according to the true order of events, how can they fail to be ashamed before him at his coming.

But 2. That if they are really his—born again, quickened into unity of life with him as their risen head "members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones;" that, if such be their relation to him, they will not forfeit instalment into his promised glory, may not be doubted. True, they will not have expatiated as they ought to have done in the enjoyment of their "high above calling," they will not have drunk into that intelligent sympathy which was their portion as friends of earth's ordained though rejected King, and, as the consequence, in their career of discipleship, they cannot have been the alert witnesses for him with which the intoxicated and drowsy world around them, beloved to be confronted; in fact, as the Apostle deprecates, they will not be "watchful" as became "the children of the day," and will have been betrayed into comparative indolence and sleep. But he is faithful that promised, and as he has actually declared that he died for them, in such absolute, irrevocable love, that whether they watch or sleep, "they may live together with him," so when he, their living head, shall at last appear, they also shall appear with him in glory. Marvellous exhibition of grace! Only it is like him. For let us remember how he dealt with the failure of his disciples, even the favored ones, in the garden. They were called by their blessed Master to "watch with him" in his approaching agonies, but alas! their eyes were heavy, and they watched not, but slept; so that his reproachful word was elicited, "Could ye not watch with me one hour?" Yet for them he presently died, and owned them as brethren at his resurrection and ascension!

After this manner, we apprehend, the Lots of the Church, in comparison with the Abrahams,—the friends of God,—will be shamed by their returning and immutably-loving Lord. Would that the past suffered for the indolent sleep of such members of the Church, and that they would wake up even now to respond with becoming emotion to the longing desire with which he appeals to them for reciprocating sympathy!

The remarkable text in 1 Thess. v., which we have just quoted, is generally interpreted, we are aware, of the quick and dead in Christ, at his coming. But this is a mistake, as will be at once recognized on turning to the Greek—the true rendering of the word translated "wake" being watch, the very rendering given to it in the context, "Let us watch, and be sober;" and the word "sleep," to which it is opposed, being that constantly employed to expressed literal sleep (in the context also), and in contrast with death; e. g., "She is not dead, but sleepeth." Luke viii. 52.

3. If this view commend not itself to our readers, it may be because of the impression that the parable of the Ten Virgins, the Wedding Garment, the Talents, etc., and the scenes of tribulation and antichristian persecution rehearsed in the Apocalypse, relate to believers under this dispensation. But the hope to which these and other like Scriptures point is, strictly, not the Lord's coming into the air for his Church, but his coming with them to the earth; and the saints whose loyalty is to be exercised in the interval,—a period of some duration,—will be Jewish ones, principally also in the land.

That after various demonstrations of the advent of the Great Deliverer, —the Bridegroom of the daughter of Zion,—many of these shall fail in the trial, and so be excluded from the glorious festivity of the marriage of the Lamb, and otherwise suffer, may be well conceived even as it is foretold. But whatever be the useful application of the Divine warnings bearing on that crisis, the interpretation belongs not to the parenthetic dispensation of the Church.

Perhaps these thoughts will become more vigorous in the soil of other minds, and so we throw them out for their consideration.—Rainbow.

Dr. B. W. Richardson, the well-known scientist, has given some interesting estimates of the value of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors. He says that in a population of 25,000,000, it would save more than 200,000 lives per year. According to this ratio, total abstinence would save in the United States, counting our population 60,000,000, more than 320,000 lives annually; or, to put it in another form, the use of such liquors costs this country over 320,000 lives per year, or 876 per day.

THE REVISED BIBLES.

Practically the two University Presses are supplying the whole English-speaking world with Revised Bibles, and the work, it need hardly be said, has been a gigantic one. As regards Oxford, the manufacture of Bibles involves a great deal more than printing and binding. The Clarendon Press makes its own paper, casts its own type, does its own electrotyping, repairs its own machinery, makes its own ink, and even the materials of which the ink is made are manufactured on the premises. It has a large bookbinding establishment in Aldersgate street, London; and at Amen Corner, Paternoster Row, it does its own publishing.

The paper on which all the Oxford Bibles are printed is made at the University's own mill at Wolvercote. Oxford Bible paper is a specialty. There is a great deal of print in the Old and New Testaments, and unless great care were taken the volumes would be thick and "podgy." The thinnest paper that can possibly be made opaque is the desideratum, and rags only are used at Wolvercote. Old sailcloths, being made of linen, are in great request here, and they enter into the composition more or less of all the paper used in Oxford Bibles. There are huge piles of this old material gathered in here after battling with breezes in all the seas under heaven. They come in here to be torn into shreds, and beaten into pulp, and bleached, drawn out into beautiful white sheets, to be presently printed on, wafted off again to all the ends of the earth—certainly rather a quaint and curious metamorphosis. The paper made here, as we shall presently see, is not exclusively used for Bibles, but for this year's issue up to the present time more than three hundred tons of paper has been turned out, and of this no less than one hundred and twenty tons of a specially thin description has been consumed in the printing of the smallest sized edition. Altogether not less than four hundred and fifty tons of rags must have been consumed in manufacturing the necessary paper for the new Bibles. It has been reckoned that the paper would cover about two and a half square miles. Laid out in a strip six inches wide it would more than go round the world. The sheets piled up in reams as they come from the mill would make a column ten or twelve times the height of St. Paul's Cathedral; and if they were stacked up after folding into books, but without binding, the pile would tower to more than a hundred times the height of the Cathedral. The completed copies turned out by Oxford alone, if piled up flat, one upon another, would make a pillar some seventeen miles high, and if piled on end they would rise to the height of something over 2,000 times the height of the monument.—Leisure Hour.

The Great Rains in China.

WASHINGTON August 26.—Details of the destruction in Canton, China, and its vicinity by the recent great rain storm there have been received in this city. The flood was the most serious which has visited Canton in thirty years. More than 10,000 persons lost their lives, and a far greater number are left in a starving condition. Entire villages were engulfed and the rice and silk crops in the vicinity were almost ruined. The price of rice has been raised 18 per cent, in consequence of the loss of the crop. The walls of the latter part of June, flooded and overflowing all the rivers. Many of the streets of Canton were flooded for over a week. At Sz Ni City the water broke through the city wall. It is reported that several thousand people were drowned in that place. The embankments of the rivers were broken in numerous places, and the water swept across the surrounding country, carrying everything before it. A foreigner who was an eye-witness of the scenes of the devastation reports that one night the boat he occupied was anchored near a bamboo grove. By morning the water had risen to the tops of the bamboos. At other points it rose as high as forty feet during the night-time. The inhabitants fled from the villages to the hillsides. At Kun Is, a market-place near an embankment of one of the streams connected with the river which brings water from the North and West rivers, the majority of the inhabitants were drowned by the water breaking through the embankment. Some escaped to a piece of rising ground in the neighborhood, but the waters continued to rise and gradually overtopped the elevation, drowning those who stood upon it. Seventeen Chinese graduates in Canton hearing of the distress and suffering prevalent in their native villages, took passage on a boat with a view to proceeding home to render what assistance they could. On the way the boat was capsized and all who were in it were drowned. In some places parents tied their children on the high branches of trees while they instituted measures for their general safety. The trees were washed up by the roots and the heartrending cries of the children were silenced in the surging waters. The body of a bride dressed in her bridal-robes was found floating in the river at Canton. A large tub was also seen. It was picked up and found to contain a boy and a girl. With them was a paper stating their names, the day and hour of their birth. The parents had taken this means to save the lives of their offspring. The writer of the letter from which the above is taken says:

"The suffering that is being endured by thousands in this province is simply heartrending. Children are calling to their parents that they are hungry, and the broken-hearted parents can only reply with their eyes blinded with tears that they have nothing to give them. These floods will of course bring on other calamities. The subsiding waters will leave an alluvial deposit, which will burden the atmosphere with malarial poison. The people are obliged to use the filthiest and dirtiest water, which must give them all sorts of diseases. The non-progressive character of these people leaves them helpless and undone in the face of calamity, and all they can do is to beat gongs, burn incense, howl to the heavens that are as brass, pray to one idol to go and cause another to stop his raining, prohibit the killing of pigs, close the north gate, snub the northern ruler, and then—take their chance."

RE-TRANSLATIONS. PSALM VIII.

O Jehovah, our Sovereign! how illustrious
[Is] thy name in all the earth—
Thou whose splendor has gone forth over the heavens!
Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou founded strength,
Because of thine enemies, to make foe and revenger be still.
When I behold thy heavens, the work of thy fingers,
Moon and stars which thou hast established,—
What [is] weak man, that thou shouldst be mindful of him,
Or a son of Adam, that thou shouldst visit him;
And thou shouldst make him little less than God,
Both with glory and with honor shouldst crown him;
Shouldst give him dominion over the works of thy hands,
All things shouldst have put under his feet—
Sheep and oxen, all of them,
Yea, even the beasts of the field,
Birds of the heavens, and fishes of the sea,
Everything passing along the paths of the sea.
O Jehovah, our Sovereign! how illustrious [is] thy name in all the earth!
PSALM IX. 8-6.

And [so it has come to pass], in the afterpart of the days,
That established becomes the mountain of the house of Jehovah at the head of the mountains,
And exalted above hills;
Then have streamed unto it all the nations,
Then have journeyed many peoples, and have said:—
Come ye! and let us go up to the mountain of Jehovah,
Unto the house of the God of Jacob;
And [of] him instruct us out of his ways,
And we will walk in his paths.
For out of Zion goes forth instruction,
And the word of Jehovah from Jerusalem.
So he he judged between the nations,
And given sentence to many peoples:
Hence they beaten their swords into ploughshares,
And their spears into pruninghooks:
Not lifteth nation against nation the sword,
Nor learn they any more to make war.

Please send my paper as above until further notice. I came here to locate and think I shall locate here, but having just arrived, I cannot say with much certainty where I shall locate. The land here is very rich, producing any thing planted in it in the greatest profusion, but the country is very rolling. I am disappointed in two ways; first by the exceedingly mawkishness of the country, and secondly, by the productiveness of the soil. I am satisfied that the country is healthy, indeed Asheville is a summer health resort for the more eastern and southern portions of the Carolinas. I find a good many of the one faith are living in this county, but have seen only two or three. I expect to go with Bro. Collins about ten miles on the first Lord's day in September to hear Bro. Anderson preach. I am told Bro Anderson is a good speaker and should be kept in the field all the time, but the brethren are poor, and have to look, each after his own household.

Yours for the cause of Truth.

A Berlin journal has recently made an estimate of the size and cost of the armies of Europe. In the seventeen states of that continent, the armies even on a peace footing number 2,520,522 men. The total cost for these millions it estimates to be £196,514,852, or more than $980,000,000 per year. The total population of Europe is said to be a little more than 316,000,000. This would make the armies, in peace times, average three dollars per year to each person, young and old.

We have reason to thank the Revised Version of the Old Testament for making intelligible many passages which before had no meaning. An instance of this met us recently in reading Psa. xvi. 2: "Thou art my Lord; my goodness extendeth not to thee." This is the old version. The words have a good sound; we have all heard them often in the church and in the prayer-meeting and at the family altar; but can any one assert that they have conveyed to him any intelligible meaning? The Revised Version reads: "I have no good beyond thee;" and is a moment all is plain. Every true believer finds an echo in his heart; he has no good, he can conceive of no good, exceeding that of possessing the indwelling of God in his own soul; "I have no good beyond thee."—National Reptist.

TEARS.

There be three hundred ways and more
Of speaking, but of weeping only one:
And this one way, the wide world o'er and o'er,
Is known by all, though it is taught by none.
No man is master of this ancient lore,
And no man pupil. Every simpleton
Can weep as well as every sage. The man
Does it no better than the infant can.

The first thing all men learn is how to speak,
Yet understand they not each other's speech:
But tears are neither Latin, nor yet Greek,
Nor prose, nor verse. The language that they teach
Is universal. Cleopatra's cheek
They decked with pearls no richer than from each
Of earth's innumerable mourners fell
Unbidden, yet correctly classical.

Tears are the oldest and the commonest
Of all things upon earth: and yet how new
The tale each time told by them! how unbelieved
Were life's hard way without their heavenly dew!
Joy borrows them from Grief: Faith trembles next
Into her throne; even Hope herself smiles through
The rainbow they make round her as they fall;
And death, that cannot weep, sets weeping all.

IN MEMORIAM.

On the 24th of August, at 10 o'clock in the evening, Brother Allen B. Magruder, of Stephens City, Va., fell asleep in Jesus, with full assurance of a joyful resurrection to glory, honor, and immortality.

For the last four or five years Brother Magruder has been in bad health, relying most of the time upon others to write over his business letters, and three weeks before his death he had a severe fall from the effects of which he never recovered. Had he lived until September 8th, he would have been seventy-five years old.

The good, the great work, done by him who now lies unconscious in death is acknowledged with love by all believers of the truth who know him. He was indeed a "servant of God, and a disciple of Christ." Greater honor he could not, and did not, desire. For forty-five years he was an earnest, untiring worker for the Master. His means, his mind, his heart, were given to the cause he loved. Early in life he manifested that noble mind which "proves all things and holds fast to the good." From the most cultured society, himself a man of remarkable culture, from the enticement of fame, from the wisdom of the world, he turned to follow the meek and lowly Jesus, to unite himself with a "sect everywhere spoken against." It was with him a sacrifice, which he desired to be "holy, acceptable unto God," and in which he realized but his "reasonable service."

No sooner had he embraced the truth, than he became its valiant and able exponent. Furnished with a superior education, a mind trained in logic, of fluent and eloquent speech, he riveted the attention of men of all creeds. In his celebrated debate with Mr. Orris, he displayed great talent, and the teaching of God's word was splendidly sustained. The writer remembers with what pleasure he read the speeches on both sides, published in book form by the unanimous wish of the people who heard them. Orris was a man of more than ordinary ability, but he met in Brother Magruder a David before whom he could not stand.

In 1856, Brother Magruder, in company with Brother Albert Anderson, visited Henderson Co., Ky., and the impression made upon all classes by these beloved brethren was strong and lasting. They spoke many times in different parts of the county, and always to crowded houses. One brother, now living, has frequently told the writer how Brother Magruder opened his eyes to the light of the gospel in a way never to be forgotten. A preacher of Campbellism heard, on one occasion, Brethren Magruder and Anderson, and having, no doubt, strong faith in his own convictions, thought it his duty to confute this new "heresy" presented to the people. He appointed a place, and invited Brother Magruder to speak, reserving for himself the privilege of answering. When the hour came, Brother Magruder began his address to a packed house. The Campbellite preacher in company with the brother who related the incident sat on a front seat to take notes. As the speaker warmed up to his subject, the pencil of the note taker moved with more and more unsteadiness, and finally stopped, while he owner sat drinking in the beautiful truths of the Bible. So absorbed was he, that when Brother Magruder paused for a reply, he could but say—"Go on, Mr. Magruder, I cannot reply." The effect of this announcement upon the people may be imagined. Many, including the brother alluded to, who was at that time a Campbellite, began to investigate what had been presented to them, and so believed.

In 1880, Brother Magruder visited Henderson Co., the second time, and it was then that the writer first met him and learned to love him so dearly. He came to tell, in his own beautiful way, of the love and infinite mercy of God to us and to all men, but he was only permitted to preach once. A large and intelligent audience greeted him on that occasion, and for over an hour, although we could see he was suffering, he spoke eloquently of the origin, nature, and destiny of man. All who heard him were charmed, and it was a genuine disappointment to the whole community when it was known that he was too sick to speak again.

The writer will ever esteem it one of the greatest privileges of his life that he was with Brother Magruder during his two weeks of sickness in Henderson Co. More cheerfulness, more patience, more faith, he never saw displayed by any one. Although suffering at times the acutest pain, there was no murmuring, and it was beautiful to hear him talk of the love of the Heavenly Father in whom he trusted always. When he became convalescent the writer frequently read aloud to him from the Bible and other books, and his comments were always full of instruction. His great store of information enabled him to be interesting on any subject introduced.

His manner was as charming as his conversation; for he was gentle, modest, and truly refined, and in address affable and courteous. He was at all times a perfect and thorough gentleman, as he was a true Christian.

Brother Magruder's ability as a writer was of a high order. As is well known to the brethren he was, for a long time, a regular contributor to THE RESTITUTION, and some of its most forcible and excellent articles were from his pen. His name was also well known in behalf of the truth, to the readers of the Washington, Baltimore, and other Eastern papers. His style was clear, concise, and elegant, and all that he wrote attracted attention. Besides contributing for years to both English and American periodicals, he gave to the world a masterly book—"Reply to Ingersoll." This work was called forth by the Goliath-like challenges of Ingersoll to all believers of the Bible. Brother Magruder took up the gauntlet flung down by the infidel champion, and tried both by personal communication and through the public press, to make him enter the lists, but to no purpose. Finding Ingersoll would not meet him in debate he attacked the lectures of the blatant blasphemer, and with the keen scalpel of truth showed to the world that they were but skeletons of sophistry, gorgeously adorned in rhetoric.

While the first edition of the "Reply" was being read and commented upon by the whole country, Judge Black, well known as a statesman and scholar, entered into controversy with Ingersoll through the pages of the North American Review, and though Judge Black displayed in the discussion that logic for which he was justly celebrated, it was apparent to Brother Magruder, and to all who knew "the truth as it is in Jesus," that because of his belief in the immortality of the soul he was not fitted to defend the Bible, which does not teach that the soul is immortal. So when the second edition of the "Reply" came out, it contained in addition to its former contents a review of the Ingersoll-Black controversy, thus making the book a complete defense of God's word, by advocating "the truth" and pointing out the error and weakness of popular Christianity.

Had Brother Magruder given nothing else to the literature of "The Truth," his Reply to Ingersoll would have placed him in the front rank of those who have devoted their energies to defending the faith delivered to the saints.

The life, the character, the work of our dear brother may be thus epitomized.

He was not "conformed to this world, but was transformed by the renewing of his mind. He did not think of himself more highly than he ought to think. He loved without dissimulation. He abhorred evil. He clung to that which is good. He loved the brethren. He rejoiced in hope, was patient in tribulation, continued instant in prayer. He distributed to the necessity of the saints; was given to hospitality. He minded not high things, but condescended to men of low estate. He was not wise in his own conceit, and finally he was not overcome with evil, but overcame evil with good." For such an one "there there is laid up a crown of righteousness."

Brother Magruder's death is a great loss to "The truth" and to his family. He was a most considerate and affectionate husband, a loving father. But wife, brethren, children, let us be comforted. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth and remembers them that are his." He over whom death has triumphed, will, when Jesus comes, triumph over death, and come forth from his grave glorious and immortal.

While there in death—while sweetest flowers,
Must die beside the dying year—
While scenes of darkest earth's brief hours
And leaves upon the cheek a tear—

Still there is life, O life sublime!
Eternal and unchanged as God;
Life that shall triumph over Time
When he shall come with "ten feet [illegible]"

The bitter way of earth, and grave
A promise, and a hope to me:
Sweet Hope, who looks beyond the grave,
And tells us we shall live again.

Christian Character the Climax of Christian Graces.

I purpose to call the reader's attention to the true ladder of Christian graces of which the one that Jacob saw in vision was a type.

As in the vision, so in the reality the ladder rests upon the earth while the top of it is in heaven. Man is at the bottom of it and God at the top of it. Angels, not men, are ascending and ascending it, and the object for which they descend and ascend is to minister to man, as taught here in the context as well as in many other places in the Scriptures. Then the ladder itself and all the angelic spiritual service is to bring man into a true relation to God as his Creator, Preserver and Benefactor. And the plain teaching is that God in the administration of the affairs of this cosmos, works through means and instrumentalities to accomplish his beneficent end. Again God having revealed himself as a Father, and as the highest and that a human father can subserve, is the development of noble character in his children, it is but a natural conclusion to arrive at, that the highest end subserved in the use of these spiritual means and instrumentalities on the part of the Heavenly Father is a similar development of noble character in his children. And if this be true, every round in the ladder of the spiritual graces which bring the child of God into a truer relation of spiritual apprehension to this Heavenly Father must have a specific place and utility in his teaching.

Then moreover the great fact of "the spiritual steps upward" must be revealed "in vision," or by "spiritual apprehension" or "illumination," as it was in Jacob's case. The eyes of our understanding must be opened and we must "become obedient to the heavenly vision." We must not think or talk of "ascending into heaven to bring Christ down, or descending into earth to bring Christ up, for he is very nigh, even in our hearts, by this angelic spiritual power which God has made subservient to his will. We are to believe that the angelic host "encamp about those who fear God and watch to keep his commandments," and will eventually "bring us off conquerors and more than conquerors through him who hath loved us."

Your first step then, impenitent one, is to put your hand in the hand of this angelic helpfulness, as it stands where you are at the foot of this ladder of help, and how can you do this without faith? a belief that grasps after that which it hath apprehended in vision. And so the inspired writer in enumerating the spiritual graces that go to make up Christian character, assumes that you are where Jacob was when he saw the vision, at the foot of the ladder, "a sojourner" on the earth, encompassed with dangers, humbled in the sight of God, but in a state of faith, and to this faith what he saw added, just what he had come to lack, and needed most, namely "courage;" and this is the very first step in the order of the Christian graces which lead to the formation of character of value in the estimation of God, as enumerated in 2 Peter i. 5, 6, 7. The word is arete, and translated "virtue" (C. V. and R. V.) should have been translated, courage, or valor; the first prerequisite of manly character, be it natural or spiritual; for there is always a warfare of some sort to be waged, and it is those who are willing "to go to the front" in the affairs of life and death that supply the crying need of the world.

No "cowards" we are told, will enter into the gates of the new Paradise City of God. Examine the context here and see what Peter is talking about. I will retranslate the passage that the reader may better understand Peter's meaning.

1. Simon Peter a bond-servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, unto those who have been allotted a faith like in preciousness value to ours in the righteousness of our God and Savior Jesus Christ,

2. Grace be unto you and peace be multiplied in an acquaintance with God and Jesus our Lord.

3. Since all that pertains to life and right worship (piety) belonging to the divine power graciously given us is through our acquaintance with the one who hath called us through good report and courage.

4. Whereby the greatest and most precious promises have been graciously made us, that thereby (that is through good report and courage) we might become co-partners in divine nature, having escaped the corruption in the cosmos in inordinate desire;

5. Even to this very end bringing to bear all diligence, add to your faith the requisite supply of courage, and to courage comprehension, and to comprehension self-control, (or control within), and to self-control endurance, (or patient endurance), and to endurance right worship (piety)

8. For these being and abounding in you are not going to make you slothful and unfruitful in becoming acquainted with our Lord Jesus Christ.

What Peter says then is that the very first pre-requisites to any intimate acquaintance with Christ is "glory and virtue," or as I have translated them "good report and courage." Let us see if we can't understand this. Paul says if you are going to glory, glory in the Lord. Then the glory or good report to be sought after is to be and to have it said of you that you are "in the Lord." But it always requires some courage, and frequently the very highest courage, to make this your glory and boast or "good report." To do this, one must empty himself of every prejudice, and accept the truth as it is "in Christ" and not in "creeds," and to do this he must have "comprehension," the next "requisite supply" in order. Reader did you ever stop to think of the difference there is between knowledge and comprehension? Knowledge simply implies that you have certain facts stored away in your memory. Comprehension implies that you understand the true relation which these facts sustain to one another, as well as to all other facts which may be related to them. This word "comprehension" is not the same word that I translate in this passage "acquaintance." The first is gnosis, the second is epignosis. The latter always implies fuller comprehension than the former, and is idomatically used generally to express "personal acquaintance" in contradistinction to a mere acquaintance with abstract entities. See 1 Cor. xiii. 12, for an illustration of the use of these two words gnosis and epignosis in the sense of partial comprehension and full comprehension.

More knowledge may be a cause of positive weakness especially if accompanied with vanity and a silly self-esteem, whereas a clear comprehension though within a limited sphere is powerful and this reminds me before going farther to say that the analogy between the ladder of Jacob's vision and these spiritual steps upward is perfect.

When we by faith put our foot upon the bottom round of the spiritual ascent to nobility of character, there is the angelic spiritual hand reached out to help our weakness. The most timorous by nature have been made as brave as lions; the most stupid and unapprehensive naturally have been made wonderfully fruitful in their comprehension of God's purpose in Christ Jesus our Lord. The most hasty and impulsive like Peter himself, have been given a self-control and steadiness of purpose like the magnet to its pole; the most fickle and unstable by nature have been caused to stand like truth itself in God's hypostasis and patiently endure even excoriation like "Jobab called Job."

The credulous and superstitious, yea, the deluded and boisterous heathen have learned the divine utility of right worship; the ecstatic and the selfish bigots have at last exemplified brotherly love; and the undutiful even have been enabled to control and lead their inordinate selfish desires and passions subject to the new divine sentiments (that is, have in the sanctified glove of their regenerated moral affections.)

But could they have done this of themselves alone without the angelic spiritual ministration, denominated the distribution of sanctified spirit?

Could the "young men mount up like eagles" without the spiritual "eagle wings?"

But beware of temptation, and remember that the hand of spiritual helpfulness is reached out to help only the needy suppliant hand of human good purpose. It is true as hath been said that "the angel hands will bear thee up so that thou wilt not dash thy foot against a stone," but not if your leap to destruction be the wilful act of presumptuous ignorance or a faithless purpose to prove the truth of God Almighty's word.

Seek therefore in your steps upward to a nobility of character which shall bear the stamp of God's approved virtue (courage) to "add to your faith courage, and to courage comprehension, and to comprehension self-control, and to self-control patient endurance, and to patient endurance right worship, and to right worship brotherly love, and to brotherly love sanctified love; and if these be in you and abound, ye will not be slothful and fruitless in becoming acquainted with our Lord Jesus Christ."

Eye Hath Not Seen.

God of the sun that shines afar!
God of each distant, rolling star;
God of the bow that beials on high;
And all the splendors of the sky:
The heavens thy glory, Lord, declare;
Thou art the fount of glory there:
But still thy glories overflow
And paint and gem the world below;
Till each bright cloud, each beauteous form,
Each purpling tint of eve and morn,
Each flower that blooms in beauty rare,
Its Maker's glory doth declare.

Not princes in their best estate,
Nor Solomon in glory great,
Have worn such robes of matchless hue
As, spangled with the morning dew,
The lilies of the field array,
And deck the hedges of the way.
Through the wide earth God's hand doth spread
With beauty all the paths we tread,
That we may feast with wondering eyes
On forms that speak of Paradise.

Oh, if such splendors from thee flow,
Through heaven above and earth below,
If in this narrow realm of time
Thou spreadest forth such scenes sublime;
What matchless sights shall they behold,
To whom eternal years unfold,
Through all the wide expanse above,
God's wealth of wisdom and of love!
When beauty's flood, as from a fount,
Shall flow from Zion's holy mount,
Where in the ages yet unknown,
The riches of God's grace are shown:
When He that planted Eden's bower,
And formed and fashioned every flower,
And gave to all its beauty birth,
To brighten this dark, weary earth,
Shall banish clouds and gloom from view,
And make the old creation new;
Hush the dark waves by tempest tossed,
Restore the bloom of Eden lost,
Bring down his palace from above,
Reunite the earth in light and love,
Until his glory, like a sea,
Its ever radiant robe shall be.

Eye hath not seen, nor mortal heard
The wonders written in his word:
Nor can the human fancy dream
What beauties then shall greet their gleam
Through ever vale, o'er every hill,
And all the earth with rapture fill:
Till this whole world, renewed, shall be
The temple of thy majesty,
Where thy redeemed shall reverent fall,
And hail and crown thee Lord of all.

As the Twig is Bent so will the Tree Appear.

Our own experience and the observation of others both lead us to the conclusion that there is no time in life so happy as the days of our childhood. The days that all who have reached maturity look back upon as the sweetest and keenest enjoyments of their life. The days in which every sense is fresh and strong to the pleasures and delights that are surrounding him. The days without care or anxiety for anything. The days of love, purity and innocence. The days in which sorrows are but transient and of short duration. The days of active enjoyment, and in short the days of pure unlimited happiness.

Let us for a moment consider the child in his childish ways clothed in happiness, innocence, purity and love. Trifles which are utterly disregarded in maturity afford hours of keen delight to children. They find their wants provided for by their elders without the least anxiety of their own. Their hopes have not been darkened by experiences of past misfortunes, but are fresh and strong in their promises for a happy future. The eyes of the children can see beauty everywhere. He can hear music in every strain though it be the notes of discord. Every day comes and goes and brings to him its portion of happiness. And this beauty, music and happiness can only be ascribed to the child's own purity, for as the piece of stained glass will discolor everything that is seen through it, and make it appear the color of the glass, so the child in his purity, innocence and uprightness sees everything pure, happy, innocent and lovely as himself. And as from day to day he finds himself growing older, he innocently rejoices in his mental and physical advancement; but how little does he notice that those days of happiness are gradually drifting him onward to a more sober stage of existence; that stage in which a person is said to have reached maturity. These are the traits which mark out the characteristics of a child, and old age delights in reflecting upon this time as the brightest enjoyment of any period of his life. And as these traits which characterize childhood, gradually develop into manhood, it is natural for him to form habits; and he will form habits; and those habits grow with the child into maturity and become the principles of his character. And right here rests a great responsibility upon the child's parents and teachers. This is to inculcate a desire in the mind and heart of the child for that which is good, and a disregard for that which is evil. And to you my friends who are still young, whose habits have not become the principles of your life, but can be easily guided in the right direction, to you I say, with the deepest solemnity, be careful how you improve your time. Remember, that bad habits will make your life a life of wretchedness. While on the other hand, good habits will make your life a life of happiness, a life of prosperity and a life that is honored and respected by all who know you. These are indisputable facts which stand to prove that there is no time in life in which it is of such great importance that it be properly improved as the days of our childhood.

Cultivate good habits. To enumerate some of the more important of many of them I would say first of all: Be strictly temperate; be diligent; be punctual; be orderly; be honest; be truthful; be thoughtful. "Have a time and place for everything, and everything in its time and place," and you cannot but succeed in whatever your calling may be. Whereas if you practice the reverse you cannot but fail in whatever your pretended calling may be. Did I say pretended? Yes; only pretended, for no man can succeed in business whatever it may be, unless he has gained a true character. And man's character is formed in childhood, and whether the forms of character be good or evil, it has only to grow with the physical body and the stature of a man; and thus appears the man which the character he formed in childhood and nurtured through youth. And right here rests the truth of my subject; that as the twig is bent so the tree will appear.—Henry F. Hermann, in Western Rural.

Dear Children,

In wandering through the beautiful field of truth, I found four young men, who had been taken captives by a cruel king, whose name signifies, "The tears and groans of judgment, the sorrowing of poverty. They were of comely appearance, in whom was no blemish, skillful in all wisdom, which fendered them fit to stand in the king's palace.

To each was given a new name. The first signifies "One who lays up treasures in secret," the second "Fine, tender," the third "Drawn by force," the fourth "A servant of light." While the soldiers were carrying them away, they sat down by the waters of "confusion" and wept, they hung their tuneful harps upon the willows, for they could not sing the Lord's song in a strange land. To the care of these young men the king intrusted the province of a place called "confusion." This king was an idolatrous Gentile who worshipped gods made with hands, and he commanded to be made an image of gold, of great height, and set it up in the plains signifying "A generation," then he sent forth a herald who cried aloud saying, To you it is commanded, O people, nations, and languages, that at what time ye hear the sound of all kinds of music, ye shall fall down and worship the golden image, that the king hath set up, and whoso falleth not down shall be cast into a burning fiery furnace. Then a people whose name signifies, "Demons or, robbers," came and told the king that three young men would not fall down and worship the image. The king became enraged and commanded them to be brought to him, then he told the musicians to play, and all the people to worship the image, but the three, 'who were princes of Judah' refused to obey the king, and said, O king, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter, if it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us out of thine hand, O king, but if not, be it known unto thee that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up. Then the king was very angry, and he commanded the furnace to be heated seven times more than it was wont to be heated. Then the most mighty men of his army were chosen to bind the three, 'clothing them with their mantles, and tarbans' and to cast them into the midst of the burning furnace. The flame was so dreadfully hot, that it burnt up the men who threw them in, but my children, it was not so with the three, who were bound hand and foot. God caused the fire to forget its strength, and its effect was no more than a refreshing stream of water. While the king was carefully watching to see the fire lick up the bodies of the three just young men, he was greatly astonished, for he saw them loosed from their bands, walking in the midst of the fire, but he saw one more than was thrown in, whose form differed somewhat from the rest, perhaps resplendent with glory, as the king said, he was like the Son of God. Think of it my dear children, nothing could harm them when faithful to God. He sent the angel of his presence to shield them, they did not positively know when they were thrown in that such a wonderful deliverance would be wrought for them, but their precious faith brought him into the burning furnace, and no doubt he untied their bound hands and feet. O how surprised the king must have been, he drew nearer to the furnace, and spoke unto them saying, ye servants of the Most High God, come forth, and come hither, and they come forth out of the midst of the fire which had no power over their bodies, neither was a hair of their head singed, not even the smell of fire was on them. Then the king spoke and said, blessed be the God of these young men who hath sent his angel and delivered his servants that trusted in him, and have changed the king's word, and have yielded their bodies that they might not serve nor worship any god except their own God. And the king made a decree that whoever should speak against the God who had delivered them should be cut in pieces, and their houses made a dung-hill, because there is no other God who can deliver after this sort. Children beloved, many a faithful servant of the living God is tried in a similar way in the days in which we live, just for their implicit faith in him, which they esteem more than their life, and although they cannot see him with their natural sight, they are positive his form is like the Son of God, and they come forth from the furnace unsinged, but with renewed confidence in his loving tender care for them.

"Blessed are the undefiled in the way who walk in the law of the Lord."

Your affectionate Teacher.

Editor Restitution:

I will write a few lines to THE RESTITUTION, we all think it is a very good paper and like it first rate. I will write but a few lines for I may be left out. I always like to go to meeting, I went to Sunday school for a while but it is so far to walk, so can't go any more. I will close with a verse.

I believe in God our Father,
Who made us every one;
Who made the earth and heaven
The moon and stars and sun.

All that we have each day,
To us by him is given,
We call him when we pray,
Our Father who art in heaven.

I will close for this time.

The Pharaoh Mummies.

The heart is thrilled when, in the Museum of Antiquities in Cairo, one is led to the mummy of the very Pharaoh of Moses' time, and to Pharaoh's daughter, who discovered Moses in the bulrushes, on the banks of the Nile. They lie in perfect preservation in their gigantic stone coffins, as they were found only a few years ago. The king rests in state beside the queen; and in the sarcophagus of the daughter there is a little infant embalmed. Near by, also, is the Pharaoh who pressed the children of Israel to make their brick and provide their own straw. He is pictured with a scourge in his hand, a rod with four lashes. There is not the least question concerning the identity of these relics of the gone-by ages. Their tombs up the Nile, whence they were exumed, we visited and found the interior as fresh and brightly colored as they could have been in the days when they, in royal state, were committed to the stone. It has been God's pleasure to keep Egypt as a reserved witness to the truth of his revelation, till the time it should please him to call for testimony, and then bring it forth and read to the world the unshaken evidence, written by enemies themselves on tables of stone. These are the truths that cannot be shaken.—Dr. G. L. Goodel.

MAN'S MORTALITY.

[The following beautiful poem is a literary gem. The original is found in an Irish MSS., in Trinity College, Dublin. There is reason to believe that the poem was written by one of those primitive Christian bards, in the reign of King Diarmid, about the year 551, and was sung or chanted at the last grand assembly of Kings, Chieftains, and Bards ever held in the famous halls of Tara. The translation is by the learned Dr. O'Donovan.]

Like a damask rose you see,
Or like a blossom on a tree,
Or like a daisy flower in May,
Or like the morning to the day,
Or like the sun, or like the shade,
Or like the pearl which Joseph had,
Even such is man, whose thread is spun,
Drawn out and cut, and so is done.
The rose withers, the blossom blasteth,
The flower fades, the morning hasteth,
The sun sets, the shadow flies,
The glass consumes, the man—he dies.

Like the grass that's newly sprung,
Or like the fair that's new begun,
Or like the bird that's here to-day,
Or like the pearled dew in May,
Or like an hour, or like a span,
Or like the singing of a song,
Even such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life and death.
The grass withers, the sere is ended,
The bird is flown, the dew's ascended,
The hour is short, the span not long,
The song's near death, man's life is done.

Like the bubble in the brook,
Or in a glass much like a look,
Or like the shuttle in the weaver's hand,
Or like the writing on the sand,
Or like a thought, or like a dream,
Or like the gliding of the stream,
Even such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, is life and death.
The bubble's out, the look's forgot,
The shuttle's flung, the writing's blot,
The thought is past, the dream is gone,
The waters glide, man's life is done.

Like to an arrow from the bow,
Or like swift course of water flow,
Or like that time twixt flood and ebb,
Or like the spider's tender web,
Or like a race, or like a goal,
Or like the dealing of a dole,
Even such is man, whose brittle state
Is always subject unto fate.
The arrow's shot, the flood soon spent,
The time no time, the web soon rent,
The race is run, the goal soon won,
The dole soon dealt, man's life soon done.

Like to the lightning in the sky,
Or like a post that quick doth hie,
Or like a quaver in the song,
Or like a journey three days long,
Or like snow when summer's gone,
Or like a pear, or like a plum,
Even such is man, who heaps up sorrow,
Lives but this day, and dies to-morrow.
The lightning past, the post must go,
The song is short, the journey so,
The pear doth rot, the plum doth fall,
The snow dissolves, and so must all.

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus Greeting: InHis Name.

"But without faith it is impossible to please God: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Heb. xi. 6.

There is much of deep and solemn interest embodied in this text. The divine line is here drawn by the "Sword of the spirit," so accurately that it cannot be misunderstood, even by those of least mental capacity, who desire to know the truth.

Without faith it is impossible to please God, very clearly shows that with faith it is possible to please him. Then, he that cometh to God (by faith) must believe that he is, just what he represents himself to be, (i. e.) a rewarder of them them that diligently seek him. As also a punisher of those who do not. Isa. xxvi. 21.

To every thinking mind the query arises. How can we come, or approach unto God? To this query as to all others pertaining to life and godliness, the Scriptures furnish a plain response. In John xiv. 6, Jesus himself says, "I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man cometh unto the Father but by me." Here our divine Lord represents himself as the only way, whereby man may approach unto God—as the truth—the grand central truth around which clusters every hope that mortal man may cherish,—as the way that leads through the dark valley of the shadow of death, whence he himself first arose to life fadeless and immortal. Here too he asserts that he is the life, and the longing soul asks, What life? What kind of life is in him, and how is it obtained?

In my last communication, (August 18) I endeavored to show that mortal life was manifested through various channels, according to the species of natural life to be sustained by it. That human life came only through the human family, and that it came without our volition, that it ends when the spirit of life, or the living vital principle ceases to act on the human organism.

Life in all its multitudinous forms is but the effect of this vital principle on the various organisms, and the life, or effect manifested is in exact harmony with the quality of the organism on which the vitalizing principle acts through all the various grades of animal creation, from the molusk, to the most cranial development of the most enlightened and refined of Adam's race. The vital principle is the same, though the instrument on which it acts may be widely different. When the instrument becomes too much exhausted to give back or inhale this living principle life ceases, and, the body left to its natural course soon returns to its original elements.

Human life is altogether the highest in the scale of animal life: and forms a necessary basis on which for a time, man, may rest, and from which he is invited to reach forth and grasp the higher—the immortal. This higher life is not bestowed without his volition, as was temporal life, neither does it cease, for it is eternal. It is the reward given for patient continuance in well doing, and it is hidden with Christ in God, to be bestowed only when he who is, and who holds our life shall appear.

Perhaps some will say that the "gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ." Very true. God gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have eternal life. Here we see that the gift (i. e.) the means, is freely provided, but mankind are left free to chose or reject the future unseen life.

The whole tenor of the book goes to show that the means is freely provided for all who will accept. There is no limitation. To all who are capable of hearing and who hear, the way to accept is clearly marked, plainly laid down. It is all of faith; belief in God the Father through the Christ his Son. His only begotten One—begotten not of the lust of the flesh, but by the power of the Highest.

This is the record that God has given of his Son. The word (or power) became (the deed or) flesh and we behold his glory, the glory as of an only begotten of the Father.....Again we read. 1 John iv., Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God. (Here I beg to suggest that the kind of flesh is not specified. It is simply the flesh of humanity. He was made in the likeness of sinful flesh. But in him was no sin. Anti-christ denied the Messiahship of Christ, then as now. They did not believe that he had come in the form and fashion of man.)

From this we must understand that every spirit that does not confess this divine truth, that does not believe the record that God has given of his Son, is not of God. Here again the line is drawn between faith and unbelief.

In Mark xvi. 16 we read, He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved. He that disbelieveth shall be damned or condemned. Here not faith alone is mentioned, but its legitimate results. Faith understandingly exercised always produces works, and both harmonizing grow into life eternal. To infer from this text that the condemnation is only age-lasting, but not eternal, is but a vain attempt to pervert language from its evident signification, for it must be admitted if language has any definite meaning, the salvation, and the condemnation here mentioned run parallel as to duration. And if the condemnation is but age-lasting, so also is the salvation age-lasting, and if at the end of the age the condemned are saved, on the same principle of reasoning we may assert that the saved are lost. If one is reversed, so also is the other.

Some writers assert, but fail to prove, that the destruction here referred to, was the destruction in the general overthrow of the Jewish nation of those who in that age refused to acknowledge Christ. If such limitation can be put on this language, then this salvation preached by the apostles under that commission could not be understood to imply any thing more than salvation from the temporal destruction of that age, and where then shall we look for the commission to preach eternal salvation.

In Matt. xxviii. 19-20, Our blessed Master assures his disciples that "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." Then he sent them forth to make disciples of all nations with the assurance that he would be with them alway "even to the end of the age." To presume to limit this age to the Jewish dispensation, which was then very near its close, is to endeavor to circumscribe the proclamation of the gospel to that age, and try to thwart the high and infinitely wise purpose of Jehovah, who ordained that the gospel should be preached all through the Gentile age, during which period a people should be called out from among them, that through us—the gospel—instrumentality in the unfolding of his purpose, those chosen ones might be constituted a kingdom of priests or the future rulers of the nations.

Still further, this commission was in perfect harmony with the angel's message at the time of the Savior's birth. Luke ii. 10. For behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. Hitherto God's chosen people were made the recipients of all his special blessings. To them was given the law and the promises, and to them were sent the prophets of the Most High. Now that the long-promised Messiah had come, and the Jews, his own people, had not received him, the field of blessing is expanded and the glorious message is sent into "all the world" to be the "joy of all people," and when it has been preached as a witness, to all nations, then it will have fulfilled its mission, and the kingdoms of the world will have become the kingdom of God and his Christ.

Every ambassador who has gone forth to proclaim the "glad tidings" of life eternal through Christ, has been an instrument of blessing, and through these instruments, however feeble they may appear in the sight of men, the divine Architect is hewing and fashioning these most precious stones, out of which he will soon erect a living temple to the praise and glory of his ever blessed name. ## THE LOCALITY OF EDEN.—NO. IV.

Having thus discovered the four rivers mentioned by Moses, in reference to the earthly Paradise, or Garden of Eden, it will not be difficult to assign the very situation of the country of Eden, wherein God planted the Garden of Paradise. For it is evident, from the words of Moses, that it lay on the single channel, which is common to all the four rivers. For the sacred text says, that 'a river went out of Eden, to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads.' Which words manifestly imply, that in Eden the river was one; that is, that it was but a single channel; but 'from thence,' that is, out of Eden, it was parted, and became four heads.'

The Hebrew word, rashim, which is rendered in our translation 'heads' is, by the Seventy Interpreters, rendered archai, 'beginnings;' and so the word is elsewhere used in holy writ. Either signification is applicable enough to the subject before us. For if it is taken in the former sense, then the sacred text may denote, that the single river, which was in Eden, out of it was divided into 'four heads,' or 'principal channels,' by this expression excluding some smaller or otherwise less considerable channels, as being not the old, main, natural streams, but made by the industry of man. For that there were such made canals in those parts, is certain; and it is not certain but some of them might be made before the time of Moses. Of the several channels that did, or do now carry the water of the Euphrates into the Tigris, it is supposed by learned men, that that only, which runs where stood the great city of Babylon, is natural.

If the original word be taken in its other sense, then the great river, or single common channel, with its four branches, must be considered, not in respect to the running of the waters, but in respect to its own disposition. And it would be very properly spoken, to say of one who, coming out of the garden, had taken boat on this river, that, having sailed a while, he came to the beginning, or entry, of the Euphrates or Tigris; or (on the other side) of the Pison or Gihon. The river or single channel must be looked upon as an highway, crossing over a forest, and which may be said from thence to divide itself into four ways, whether the division be made above or below the forest....

We read in 2 Kings xix. 22, and Isaiah xxxvii. 13, that Sennacherib, king of Assyria, designing to terrify Hezekiah, who had rebelled against him, boasts that he had destroyed the countries of Gozan, of Reseph, and of the children of Eden which were in Telassar. The learned agree, that Gozan is the Gauzanitis, a province in Mesopotamia; that Haran and Reseph are Charræ and Resaphe, two cities in the same land of Mesopotamia; that Telassar is Talatha, a city in Babylonia, placed by Ptolemy at the bottom of the common channel above mentioned; and consequently that the Eden here mentioned is the same country where Moses placed Paradise, extending itself from Mesopotamia; or the joining of the Euphrates and Tigris as far as to Telassar, or the parting of the aforesaid united streams again into two other streams, called the rivers of Pison and Gihon. For when it is said in the forecited texts, that Sennacherib destroyed the 'children of Eden that were in Telassar,' thereby is plainly denoted, that Telassar lay within the borders of Eden; and therefore Telassar or Talatha being placed by Ptolemy just above the parting of the Pison and Gihon, the province of Eden must extend likewise as far as that.

But there is still one more sign, which will help us in some degree to distinguish and know the situation of the earthly Paradise. Such is the fruitfulness of the country, and the goodness of its soil, which seems still to keep some remainders of that blessing of God poured upon it: for that plentifulness was partly natural, and partly supernatural. Moses informs us, that God, in order to make Paradise, 'caused to grow out of the ground, every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food,' Gen. ii. 9. And in another place, (Gen. xiii. 10.) having a mind to express the pleasantness, and fertility of the soil of Sodom before its desolation, he compares it to 'the Garden of the Lord;' whether he only meant a garden of extraordinary beauty, according to an Hebraism very ordinary in the sacred writ, as some think; or the earthly Paradise, according to the most common opinion. But besides the ornaments, wherewith the hand of God did adorn the terrestrial Paradise in an extraordinary manner, we cannot reasonably think, that God should make a choice of a barren and unfruitful soil, wherein to plant the Garden of Paradise, rather than of a country, which, considered in its own natural state, is fruitful and pleasant. Now not only Mesopotamia and Coelesyria, but also Babylonia, (which extended itself to the Persian Gulf,) and a good part of Syria, were formerly esteemed the most pleasant and fruitful countries in the world. And to keep to the country of Eden, beginning at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates, (which is near the city of Apamea, according to Ptolemy,) and so going down to the Persian Gulf, the country on each side is every way as beautiful and fertile as any other country in Asia. We do not say, that those delights are found there which the hand of God did spread to form Paradise; nor all those that the labor of men can procure: but we say, that the soil is extraordinary good, and that nature hath made it capable of all culture; though it be true, that it very seldom rains there, and that its plentifulness is merely owing to the goodness of its soil, and to the river that waters it. This we learn both from the old and new historians and geographers; modern travellers particularly assuring us, that the Grand Seignior has no better country, than that which lies betwixt Bagdat and Bassora; that is, the country formerly called Eden. And if there be some parts thereof, which he now untilled and barren, it must be imputed to the want of people there at present, or else to the idleness of the inhabitants. Having by the concurrence of all the marks laid down by Moses, and also by other considerations already mentioned, (to which some more will still be added, as we proceed,) put it beyond all rational doubt, that the country of Eden referred to by Moses did lie on the river or single channel so frequently mentioned, it necessarily follows, that the Garden of Paradise did lie on the same river. For the sacred text expressly tells us, that 'God planted the said Garden in Eden,' and also that 'the river' or single channel 'did water the said Garden.'

It is next to be considered, whether Moses has not given us some intimation, in what 'part' of the said 'country of Eden' the terrestrial Paradise was planted. And this he may be probably thought to have done, by his telling us, that God planted the Garden 'eastward' in Eden. It is true indeed, that it is not certainly to be determined, whether Moses would, by the expression 'eastward,' only give us to understand, that Paradise was easterly in respect to himself, when he was writing, and in respect to the promised land; or whether he meant, that it was in the easterly 'part' of the land of Eden. But Moses having said, that Paradise was planted in the 'land of Eden,' and this being so near Arabia Petræa, where probably the Israelites then were; as they could not be well ignorant of its situation, it seems to have been sufficient to have said, that 'Paradise was in the land of Eden,' to let them know, that it was 'easterly' in regard to the place they were then in, and to the promised land. Wherefore it remains that Moses, by saying the Garden was planted eastward in Eden, designed to mark out to them, in what part or place of the land of Eden Paradise was seated. And indeed it seems not likely, that Moses, having undertaken to describe exactly the situation of this Garden, (of which he in the series of his narrative gives so precise and uniform marks,) after he had said, that it stood in the land of Eden, should neglect to express the part of that land, wherein it stood. Seeing then Paradise lay in the easterly part of the land of Eden, and the river that watered it ran through that province, before it entered into Paradise; it must necessarily follow, that Paradise was situated on one of the turnings of this river, that goes from west to east, and probably at the easterly end of the southerly branch of the lowest great turning, taken notice of in Ptolemy, and expressed in the map hereunto belonging.

I proceed to observe, that it is rationally conceived, that the Garden of Eden was the original of those curious gardens, which the princes of the East caused to be made, and by which they would represent the Garden of Eden. Such an one was that golden garden valued at five hundred talents, which Aristobulus King of the Jews presented unto Pompey, and which Pompey afterwards carried in triumph, and consecrated unto Jupiter in the capitol. This garden was called tempole and terpsena, which in strictness of speech is Eden, pleasure. And it is observable, that the conformity between the very words, Garden of Eden, and Garden of Aden, seems to show, that to the Garden of Eden was owing the rise of those gardens consecrated to Adonis, which the Greeks, Egyptians, and Assyrians planted in earthen vessels and silver baskets, to adorn their houses withal, and to carry them about in their processions: though mythologists have by their fictions obscured the truth of the matter, and do refer the original of the Gardens of Adonis to those lectures: wherein Venus put this body newly killed. In short, there is no doubt to be made, but the Garden of Eden planted by the hand of God, and that, in some respects, in a supernatural manner, hath been the pattern, out of which the poets have formed their Fortunate Islands, the Elysian Fields, the Meadows of Pluto, the Gardens (not only of Adonis already mentioned, but also) of the Hesperides, of Jupiter, and Alcinous.—Bevlah.

Intentional Errors.

They have been mostly connected with Biblical matters, and intended to further party interests. It is said that Field, a printer of the time of Charles I., was paid £1,500 by the Independents to alter a single letter in the third verse of Acts vi. so as to make the word "no" read "ye," and so give the right of appointing pastors to the people, and not to the apostles. The deplorable state of the press in Field's time may be realised from the fact that Bishop Usher, on his way to preach at Paul's Cross, asked at a stationer's for a copy of the Bible, and on examining it found, to his astonishment, that the text from which he was about to preach was not in the book! The well-known "Vinegar Bible" was published in 1717, and obtains its name from the Parable of the Vineyard being printed as the Parable of the Vinegar. One of the most wilful alterations of the text and one which cost its perpetrator her life was committed by the widow of a German printer. One night, while an edition of the Bible was being printed in her house, she took the opportunity of altering the word Herr into Narr, making the verse read: "he shall be thy fool" instead of "he shall be thy Lord." The celebrated Bibles of Sixtus V., are eagerly sought for by all collectors. Their sole fame is the multitude of errata which crowd their pages notwithstanding that his Holiness Sixtus V. carefully superintended every sheet as it passed through the press, and finally prefixed to the first edition a bull forbidding any alteration in the text.—Chambers's Journal.

The London Christian World says: "The El Fayoum manuscripts of the Archduke Rainer, so called from the name of the ancient Egyptian city near which they were discovered, are attracting the earnest attention of the learned. A fragment of an early gospel has been found which suggests the possibility of a narrative earlier than any that appear in the New Testament. But there are some 30,000 papyri and parchments besides, in ten or eleven different languages, which have been rescued from the sands of Egypt, and formed part, no doubt, of the public archives of El Fayoum. Professor Karabacek, with several assistants, is engaged in arranging and deciphering them, and the hungry scholars of Europe may expect choice scraps to be doled out from time to time as the savants proceed with their task. At present the most interesting item is a fragment of Thucydides, supposed to be seven hundred years older than the earliest extant manuscript of that author."

The Budget committee in Paris has been summing up the cost of the Tonquin campaign, and finds that it amounts to 470,000,000 francs, nearly $100,000,000. This does not include the loss of men to France, nor the losses to the Chinese and Annamese in men and money. The object of all this lose was to secure openings for the trade of France. But it does not yet appear that the trade sought is likely soon to repay these heavy losses.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS:—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR Payable in advance. Three and Six Months on the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates "the doctrine" or restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. It is a reasonable idea, and establishes the reality of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints associated with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked (except all repent through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Selections.

THE MORNING.

"The watchman said, The morning cometh," Isa. xxi. 12; and though, while making this answer, he forewarns us of night, he also assures us of the morning. There is a morning, says he, therefore do not give way to faintness of spirit; but there is a night between, therefore take warning; that you may not be surprised nor dismayed, as if the promise were broken, or some strange thing allowed to befall you.

There may be delay, he intimates, before the morning,—a dark delay, for which we should be prepared. During this he calls for watchfulness: for the length of the night is hidden, the time of daybreak is uncertain. We must be on the out-look with our eyes fixed on the eastern hills. We have nothing wherewith to measure the hours, save the sorrows of the church and the failing of hearts.

During this delay the watchman encourages us to "inquire," to "return," to "come." He expects us to ask "how long," and say, "When will the night be done?" He takes for granted that such will be the proceeding of men who really long for the morning. To the hills of Seir they will again and again return, to learn of the watchman what is the promise of the day. For no familiarity with the night can ever reconcile them to darkness, or make morning less desirable and welcome.

It is right for us to desire the morning, to hope for it, to weary for it, to inquire as to the signs of it hour after hour. God has set this joy before us, and it were strange indeed if, when compassed about with so many sorrows, we should forget it, or be heedless as to its arrival. For the coming of the morning is the coming of him whom we long to see. It is the coming of him "who turneth the shadow of death into the morning."—Amos v. 8. It is the return of him whose absence has been night, and whose presence will be day. It is the return of him who is the resurrection and the life, and who brings resurrection with him; the return of him who is creation's Lord, and who brings with him deliverance to creation; the return of him who is the Church's Head; and who brings with him triumph and gladness to his Church.

All the joy, the calm, the revivifying freshness of the morning are wrapt up in him. When he appears, day appears, life appears, fruitfulness appears. The curse departs. The "bondage of corruption" is no more. Clouds, storms, troubles, sorrows vanish. The face of nature reassumes the smile of unfallen times. It is earth's festival, the world's jubilee. "The heavens rejoice, the earth is glad, the sea roars and the fulness thereof, the fields are joyful and all that is therein, the trees of the wood rejoice, the floods clap their hands, and the hills are joyful together before the Lord; for he has come, for he has come to judge the earth; with righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with his truth."—Psa. xcvi. 11; xcviii. 7.

This morning has been long anticipated. Age after age it has attracted the Church's eye, and fixed her hope. On the promise of it her faith has been resting, and towards the hastening of it her prayers have gone forth. Though afar off, it has been described, and rejoiced in as the sure consummation towards which all things are moving forward according to the Father's purpose. "There is a morning" has been the word of consolation brought home to the burdened heart of many a saint when ready to say, with David, "I am desolate," or with Jeremiah, "he hath set me in dark places as they that be dead of old."

Let us dwell for a little on some of these Old Testament allusions to the morning. Let us take first the 30th Psalm.

David had been in sorrow, and in coming out of it he makes known to the saints his consolations:—"Sing unto the Lord, O ye saints of his, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. For there is but a moment in his anger; in his favor is life; weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."—Psa. xxx. 4, 5.

The earnest of that morning he hath tasted, but the morning itself he anticipates. Then joy has come. Then he can say, (verse 11,) "Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing; thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness." But it is the voice of a greater than David that is heard in this Psalm. It is one of Christ's resurrection Psalms, the 18th and the 16th. He was "lifted up," so that his foes were not made to rejoice over him. He cried, and was "healed." His "soul was brought up from the grave." There was anger against Him "for a moment," when he bore the sinner's curse. But in Jehovah's favor there was "life." He had a night of weeping, a night of "strong crying and tears," when his soul was "sorrowful even unto death," and when beneath the waves of that sorrow he sunk, commending his spirit into the Father's hands. But it was a night no more. Morning came, and with morning, joy. Coming forth from the tomb, he left all his sorrow behind: his sackcloth was put off, and he arose "girded with gladness." He found morning and joy; and he is "the first fruits of them that slept." His rising was the rising of his saints.—There was a morning for him, therefore there shall be one for us,—a morning bright with resurrection glory.

Let us next take Psalm forty-ninth. These are Christ's words, as is proved from the quotation of verse 4th in Matt. xiii. 35. He summons the whole world to listen. He "speaks of wisdom, "for he is Wisdom. He points to the vanity of riches, and their insufficiency to redeem a soul; and who knew so well as he what a ransom was needed? He sees men going on in their wickedness, self-confidence, and vain-glory. He proclaims their madness and guilt,—speaking of them as incurable from generation to generation. He contrasts the end of the wicked and the end of the righteous; "like sheep the former are laid in the grave,"—buried out of sight, forgotten, unmourned. "Over them the righteous shall have dominion in the morning." The morning then brings dominion to the righteous,—redemption from the power of the grave. In this Jesus rejoiced; in this let us rejoice. This joy of the morning was set before him; it is the same joy that is set before us. Dominion in the morning is that to which we look forward,—a share in the first resurrection, of which those who are partakers live and reign with Christ.

Look again at the forty-sixth Psalm. It is the utterance of the faith of Israel's faithful ones, in the time of "Jacob's trouble." The earth is shaken (verse 2, compare with Haggai ii. 6; and Heb. xii. 26, 27;) the sea and the waves roar (v. 3, compare with Luke xxi. 25;) but there is a river whose streams gladden them. God is in the midst of her. Nay, "God helps her when the morning appeareth," (verse 5, margin,) just as in the morning watch he looked out from the fiery cloud and troubled the Egyptians. Then the heathen are scattered at his voice,—he sweeps off every enemy, he makes wars to cease, and sets himself on high over the nations, as King of kings, "exalted in the earth." From which we gather that the morning brings with it deliverance from danger,—victory over enemies,—the renewal of the earth,—peace to the nations,—the establishment of Messiah's glorious throne. What a morning of joy that must be, for the Church, for Israel, for the whole earth!—resurrection for the Church, restoration for Israel, restitution for the earth!

Look at the 110th Psalm. We see Jesus at Jehovah's right hand,—waiting till his enemies be made his footstool; and then he who said unto him "Sit," shall say, "Arise,—Psa. lxxxii. 6. He is yet to have dominion on earth, and to sit upon the throne of his father David. Instead of "a gainsaying people," as he had in the day of his power;" all arrayed in the beauties of holiness; more numerous and resplendent than the dew from the womb of the morning. Willingness, beauty, holiness, brightness, number; these shall mark his people in that morning of joy which his coming shall produce.—"The dew (says one) is deposited in greatest plenty about the breaking of the dawn, and refresheth with its numerous drops the leaves, and plants, and blades of grass on which it resteth; so shall the saints of God, coming forth from their invisible abodes out of the womb of the morning, refresh the world with their benignant influence; and therefore are they likened to the dew, for all nature is so constituted of God, as to bear witness of that day of regeneration which then shall dawn."

Read also "the last words of David," (2 Sam. xxii. 1-4), in which, as in the 72d Psalm, "the prayers of David are ended," or summed up. "There shall be a just one ruling in the fear of God; as the light of the morning shall he arise, the Sun of an unclouded morning, shining after a rain upon the tender grass of the earth." Not till that Just One comes is that morning to dawn, for he is its light; and from his countenance is to break forth that light in which all earth is to rejoice. Then the darkness of the long night shall disappear, and the tribulation tested in the time of absence be forgotten in the abounding blessedness of his everlasting presence.

Let us hear how, in "the Song," the bride refers to this same morning. She rejoices in the Bridegroom's assured love, and her desires or longings are not questionings as to the relationship in which she stands to him. This is with her a settled thing, for she has tasted that the Lord is gracious. "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine." What directions do her longings take? Her "eyes are towards the hills," over which she expects to behold him coming like a roe. Thus she pleads with him not to tarry: "Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like a roe, or to a young hart upon the mountain of spices." viii. 14. Thus also she anticipates the morning of fuller joy, even while enjoying present fellowship: "He feedeth among the lilies until the day breaks and the shadows flee away."—ii. 16, 17. And thus the Bridegroom himself, feeling, if one may so speak, the loneliness of the night, and that it is "not good to be alone," longs, like herself, for the day, and resolves to climb the hills, where he may not only be regaled with freshest odors, but may catch the earliest gleam of dawn: "Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense."—iv. 6. On that hill let us meet him in faith, and watch with him in hope, yet ever remembering, that though this joy which faith gives here is unspeakably comforting, it is not the gladness of the marriage supper,—it is not the blessedness of the bridal day. For he himself, while telling his disciples, "Lo, I am with you always," says, also this, "I will not henceforth drink of this fruit of the vine until the day that I shall drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom."—Matt. xxvi 29.

Thus we see all kinds of joy brought within the circle of the morning. It is a morning of joy, because it is the morning introduced by him, who said, "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full," John xv. 11; by him "in whose presence [there is fullness of joy, and at whose right hand there are pleasures forevermore."—Psa. xvi. 11. But let us mark the different kinds of joy, and the different figures depicting it.

There is the joy of deliverance from overwhelming danger. This was the joy of the Jews when their adversary perished, and Mordecai was exalted:—"The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honor;....the Jews had joy and gladness, a feast, and a good day."—Ester viii. 16. Such shall be the Church's joy in the morning of her great deliverance. There is the joy of escape from captivity and return from exile, such as made Israel feel "as men that dream." Such shall be the Church's joy when her long captivity is done. "Then shall her mouth be filled with laughter, and her tongue with singing; having sowed in tears she reaps in joy."—Psa. lxxvi. 2. There is the joy of harvest Isa. ix. 3; and such shall be the Church's joy. There is the mother's joy when her pangs are over, and the child is born into the world.—John xvi. 20. With such joy shall we rejoice, and our joy no man taketh from us. The joy in reserve for us is manifold and large; it will abide and satisfy; it is the joy of the morning;—a long glad day before us; no evening with its lengthening shadows, no night with its chills and darkness.—"There shall be no night there, and they need no candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign for ever and ever."—Rev. xxii. 5.

The prospect of this morning—this "morning of joy"—nerves and cheers us under all our tribulation. Were this morning an uncertainty, how dark would the night seem! how difficult for us to fight against faintness and despair! But the thought of morning invigorates and braces us. We can set our faces to the storm, for behind it lies the calm. We can bear the parting, for the meeting is not distant. We can afford to weep, for the tears shall soon be wiped away. We can watch the tedious sick bed, for soon "the inhabitants shall not say, I am sick." We can look quietly into the grave of buried love and cherished hope, for resurrection shines behind it. Things may be against us here, but they are for us hereafter.—The here is but an hour; the hereafter is a whole eternity.

But the world—the heedless, pleasure-chasing world, they have no such brightenings for their dark hours of sorrow. No morning comes to them. Their sun sets, but rises not again; their life goes down in darkness, without a hope. It is night—night infinite and endless, to them; "the blackness of darkness for ever!" No healing of their wounds, no wiping away of their tears, no binding up of their broken hearts! They reject the infinite sacrifice, they sport away their day of salvation, and their history winds up in judgment and the second death. "If they speak not according to this word," (says the prophet), "there is no morning for them."—Isa. viii. 20, margin. This word, "which by the gospel is preached unto them," 1 Peter i. 25, they slight or scorn, and vengeance overtakes them for rejection! "Therefore," says the same prophet, "shall evil come upon you; thou shalt not know its morning."

Sad closing of a life-time's weariness! Joy they have never known, though its full cup has often been handed to them by God, and they pressed to drink it! For what is each message, each summons, each warning, but God saying to them, "Come, share my love, come taste my joy!" Sorrow they have known, for how could they miss knowing it in such a world! Heavy burdens, keen grief, sharp stings, bitter memories, hard misgivings, intolerable forebodings, dark self-questionings, "What am I, or what shall I be?" all these, crowding in upon the soul that has no God, pouring into a heart that has no outlet for its sorrows in the bosom of a Savior, are enough to dry up life's springs even when deepest.—H. Bonar

Darkness Before the Dawn.

The greatest triumphs of the church have been preceded by her darkest periods. Behind the dark cloud which shuts from view the rising light of the early dawn, the full-orbed sun is perhaps already risen. The waning of an old and decaying order of things, and the convulsion incident to the introduction and establishment of a new dispensation, give to the general aspect of affairs the appearance of dissolution. It is fearful to see the fountains of the great deep breaking up—mighty floods rolling over the earth—the solid ground giving way, and no new earth on which to place the sole of your foot. It was a dark hour to Noah, when looking abroad over the wide expanse of waters, he saw the last summit of the receding earth sinking deeper and deeper into a watery grave. But soon a new world arose—washed, regenerated, and made a fitter abode for the church of the living God.

And that was the darkest night of all in which the body of him, who was the bright and morning star, was entombed in the solid marble of the "new sepulchre." No wonder the heavens gathered blackness. In yonder sepulchre was entombed the hope of the world. The Star of Bethlehem, which had already cast its light over the thick darkness of the nations, sunk beneath its horizon, and no bow of promise gave signs that ere long it should rise again in redoubled splendor. The hopes of waiting saints are in a moment prostrated. Many had trusted that it had been he who should have redeemed Israel; but as the morning of the third day approached, and all was silent about the sepulchre,—except as the stern sentinel of the Roman cohort, half determined by martial pride, half trembling for a fearful looking after those visions that may come to pass, keeps his nightly watch, and proudly walks his rounds about the spot where lay, bound in the loy chains of death, the Hope of a hopeless world,—how must the last ray of hope have been extinguished! The overpowering despondency of that hour found a fit response in the bursting grief of those female disciples who came early to the sepulchre: "They have taken away our Lord, and we know not where they have laid him."

Never was there a darker hour. Hope lay dead, encased in the solid marble. Death had gotten the victory—the grave had the prey—sin triumphed, and hell kept jubilee. But hush! The earth quakes—the rocks rend—the priests come rushing from the temple and proclaim that the veil is rent asunder—the pallid inhabitants of the grave walk among the abodes of men.

One company of women, and then another, and then one of the disciples, whose joy in the tidings he brings bears him apace before his brethren, come running back to the Holy City early on the morning of the first day of the week, and what strange tidings they bring! They say,—but who, at this juncture of fell despondency, can believe it?—they say, "The Lord has risen indeed!" The gloomy night is passed. The morning of the resurrection is come. The entombed hopes of his followers now burst forth into a glorious reality. In the hopeless tomb was the germ of hope for a ruined world. On Calvary, in the very ignominy and agony of the cross, was done away an old order of things, and introduced another, which should bring life and immortality to light. It was the darkness, the gloom, the death of that dismal period, which introduced the most illustrious period the Church has ever witnessed. They not only preceded, but were the very authors of it. The scene on Calvary was a great conflict. It was the hour and power of darkness. When the Great Head of the Church was about to introduce a new and a more glorious era of his grace, all the powers of the pit were roused to smother the rising glory.

THE CROWN.

"They cast their crowns before the throne."—Rev. iv. 10.

There is much in the book of the Revelation which is difficult and obscure, and yet it answers to its title; it is a revelation, and not a book of enigmas of inscrutable mysteries. All will be made plain soon. Much is plain now to the believer who studies it with humility and prayer. It reveals the glories of Christ, telling us how our elder brother appears in his Father's house; what offices of love he sustains for us; what tender affection he bears toward us; as also in what estimation he has held at the heavenly court. It reveals the future glories of the Church more fully, and more in detail, than any other part of God's book; here "immortality is brought to light." It is also a map of the country which the Church has to pass through to her inheritance; her enemies, her conflicts, her trials, her victories, are here unfolded; and all to produce caution, courage, and consolation. The worship and service, the joys and employments of the heavenly world, or also of the world to come, (for most probably it is the resurrection state which is foreshown in this vision, Rev., 4th and 5th chapters), are here known. Here we may listen to the perfect melody, behold spotless beauty—witness worship without any defect—and humility without any mixture of pride. They (the four-and-twenty elders) fall down before him who sits on the throne, and worship him who liveth for ever and ever; and cast their crowns before the throne. Their dignity, their station, and their employment, are all worthy of our notice. The dignity of these worshippers is set forth in the following striking words,—"Round the throne was four-and-twenty seats, and upon the seats I saw four-and-twenty elders sitting clothed in white raiment, and they had on their heads crowns of gold." We do well to connect together, the white raiment and the crown. This shows the connection between righteousness and life. The fine linen is the righteousness of saints.—Rev. xix. 8. Only those who submit to God's righteousness, who are willing to be saved by the merit of another, can ever wear the crown. This connection of the robe and crown shows the union of the priestly and regal functions, and that the redeemed will reign and minister, be kings and priests unto God. The glorified Church will be exalted to reign with Christ, to sit with him on his throne, and to administer under him the affairs of his everlasting kingdom. They will be endowed with a noble and royal nature, corresponding with their high station and dignity. Theirs will be indeed a free and princely spirit then; every thought, feeling, and desire, will correspond with their high destiny. They will then be manifested as the sons of God.

The crown also denotes the completeness of their triumph, it is a crown of victory, which only the overcomer wears. The conflict has been long and sore, the race has been arduous; but the enemy is conquered, the goal is gained, and he who overcame for them, who was their forerunner, and whose cheering words animated them, even the Lord, the righteous Judge, gave them the crown, even a crown of life, of righteousness, of glory; an incorruptible crown, an exceeding and eternal weight of glory. This is the consummation of all their wishes, the reward of all their labors, yet the free gift of the God of all grace.

Those who wear the crown are "before the throne." How infinite the glories of that throne, how great the blessedness of those who are near it! It is a throne of majesty high and lifted up—a throne of righteousness, of grace, of glory. There every attribute shines forth and all appear in harmony. The Lamb is in the midst of it revealing its glories, fulfilling its high behests. Before it are the seven spirits of God, round it is the rainbow of the covenant, and near it countless hosts of saved and upheld ones, the two grand branches of the one family.—This shows their nearness to God—their acceptableness in his sight (they are his favorites in whom he finds pleasure)—and their intimate union with each other. What glories beam upon their eye—what wonders employ their thoughts—what happiness fills their hearts! They reflect the glory of God, as stars in the firmament of mercy; they show forth the beauty of the Sun of righteousness. They incessantly bear witness to the glory of God, and as they cast their crowns before the throne, sing, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power; for thou hast created all things; and for thy pleasure they are, and were created."

This casting of their crowns before the throne, does not imply that they lightly esteemed them, or were grown weary of them. Earthly crowns have often been lined with thorns, and some of the high and mighty of earth have complained bitterly of their oppressive weight, and a few have abdicated their thrones and resigned their crown, glad to lay aside the trappings of royalty, and to escape from its oppressive cares; but the crown of life sits graceful and easy upon the brow of the glorified; they are at home in the house of their Father. This act of casting the crowns shows the reality and profoundness of their humility. It is an acknowledgement that their dignity is all derived from mercy, and held on the tenure of grace alone. Ah! little know we of the humility of heaven, how entire, constant, and all pervading it is. Yet is it fully compatible with the highest joy and the loftiest triumph. It is ever accompanied with profound gratitude. A sense of God's mercies, as well as a view of his glories, bow the soul down in reverent rapture. The Father's eternal love—the Savior's wondrous cross—the Holy Spirit's mighty energy, are all thought upon and delighted in. All the soul has escaped from, all it possesses, all it hopes for, is traced to Divine love, and then the bounty-loaded adorer falls before him that sitteth on the throne, and casts his crown at his feet; feeling unutterable delight, and acknowledging his dependence on him who is exalted to glory, to sustain them for ever in it. That dependence is as free from doubt, as the humility is from pride.—Thus God is all in all, and the blessed ones around his throne are perfectly happy, because filled with humility and holiness.

Have we good grounds to believe that we shall have a crown to cast?

"Have we received abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness?" Then let us seek to fight a good fight, to finish our course and keep the faith; to abide under the cross of Jesus, live on the fulness of Jesus, and love his appearing. Then in the day of his coming, he will own us, and crown us. Till then, let us seek grace to learn, and imitate the humility and gratitude of heaven. Let us lie low before him who sitteth on the throne, conscious of our own unworthiness; but let us give ourselves, body, soul, spirit, time, talents, properly, to him who redeemed us, full of confidence in his graciousness, assured that he will accept the offering, and bless the offerer. —London Journal of Prophecy.

Excavations at Ephesus.

An extra sessional meeting of the Royal Society of Literature was held recently in London in order to hear some observation from Mr. J. T. Wood in regard to his discoveries by excavation at Ephesus. After tracing many conjectual attempts which had been made to fix the site of the celebrated Temple of Diana, Mr. Wood related how, after a long series of tentative efforts, extending over several years, he had at last struck upon the track which led from the Shaguesian gate to the Temple and had found the foundations of the wall built in the time of Augustus Cæsar by Gallus, the pro-consul, round the sacred Temple. On the last day of 1869 the workmen struck upon the pavement and sculptured figures, and since that period discoveries have gradually been made making it possible pretty nearly to a ascertain the form and dimensions of the entire building. Many other most interesting relics of the ancient city have also been unearthed, among them the almost undoubted tomb of St. Luke.

That was a noble reply made by Francois de Montmorin, Governor of the Province of Auvergne, when he received an order from Charles IX., of France, to join in the massacre of the Protestants on St. Bartholomew's day: "Sire, I have received an order from your Majesty to put to death all the Protestants in my province. I have too much respect for your Majesty not to suppose that these letters are supposititious; and if, which heaven forbid, the order really emanates for your Majesty, I respect your Majesty too much to obey it."

The French traveller, Baron Benvist-Machin, estimates that within the last forty years the Turcomans have carried off from Persia 200,000 captives, to supply the demand for slaves.

Brethren interested in circulating books and tracts will do well to notice the special offer made by Bro. Wiley Jones in another column of our paper, and get his really excellent works at half price—which is less than the actual cost of the books. No better literature for mission work is offered by any one than the works of Bro. Jones, and the entire stock should be taken in ten days.

The Annual Conference for the State of Indiana, will be held at Argos, Ind., commencing Friday, Oct. 9, 1885, at 2:00 p. m., and continue over the following Sunday. A general attendance is desired. Come, brethren, let us meet together once more, have a good meeting, and exhort one another, and so much the oftener as we see the day is approaching.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, September 16, 1885.

News has come that a brother of ours, W. J. Chaplin, died Monday morning. As his funeral takes place on our publication day, we have to omit some Editorial matter. O Death! sad direful word!

A NEW star has appeared in the constellation Andromeda which is creating much interest among astronomers. Its identity with the Star of Bethlehem, as the temporary star that appeared in 945, 1264, and 1572 has been formed, is thought to be quite probable. Since its first discovery, Aug. 27, it has been increasing in brightness, and it is thought that it will become a conspicuous object in the heavens in the course of a year. It is said to be visible to the naked eye, as a faint star, at the present time to those who know where to locate it.

To preach the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, his second coming to rule this world in righteousness, eternal life only through the Prince of life, God's Messiah, and practical piety resulting from a hearty obedience to the requirements of the gospel is solely our aim when visiting brethren in localities abroad. We introduce no distracting hobbies, neither do we take any part in sectional or Church difficulties. It is a matter of supreme importance, in the present crisis of human history, that we lead holy, blameless lives, and love one another with pure hearts fervently.

The Relation Which Types Sustain to the Antitypes; also the First to the Second Testament (or Covenant).

Moses, who was styled the law-giver to the children of Israel, was commanded to make all things according to the model or pattern shown to him in the Mount (Sinai). He was commanded to be very scrupulous and exact in the details, (as frivolous as they might appear to us) for the least deviation or transgression received a just recompense of reward, which was death. Under the greater light which now radiates from "The Sun of Righteousness," we may now well exclaim with the apostle, "how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?"

This system of types, or the law, contained shadows or types of things to come. In point of time it spans not only the time, or the dispensation of the types, but must also include the time of the antitypical dispensation. It might be illustrated by a drama, which is divided into two or more scenes or acts, and between those several acts or scenes the curtain may for a time drop (not to close), but to give time to arrange for a new phase of what said drama was intended to teach or develop. To further illustrate this point, let us take Paul's teaching in Heb. ix. especially the 27th and 28th verses. And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ (the antitype) was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without a sin offering unto salvation.

The apostle here brings this scene in the drama, so to speak, not only to the close of the present dispensation, but to the ushering in of the great day of the Lord, Peter's thousand year day, the great antitypical Sabbath, and of the ushering in of the great jubilee of jubilees. Paul, speaking of the Sabbaths, that they were shadows or types, (margin) of things to come. The weekly Sabbath must, I think, be included in the antitypical sabbaths, for the following, among other reasons, viz., that the ten commandments in their entirety, were a covenant.

And he declared unto you his covenant which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments, and he wrote them upon tables of stone. See Deut. iv. 13; also v. 1-6. In Lev. xxiii. We find that the seventh and first days were to be feast days; and the latter, together with the precedent (not a command) of the apostles constitutes (I should think) a good reason for the observance of the first day of the week. I am well aware that many of our good friends will take exception to this method of interpretation, but to me it appears obvious. I did not intend to go into any elaborate discussion of the Sabbath question at this time, but in order to give a true exposition of the types, according to my understanding of the same, this question rather forced itself upon my mind, and I thought I could do no less than to give it a passing notice. I cannot go further on this line of thought, except this, viz., that to keep the Sabbath of the decalogue, is to ignore this as a covenant, and that this (first) covenant is superceded by the new and better covenant, "established upon better promises." If any one should take issue here, and say that the old covenant has not yet given place to the new, let such an one read 1 Cor. xii., particularly the 25th verse, which reads as follows: "After the same manner, also, he took the cup, and when he had supped, saying, this cup is the new testament (covenant) in my blood; this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me.

This shows conclusively that the old covenant had given place to the new. Here the type had met its antitype. The type of the harvest had met its antitype in the person of Jesus Christ as the first fruits—the sheaf. The harvest, we know, has not yet followed, but the signs of the times fully warrant us in believing and saying that the time is near at hand. Lord hasten it!

Matthew and Luke give a graphic description of what shall transpire just prior to Christ's second coming, and our own corporeal senses take cognisance, that they have given us a perfect fac simile of what we daily see and hear; for proof please read Matt. xxiv. and Luke xxi, and after reading the same, together with Paul's letters to Timothy iv. 1-7, certainly every true Christian, will be constrained to pray—"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven."

Every day's observation is calculated to intensify this desire. But those, who are identified with what pertains to this life—its riches, honors, pleasures, etc., they would have no desire to change the programme, or the present status. Their motto or watchword would be, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die." In order for a right understanding of the Bible, it is necessary to know the import or significance of the types, symbols, figures or terms employed by the spirit, to illustrate certain truths. Christ used parables to illustrate certain phases of the kingdom of God. This mode of teaching, greatly facilitates the teaching on almost every subject we may wish to understand. Every school teacher well knows that illustrations on the black board, by maps, diagrams, charts, etc., greatly facilitate the instructions. Let us take, for illustration, Nebuchadnezzar's dream in Daniel ii. and Daniel's vision in chap. vii., and it is astonishing how much instruction is imparted within so small a compass, when we get the key to unlock the symbols. The kingdom of God in this book is the great objective point, as it is in all Christ's parables, and with all the Bible writers.

Daniel teaches the nature and the destiny—the rise and the fall of the four kingdoms which should precede the kingdom of God. In Daniel ii. he brings to view a great metallic image, beginning with the golden head, representing Babylon, silver to represent Medo-Persia, brass to represent Greece, and iron and clay, to represent the Roman or fourth kingdom. It will be seen at once, that when we constitute an analogy, we find a graduated depreciation existed from gold, down to clay; this is the inevitable result or conclusion. In chapter vii. four beasts represent the same four kingdoms, from the lion to a nondescript beast—a terrible beast. The analogy therefore would lead to the same conclusion. Either the advocates of the post-millennium doctrine, or the prophet Daniel in the conclusion drawn from the analogy, are at fault, to say nothing of the plain teaching of all the Bible writers. The analogy which Daniel institutes, teaches unmistakably that the kingdom of God will conquer the fourth kingdom, as that did the third, and so on to the first kingdom. The analogy holds good also, with regard to the territory, i. e., under (not above) the whole heaven, which is to be given to the saints; also in its laws, subjects and king, together with a body of rulers or a cabinet, together with a capital city—the New Jerusalem. The meek shall inherit the earth, when redeemed from the curse. But a small percentage of the types have as yet reached their antitypes. Jesus has not yet come out of the most holy, to bless his waiting people. The great jubilee trumpet has not yet sounded, to proclaim liberty to all the inhabitants of the land, those who have waxed poor under the present dispensation, have not returned to their possessions. It does not detract in the least from the interest which the true Christian, one who is waiting patiently for our great Antitypical High Priest to come out of the most holy place (heaven) to bless his waiting people, because, a long time (apparently) intervenes between the type and the antitype. The shadow may be long, but there can be no mistaking the one at from which it emanated, and that towards which it unmistakably points. The objections arising from this source, will at once vanish if we consult the Scriptures relative to this point, and by turning to the Prophet Hosea, iii. 4, 5, which reads thus: "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without a teraphim. Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." The prophet here teaches, that the typical system is not a defunct system, nor the kingdom of Israel a defunct kingdom: both are to be not only restored, but to be exalted to a higher plane. Both were styled glorious, but they have little now, by reason of the glory that will excel. See 2 Cor. iii.

Editor Restitution:

This communication should have been several weeks earlier, only I had not the information I needed concerning some that have fallen asleep. The first part of our epistle, will be in connection with the life and death of our dear Brother T. C. Allerton, who departed this life, July 12, 1885, about 6 p. m.

We will give just a brief outline as far as we can, of the life and conduct of our deceased brother, reaching back as far as we can remember, having had any acquaintance with the Allerton family, which is about twenty years, but more especially with our dear brother who has fallen asleep in Christ.

Most of the time for the past seven years, he has been following his profession as a carpenter and joiner in our shop, and took the work as it came, either in the shop or outside. But very frequently he has taken an active part, as a foreman, or wherever he was wanted, from the highest to the lowest grade of work, and always ready to do his share, and sometimes more than his share, as he was always interested for, and faithful to his employer, and never wanting to be paid for what he did not earn.

He was faithful to his Lord and Master, he was faithful to his employer, and he was faithful to his family and neighbors, full of sympathy for the suffering of earth, whether friend or foe. I frequently went to him for advice and counsel, and the last time I asked advice of him was but two days before he died, and was in regard to a poor wayward servant that was much abusing himself and neglecting his work. So I went quietly up to him as he was busy at his bench, and plainly asked him just what he would do in the matter if it was his case to deal with,—as he was well acquainted with the one I asked advice about,—and as we were about to let our subject go and seek employment elsewhere, our Brother A. broke the silence and said, I guess I would give him another trial. These words seemed to come from his inmost feelings, and were full of pity and kindness toward the fallen ones of earth. We acted upon his advice at once, and have not yet regretted so doing.

The subject of this article, was an immersed believer in the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, and an earnest worker for the advancement of the cause of truth, but in a very quiet and unassuming way.

Our Brother Allerton first heard the good news—the gospel of the kingdom—at Astalan, Jefferson Co., Wisconsin, about twenty-five years ago, and on investigation, found it to be God's truth, and also soon found it in his heart to believe and obey the same, and I never heard him express any regret for taking the steps he did. But just the opposite, for he loved to talk—in private—to his fellows, about the things he had believed. He did not do it with long prayers, nor standing upon the street corners, so as to be seen of men, but apparently he took the footsteps of the meek and lowly Jesus, for our brother was of a meek and quiet spirit, and so he conducted himself. He was no public speaker, but for the truth's sake and for his Master's sake, has often wished he could speak in public, so as to proclaim that life-saving gospel to the world and to his fellow workmen, who in a body went to his funeral, and showed their sympathy by sending a very large pillow made up at great cost, of the very choicest of flowers used on such occasions, with the words very beautifully arranged, "Our fellow workman."

Quite a large gathering of those of like faith and his friends, at the burial. Words of comfort and exhortation were spoken by our very aged brother J. M. Judson, and well adapted to the occasion, both to comfort the bereaved family, and to strengthen the cause which our deceased brother had lived and died by, for we believe that he both lived and died a Christian. The weather being warm we laid him away in the vault at Lake View Cemetery, until our Sister Allerton could finally decide where she should select as his final resting-place, till the Life Giver shall come to call him forth again to an immortal life that can die no more.

Finally she selected East Cleveland Cemetery, and in a few days, we removed him to the tomb to await the glorious resurrection morn, when the dead in Christ shall rise first, and as we stood and watched our brother being consigned to mother earth, we made the remark to a brother that also stood by, "There lays a Christian, a faithful servant; and a kind and indulgent husband and father and neighbor." Job says, Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not. And just so with our brother, he came to his daily work as usual on July 11th and worked all day, in rather unusual good spirits, and went away in the evening to return to his home, in the same way, and on the following day, (which was Sunday) he was at his place as usual in the meeting of those of the One Faith, to partake of the emblems of Christ's broken body and shed blood. And after the meeting was over he returned to his home and partook of his dinner, and then sat down to read, but being rather tired he fell to sleep, so his good wife suggested that he go and lay down on the bed and rest, which he did, but in a short time he was taken with a suffocating feeling in his throat and had to get up; so he passed down stairs and went at once out into the garden at rear of the house, and sat in a chair. He became worse, which his daughter discovered, and she ran to his assistance. But the enemy had got fast hold of him, and soon claimed him as his. He died in a few minutes after being taken sick, aged 58 years.

Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.

Thus ended the life of a consistent Christian, a worthy husband and father, and a good citizen and neighbor.

Strange as it may appear, while we were attending to the funeral rites of our Brother Allerton, another of our worthy brethren, was at his daily avocation—as a gate-keeper at the works of the Cleveland Rolling Mill Co., while a strike among the hands was in progress, and an assault was made upon the works at the gate where our deceased brother was stationed. He not being in the best of health got very much excited over the fight between the mob and the police, which I have no doubt very much hastened his death, for at evening he went home as usual, and on his arrival there, he complained of great pain in his chest, and then lay down on a lounge, but could not remain there on account of suffocation, etc., so he sat up in a chair, but grew worse and passed away in about fifteen minutes after he arrived at his home. His name being Isaac Bisser, aged 58 years.

A years ago, our Brother Bisser heard the good news of the kingdom and the name, and found it in his heart to believe and obey the same by being baptized in the water of Lake Erie, by brother Jones who taught him the truth.

He too lived and died a Christian, and as we have said, there seemed to be no other two brethren that were better fitted for that great change which came so very suddenly in both cases. Oh, what a shock to all the brethren. It seemed hard to realize it, but we can say with Paul to Timothy (1 Tim. v. 13, 14,) But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died, and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. Wherefore comfort one another with these words. All of the foregoing will fully apply to both of our deceased Brethren, whose seats are now empty waiting to be filled by some one who shall be just simple minded enough to believe and obey God's most precious word of truth, The gospel.

L. C. CATTELL.

They sleep in Jesus. Yes, and
Jesus made known the path of light
Which righteous men shall tread;
He showed the way, the truth, the life,
In rising from the dead.
Then let these fleshly yearnings cease,
Let joy our hearts expand:
Death is to them a peaceful sleep,
Who keep their Lord's command.
Their sleeping dust, ere long shall rise,
The sleeping saints awake;
When Christ in glory rents the skies,
And all the kingdoms shake.

Report of Annual Assembly.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God met according to announcement in THE RESTITUTION, and was an occasion never to be forgotten, not simply because, as the Press of this city stated "eminent ministers were present and the meeting satisfactory to the church and the visitors," but for the greater reason that in response to the article on Primitive Christianity printed in the August 5th number of THE RESTITUTION (Q. V.) voices from nine different states and the District of Columbia accorded with the announcement therein contained, that there is now existing a condition of things "demanding on the part of Christians, something more than preaching and praying, or even the spreading abroad of the truth." An introductory discourse from 1st chapter of Paul's Epistle to the Church of Corinth, by Elder N. J. Morgan, to the edification of the assembly, initiated the proceedings. A letter from the Church of God, Brooklyn, N. Y., and most kind and loving epistles from Brother John Donaldson and Samuel Wilson, were also read. Citizens of the City of Winchester, among whom the City Press was well represented, formed part of the audience, and listened with interest to the evidences set forth, that this was the time for the reinauguration of "A true Christian Community on the Scriptural basis" (see manifesto) to the accomplishment of which Brethren stood pledged and were willing to lay all on the altar, when the time arrived to do so.

Especially was it enforced on the minds of all present that this was not a one man movement, that it recognized only one invisible leader, the Lord Jesus Christ, and all others Brethren, and that it would admit none of the leaven of modern mental or material speculation, all being held together by the free law of mutual attraction, and regulated by the Bible Standard. Nor could it be called a premature movement, for for thirty years a number of those composing the association had been living as best they could under unfavorable conditions, the principles of Primitive Christianity, and as it was argued had themselves been providentially preparing, and not only so but as shown by evidences contained in letters, others also had been preparing, first by receiving and digesting doctrinal truths of a restitutionary character ably and persistently set forth for as many years by THE RESTITUTION and other cotemporaries, in a word, by a Press appointed of God, as the Association believe for a specific work, and without which the grand outcome would have been impracticable: and secondly by reading up outside efforts at co-operation, comparing notes and reasoning with one another, etc., (see again manifesto) had been preparing, for what? for co-operative Christianity (on a scale commensurate with these times). That constitution of things, which in the beginning of this age received the fulfillment of the Divine promise contained in the following: And Jesus answered and said, verily I say unto you, there is no man that hath left house or brethren, or sisters, or father or mother, or wife or children or lands, for my sake and the gospel's, but he shall receive a hundredfold now in this time, houses and brethren and sisters and mothers and children and lands with persecutions; and in the world to come eternal life." Mark x. 29-30.

And so it was reasoned, according to the Scriptures, that now, in Christian communal relations such as Christ taught, and the early Christians practiced until scattered abroad for a purpose (succeeding then under much more unfavorable conditions than at present exist), relations having for an object the opposite of that which obtains among most professing Christians to-day, and is very generally soul absorbing, the individual accumulation of wealth, now with such favorable governmental regulations as exist in this country. "A single county filled with co-operative communities on a real Christian basis, with sole ownership and the legal right to exclude all that is opposed to Christian principles, would astound the world by its material prosperity and preach the gospel more effectually than a host of evangelists" (see manifesto), and enable all who enter into communal relations and abide by the Bible Standard, to realize first what has been quoted as promised in the word of God, and forever silence infidel objections, as nothing else can.

"We know that just such human material exists at the present day," (for such a purpose) "and our mission is to bring them into relation to each other." Universal harmony pervaded the assembly, and members of the delegation from this state with friends from Washington, D. C., and those resident here all partook of the memorial feast, Bro. Morgan presiding, who with great unction and power dwelt upon the relation existing between Christ and "the church of the living God the pillar and ground of the truth." 1 Tim. iii. 15. And upon that "pure and heaven born principle, nurtured in the infinite counsel of heaven, and brought down to the sons of men amid the songs of angels by the blessed Savior, ratified by the blood of the everlasting covenant to gather together in one, all things in Christ, both which are in heaven of which are upon earth, even in him—were invited to participate in the rich memorials of a Savior's love, and expressed the belief during the time of our meeting, that teachings given for the past thirty years in this country, sometimes in the midst of opposition and even persecution, would yet be universally recognized as true and Christian communal relations be established, and attendant blessings realized, even in this present age, and in the lifetime of some present, according to the promise of our Lord already quoted, which applies as much to the close as the beginning of the age, for he says "There is no man," etc. In the light of co-operative Christianity the application of the promise is plain and in no other. After the departure of the delegations meetings were kept up during the week in the interest of the cause, and some subscribers obtained for THE RESTITUTION and also for "Words of Truth" published by the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge (A. P. C. K.) and with which all the members of the Brotherhood are identified. One thousand manifestos printed by order of the Association for Promotion of Primitive Christianity, were on hand, and word given then as now, that all desiring copies may have (free by mail) by addressing A. P. P. C. House of the Brethren, Winchester, Va.

The epidemic, if it continues, will stop the grand annual carnival, and Montreal will thus be deprived of most of its attractiveness. On September 4th a large meeting of representative business men was held to discuss measures for the suppression of the epidemic. The municipal authorities came in for severe handling, and Montreal was declared by one speaker to be in a chronic state of filthy, and the worst-drained city on the continent. The average number of deaths is about fifteen a day. The Government has put in force an act which establishes a Board of Health and gives it arbitrary powers. The work of cleaning up and enforcing vaccination in municipalities adjoining Montreal may be executed by the board, at the cost of such municipalities.

LOCALITY OF EDEN. No. V.

DR. THOMAS'S VIEW.

But one of the best and most instructive writers on this, as well as on many other Biblical and prophetic subjects, who have appeared in these times, was the late John Thomas, M. D., of Hoboken, New York. We quote the following extracts from his writings, because they enter well into the subject, and also show it in its various bearings and relations to the present and the future, as well as to the past, and especially to 'Eden Restored.' The first quotation is from his work, "Elpis Israel:"

When Moses penned the words, 'in Eden,' he was westward in 'the wilderness of the land of Egypt.' From the expression, then, we are to understand, that there was a country styled Eden in his day, which lay to the eastward of his position. Adam and Eve were its aborigines. It was 'the East' of the Egyptians, as Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois are 'the West' of the Atlantic American States. It was quite an extensive range of country, and in after times became the seat of powerful dominions. It appears to have been well watered by the branches or tributaries, of 'a river that went,' or flowed, 'out of it.' There were four principal streams, whose names, as given by Moses, are the Pison, 'which compasseth the whole land of Havilah;' the Gihon, 'the same is it which compasseth the whole land of Khush,' or Khushistan; the third, the Hiddekel, or Tigris; 'that is it which goeth eastward to Assyria. And the fourth river is the Euphrates,' frequently styled in the Scriptures, 'the Great River.' On the map before me, there are four rivers which flow together, and at length form a river which falls into the Persian Gulf. This indicates the country called Eden, namely, that which is watered by these rivers; so that we may reasonably conclude, that in early times it comprehended the land east of the Jordan, Syria, Assyria, part of Persia, Khushistan, and the original settlements of Ishmael.

This country, in after ages, came to be denominated 'the Garden of the Lord;' and the kings who reigned in it, 'the Trees of Eden.' It was no doubt termed the Lord's garden as a whole, from the fact of his having, in the beginning, planted a garden in it where he put the man; so that the name of a small part of Eden, came to be applied by his family in the time of Seth, Noah, Shem, Abraham, and Moses, to the whole region; more especially as the future Paradise is to occupy a considerable portion of its ancient limits.

The plain of Jordan appears to have been part of Eden from the following texts: 'Lot beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere as the garden of the Lord. Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east; and dwelled in the cities of the plain;' that is, in the East, or Eden.....

That Eden extended to the Mediterranean, or 'Great Sea,' appears from Ezekiel's prophecy against Tyre. Addressing the Tyrian royality, he says, 'thou hast been in Eden, the garden of the Lord. Thou wast upon the holy mountain of God. Thou wast perfect in thy ways from the day thou wast created, till iniquity was found in thee. Therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God. Thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt thou be any more.' The meaning of this is obvious to one acquainted with the history of Tyre. It was a royality of Palestine in Upper Galilee, whose king, Hiram, was in intimate alliance with Solomon. He appears to have been a proselyte worshipper of the God of Israel; whom his successors some time afterwards forsook; and therefore God suppressed the kingdom of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar for seventy years; and finally by the Greeks....

Eden is emphatically the Lord's land, or garden; and from the creation till the breaking off of Israel's olive branch, the principal, and almost only, theatre upon which he exhibited his wonders to the nations in the days of old. Egypt and its wilderness may be excepted for forty years. Beyond its limits was outer darkness. Eden only was favored with light, until the gospel found its way among the nations of the west; and although darkness covers the land, and gross darkness the people; yet the Lord, its light, will arise upon it, and his glory shall be seen there....

These testimonies reveal a future state in regard to Eden, of which its primitive garden is a beautiful and appropriate representation. Once the seat of a Paradise on a small scale, it is destined to be transformed from its present desolation into 'the Paradise of God.' The country of the four rivers, even to the west from sea to sea, is predetermined to shine forth as 'the glory of all lands.' Paradise hath no other locality. Other orbs may have their Paradise; but as far as man is concerned, the Paradise of God will be by him planted in Eden according to 'the promise.' 'In that day, shall Israel be the third with Egypt and Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land;' that is, of Eden: 'whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt, my people, and Assyria, the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance.'

The second extract is from his elaborate work "Eureka," an Exposition of the Apocalypse:

This word "Paradise" is merely a transfer from one language to another, —that is, it is not translated. It is originally a Persian word, transferred from that tongue to the Hebrew; and from the Hebrew to the Greek; and from the Greek to the English. In the Perso-Hebraic form it is "pardais," and occurs in Nehem. ii. 8, where one Asaph is designated as 'the keeper of the "pardais" which belongs to the king' of Persia; that is, a "pardais" in Palestine, from which the king authorized Nehemiah to take timber to make beams for the gates of the palace,' and so forth. It is evident, from this, that a "pardais" was a tract of land containing trees, from which timber might be hewn. In the English version it is translated by the word "forest."

This word occurs in two other places of the Scriptures: first, in Eccl. ii. 5. Here Solomon says; 'I make for myself gardens, and "pardaisim," and I planted trees in them of all fruits; I made me pools of waters for to irrigate with these the wood, making the trees to grow.' In the English version "pardaisim" is rendered 'orchards.' From this text it is easy to perceive what "pardaisim" were understood to be in Solomon's time. They were tracts of land planted with all kinds of fruit trees, and irrigated with streams of water, to make the trees productive.

The third place where the word occurs is in Cant. iv. 13. The passage reads thus, 'A garden enclosed is my sister bride, a spring shut up, a fountain sealed. Thy sprouts are "pardais" of pomegranate trees, with fruit of most pleasant ones; cyprus-flowers with spikenards. Spikenard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief of the spices; a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters and streams from Lebanon.' The literal of this exhibits a "pardais" as a beautiful enclosure, and illustrates the sort of garden our first parents were placed in at the beginning. Speaking of this, Moses says, "Yahweh Elohim planted a garden in Eden of the East. And Yahweh Elohim made to grow out of the ground every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food; and a Tree of the Lives in the midst of the garden, and a Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil. And a river went out of Eden for to water the garden; and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads. The name of the first was Pison; that compasseth the whole region of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that region is good: there is pearl and the stone of the onyx. And the name of the second river Gihon; that encompasseth the whole region of Khush. And the name of the third river Hiddekel; that flowing eastward of Asshur. And the fourth river the Euphrates,'—Gen. ii. 8. [Note—It will be seen that Dr. Thomas has given better renderings than our authorized version.]

From these examples we may know what the Hebrews understood by a "pardais," namely, a tract of land well watered, and abounding with choice trees, pleasant to the eyes, and yielding luscious fruits, and fragrant flowers; and rich in gold, and pearls, and precious stones. The Greeks called the Hebrew and Persian "pardais" by the word "paradeisos," which has been transferred into our language, and anglicised by changing "eisos" into "ise," and so making Paradise.

The Hebrews were instructed out of the law and the prophets. Hence, all the truth they believed was in harmony with these writings, while all their errors obtained place in their minds by adopting the speculations of the heathen, and thinking after their own vain conceits, as Jews and Gentiles do at this day. Corrupted as they were by myths and traditions, they never imagine Paradise to be the grave, or sheol, or hades, or some ethereal region 'beyond the solar system,' or in the skies! It remained for the reverend and learned doctors of the Nikolaitan Apostasy to proclaim this marvellous absurdity. The Jews knew what Paradise signified, for they were taught it in glowing terms by many of the prophets.

Instructed by these, they knew that the area of Paradise belonged to the country styled 'Eden.' When Moses wrote the passage quoted above, he was westward in 'the wilderness of the land of Egypt.' He says, "Yahweh-Elohim" 'planted a garden in Eden of the East.' This region was so named because of the delightful and pleasant character of the land and climate, from Eden, 'delight, pleasure.' Eden was a part of the East, as Ohio is a part of the West. It was quite an extensive range of country, and in after times became the seat of powerful dominions. It appears to have been well watered by the tributaries to 'a river that flowed out of Eden.' These were four principal streams—the Chesapes, the Gyndes, the Hiddekel, and Euphrates; of which the Hiddekel, or Tigris, and the Euphrates, are well known. The Hiddekel, Moses says, 'is eastward of Asshur;' that is, eastward of Nimrod's original settlements between the Tigris and Euphrates. The Chesapes, or Pishon, flows down from Media; and the Gyndes, or Gihon, is the river of Khushistan. These four rivers water the Eden of the East; and flowing out of it in a confluence of waters, empty themselves at length into the Persian Gulf.

This country in after ages, came to be denominated 'the Garden of Yahweh;' and the powers reigning in it, 'the Trees of Eden.' It came, doubtless to be styled Yahweh's Garden, as a whole, from the fact of his having in the beginning planted a garden in it for Adam and Eve; so that the name of a small part of Eden came to be applied by his family, in the time of Abraham and his posterity, to the whole region; more especially as the prophets of their race testify that the future Paradise is to occupy a considerable portion of its ancient limits.

That the Holy Land is a part of the Eden of the East, appears from certain prophecies of Ezekiel. In setting forth the certainty of the overthrow of Pharaoh, king of Egypt, by the king of Babylon, the Spirit recapitulates the power and dominion of the Ninevite dynasty of Assyria; which, however, was not able to withstand the king of Babylon, 'the mighty one of the heathen;' and, therefore, there was no hope for Egypt of a successful resistance. In the recapitulation, the Ninevite Assyrian is styled 'a cedar in Lebanon;' that is, his dominion extended over the land of the Ten Tribes of Israel, in which are the cedar-crowned mountains of Lebanon. After describing the greatness of his power by the magnitude of the cedar, the Spirit saith, 'the cedars in the Garden of Elohim could not hide him; nor was any tree in the Garden of Elohim like to him in his beauty, I made him fair by the multitude of his branches; so that all the trees of Eden in the Garden of the Elohim envied him'—ch. xxxi. 3, 8, 9. These trees were the royalties of Mesopotamia, Syria, Israel, and so forth, which the kings of Assyria had abolished (Isa. xxxvii. 11-18), and which 'could not hide him,' or prevent him getting the ascendency over them. It is clear, then, from the terms of this beautiful allegory, that the countries I have indicated were parts of the Eden of the East; that as a whole it is styled the Garden of the Elohim; and that the trees are the royalties of the land.

That Eden extended to the Mediterranean or 'Great Sea,' appears from Ezekiel's prophecy against Tyre. Addressing this Power, he says, 'Thou hast been in Eden a Garden of Elohim. Thou hast been upon the holy mountain of Elohim. Thou was perfect in thy ways from the day thou wast created till iniquity was found in thee. Therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of Elohim. Thou shalt be a terror, and nothing of thee during the olahm'—xxviii. 13-19. The meaning of this is obvious to one acquainted with the history of Tyre. It was a royalty of Palestine in Upper Galilee, whose king, Hiram, was in intimate alliance with Solomon. He appears to have been a proselyte to Judaism, which his successors sometime afterwards abandoned; and therefore Yahweh Ts'avaoth suppressed the kingdom of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar for seventy years; and for the rest of the olahm, by the Greeks.

Eden has been a field of blood from the beginning of the contest between the 'Seed of the Woman,' and the 'Seed of the Serpent,' until now; and will yet continue to be until the Serpent Power be broken upon the mountains of Israel. It was in Eden that Abel died by the hand of Cain. There also Abel's antitype was wounded in the heel when 'he was made a curse for his brethren' by hanging upon a tree—Gal. iii. 13; and lastly, to fill up the measure of the iniquity of the blood-defiled land, the serpents of Israel slew the son of Barachias between the temple and the altar. But the blood of the saints shed in Eden did not cry to him in vain for vengeance; for as the Lord Jesus predicted, so it came to pass. 'Behold,' said he, to that generation of vipers, 'I send your prophets, and wise men, and scribes; and some of them ye will kill and crucify; and some of them ye will scourge in your synagogues, and persecute from city to city; that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the land, from the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar.'—Matt. xviii. 35.—Re-ekah.

MICA PEN-NOTES.

HUMILITY.—A rain-drop that fell on a tree growing in the garden, which had suffered from the heat and drought of summer, was content along with its fellow drops, to take its way humbly down the stem of the tree to the ground, and to go down into the earth quite out of sight. Another drop that in striking a leaf appeared suddenly as a little bubble, was by its enlarged circumference, quite impressed with a new idea of its own importance, and as it marked its late companion disappearing below the earth, it said with an account of conceit as much as of pity: "Alas, for that foolish unfortunate that is doomed to go into obscurity and darkness, and be lost, while I remain visible and conspicuous in my chosen element (the air), and find myself much improved in size and appearance." And with that it began to swell and grow, until it thought itself a marvel for beauty and proportion, and that surely other falling drops must be very blind not to notice what a great promotion it enjoyed, and what a gigantic size it had attained to, when suddenly in the twinkling of an eye it burst and altogether disappeared. Meanwhile the humble drop that was content to do its mission, and go down into the dirt, entered into the open mouths of a tiny root, and was irresistibly drawn upward; continuing its ascent, in a few days it found itself high up in the air snugly stowed in an upper chamber of the tree, and making itself a blessing, by giving greenness and beauty to a little bud. And there it continued a long time useful and happy, growing and expanding, fulfilling its mission faithfully, and enjoying the reward of its willingness to be used according to the design of nature, while its conceited fellow had long ago totally failed to come to any good account, and when it broke up, was never heard of that season. Moral. True humility has its reward of due promotion in God's time, while conceit, impatient and hasty, soon ends in catastrophe or disappointment.

TEXTUAL PREACHING.—It is a question of some moment, how much of the diversity of opinion, narrowness of view, and intense sectarian spirit in world, is truly due to the practice of textual preaching, by which local and subordinate teaching is made to assume importance and magnitude, out of proportion with the whole fabric of Scripture. A single text or even a little handful of texts that have a certain resemblance, assume pre-eminence and obtain complete control in the mind, and have the baneful tendency to altogether forbid a calm and clear and comprehensive understanding of Scripture as a whole. For example, upon Christ's assurance to Peter (quite misunderstood), the Romish Church stands erected into a fabric of vast proportions, and almost every denomination in Christendom seems to have some feature or diagnostic quality, which may be due largely to a failure to read and preach and hear the words of God in their mutual relations and in their entireness, rather than so constantly in minute portions. Not that close examination of particular passages, is not useful and necessary, but that every passage and the lesson it conveys, should be held subordinate to the whole, or viewed in connection with the whole, and that we should always be exceedingly careful to interpret all Scripture in harmony with the very highest and best idea of its author possible to be entertained. Always and everywhere, the highest and best possible idea of God is absolutely inseparable from goodness and love, in league with purity. Indeed, love, being itself the very soul of purity, tends to work out finally that very thing itself as a result in every sphere of its operation.

Let us be careful to remember the importance of knowing God as he is. And that the leading and governing principle of his character and administration is goodness. Goodness chooses justice itself and retains it jealously in all its works, because by it, it more surely attains its final and magnificent end.

It is the very trait and quality of goodness, that its view and use of Justice, is to secure its own supreme purpose and irrepressible yearning.

LEITER to A. J. Gordon (Baptist) Boston, Mass. I have read with interest and attention your address on "Reverence of Doctrine," and deem it worthy of extensive circulation, even to the extent of a million of copies,—though with modesty and deference I suggest, that from careful examination and much reflection, I would have a single intimation modified. Please allow the query, conscientiously submitted, whether after all, the extensive prevalence of that tendency to so magnify death as to practically nullify the necessity of the Lord's parousia, does not have its chief nutritive root, in the doctrine of post mortem and incorporeal consciousness? I would speak tenderly and considerately, but when the whole sum of testimony on that topic is carefully weighed, it does seem to me that the necessity and grandeur of the resurrection, goes pari passu with the conviction and conclusion of that suspension of intelligence along with every vital function, that renders Divine interposition a sine qua non. Just so long as we recognize life independent of all or any organic function whatever, and consciousness still subsisting in defiance of death, we reserve there a root and source of those ideas of disembodied glory, which so powerfully war against the doctrine of the second coming. There is the ever present fons et origo (excuse the Latinisms) of those errors of intermediate felicity which really supersede the need of the resurrection, in the mind of the multitude. If we come to see, what I think the Scripture teaches, viz., the weakness, the insensibility, the utter dependence of death, then we keep clear and incorrupt also, the vital certainty and necessity of the resurrection. A seed of wrong opinion, however minute or faint, still holds itself ready to germinate into some vast banyan of overshadowing umbrage.

"The spirit returns to God," unquestionably, but I do not see intelligence and entity there, for reasons various and many, such as these:—Where Christ went—(to the presence of God) —the disciples could not come. In type, only the high priest could go into the most holy. In Peter's day David was not ascended into the heavens. That which is recognized as, self-ness (to coin a word)—goes to Sheol by all Old Testament testimony, and it seems to me the New Testament is a unit with the Old, to the same intent, when thoroughly understood. Certainly "in Sheol there is no wisdom or knowledge." But why should I seem to teach you who have such a knowledge of the word? I simply desired to emphasize the misfortune of any idea, if not really Scriptural, which should always remain ready by its constant and certain susceptibility to exaggeration, to weaken, even to paralyze the force of the grand doctrine of the resurrection.

I heartily concur with you in the expectation of coming days of darkness and trouble, when the light of inspiration will be sorely needed, and when us on should be ready by God's grace to endure martyrdom, joyfully, if need be, for the sake of the better,—the first,—resurrection. Non-consciousness of the incorporeal, or any incorporeal entity,—or element of life—the true waiting repose of the pious dead in their Shepherd Chief,—this is that which ever endears the doctrine of the Second Advent as a glory, and grand anticipation—keeps its necessity pure and positive to the mind in life—and furnishes a pregnant and energetic counterpoise to all the silly conceits and poisonous fracases of spiritualism. "If the dead rise not," hope itself is dead,—fruition of hope becomes an impossibility—and all is lost. So vital and radical I think, is the inspired certificate of the fact.

Now pardon all this, or the obtrusion of it, if so it seems. Your pamphlet is a battle-ax, and is worthy to go round the civilized world, only, if you will pardon me I would modify barely one paragraph. I want to hear you, as well as read. I am only an obscure watcher, known to God, but mostly hidden out of sight.

With sympathy and good will.

C. COLEBROOK.

P. S.—It is a thought of interest to me, that profound unconsciousness of sleep brings us experimentally much quicker to the glory of the resurrection, than a poor half-life of waiting in Hades—and is in fact the only practically immediate experience of felicity, the intermediate, being a void and blank, unsusceptible of cognizance, and utterly out of appreciation. UNCLE JACOB'S PERPLEXITY. HIS AFTER-MEETING TALK WITH KATRINA.

"I tell you vot it is, Katrina," said honest Jacob Von Schlofstetter, coming home, one cool star-lit, autumn night, and sitting by the blaze of his kitchen fire,—"I haf been to most all der churches in dis big town of nineteen tousand peoples, und I haf got some strange ideas fery strong in mine head. I feels lonesome in dis place where I got no Lootheran brethren I can meet with for de worship of der great Gott, und my soul is sick for de want of some bodies to see where I can feel der Christian's freedom to shpeak and tell all de ways of Gott to his believing peoples.—Und I joost come to dis opinion,—dey haf all forgot what de apostle say, 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers,' for nopody in all dese twoff months dat I lif here, efer say one wort to me. 'Vot is your name?' or 'goot evening brudder Jacob' 'und afery pody is joost welcome to take some part in our meeting, und we hope you will feel at home mit all dese worshipping children of Gott.'

No! So I joost sit still all der time und thinks mit myself. I wonder if I should not be a trouble und a scandal to some bodies, if I should shpeak a wort in dis assembly for de Master's cause. Dey will say 'who is dat strange man? He must be an old countryman py his progue. I guess he potter keep shtill all der time,' und so I tink if nopody care und nopody take me py the hand, und nopody shpeak de least mite of an encouraging wort, und nopody say, Gott bless de Pilgrims und de strangers,—fary well! —because der Pible say to go swift to hear, und slow to speak, und I will nefer make anypody grieved by robbing dem of der two or tree minutes apiece, often if der pe some times when der leader get nerfous because efery pody keeps to still. So I say I haf tried several churches und dey haf der bright gas lights und der good hymns, und der music und der Scripture reading und de explanations of der passages, but nopody efer say we gif goot welcome to strangers and Gott bless dem to pray or to shpeak; or to sing, und I say, Jacob, you haf nefer forgot to mind your own planess a leetle, and I go away ashamed in my mind, not because I am ashamed of my religion or my profession, but because I carry der weight of a question I haf not got de wisdom to determine. Do der Christian peoples care for de witness of a strangar, or will dey tink, we wish he would joost go back to Obermany, or hold his tongue in our prayer meetings? I know fery well dot somepodies say in dere minds, of course dis is der public meeting for all der Christians dat come when der great bell sound in der steeple, und of course der French or der Cherman und efery body else can use his priffilege, but what goot is dat to me when I cannot see into der brain of der minister, or deacon or principal peoples, to know what dey think? How can I read der writing when de book is not open? How can I see through blinds ofer de windows? What does du silence say so plainly, as dot you can keep still too? What does du unrecognising manner signify, said Jacob waxing eloquent, "dat dot we haf no anxiety to make friends with a mere visitor, or to git any sign dat we wish to lete or encourage a brudder, efen though his heart is beafy with loneliness, or pardoned with a yearning for de privilege of de communion of honest goot worts. So you see how I feels, Katrina, mine goot frau, und I tinks, we, mineself, und mine oderself, dot is you, we will praise Gott, here in our own house togeder, und talk of all der wondrous works of de Lord in dis place, for where ofer two are met togeder, dere, Jesus says, I am in der midst of you. Und when I haf peen to der meetings, on der Sappath day, I haf peen glad to take a little seat far off in de gallory, because I feel altogeder de best in a corner, pretty much out of sight. Und dere, in secret, I prays to der great Gott, und say, 'Lord, when you please, dere will be more freedom und sympathy, und a leetle more of de simplicity of der apostles. When you please, dere will pe more equality, more charity, more condescension, more brudderly love. When you please, dere will pe more humble mindedness of der believers.' Katrina mine frau, I am sure dot dere is too much formality in de public worship, und dot dere is need of more comfort of love dan of more comfort of ease and ornament and beaut, in der sanctuaries. Der peoples need more grace of godly humility, dan more grace of manners und apparel, more music of praise in de heart dan praise of der lips of der singers, and dunder of der organs."

And Jacob arose, and putting on his spectacles, asked his good Katrina "if she would be good enough to hand him the Cherman Pible from de bureau py de clock." C. C.

Editor Restitution:

By request, I give a synopsis of our late travels. Myself and wife started July second, to Brother Roland Thomas,' about sixteen miles from here. He is a believer in the truths we cherish, and father-in-law to one of my sons, and one of my daughters. We talked of the things pertaining to the kingdom, left them a lot of THE RESTITUTIONS. The next morning started for our daughter's about sixteen miles farther. The next being the fourth, my son-in-law shut down his mill and took me to Tidioute to take the train for Salamanca, about sixty-eight miles. Having read Brother J. B. Lent's notice in THE RESTITUTION, I wrote him that I would be there for the fifth. He met me at the train and escorted me to his house. Found we were quite well acquainted, as Father and Mother Ongley used to put up at his father's in Canada, and frequently spoke of son John T. Sunday a. m., and evening we had the Baptist Church to preach in, and gave a synopsis of the hope we cherish, to-wit, eternal life, salvation, the kingdom, resurrection, restitution, glory, and the second coming of Christ, when his reward will be with him, and his work before him. Sixth, went back to where I left my wife at my daughter's. In the night, my son and his wife came from home, having received a dispatch that my only sister, of Havanah, N. Y., was dead. Next morning, self and wife started for the house of mourning, 252 miles, but was too late to see her on account of not connecting with trains on different roads. We stayed with our relatives eight days, and then returned to Salamanca. Preached Thursday evening on the Gospel, showing that it embraced the items of the hope as presented by us when we were there before. Friday evening we spoke on "the faith once delivered to the saints." Sunday p. m., by request, spoke on Dispensational Truth, as shown by my chart of the Great Week. Hope good was done, as some were interested. Brother Lent and family were very kind to us, and did not send us away empty, although he advertised our meeting in different papers, with "No collection" added to it. When I see the glorious truth relating to the coming age, I wonder that prominent Adventists can say, I hate the age to come, as some have said in this region. Hope they will yet see their mistake, and not only profess to love his appearing, but his work before him. I expect to preach it while I am able and have an opportunity. Yours in the hope.

JOHN T. ONGLEY.

ROWE.—At Oshawa, Ont., July 30, 1885, Benjamin Rowe, aged 88 years and four months.

Brother Rowe was born in England, came to Canada when a young man, with his beloved wife, who died a number of years ago.

The country where he settled being new, their lot, at first, was hard, in the midst of quite a large family, whom they raised up.

Brother Rowe was among those who embraced the doctrine of Christ to come and reign on the earth, in the days of the lamented William Miller. But he was not like some who have stuck their stakes, saying, we have learned it all. Not so! His course was onward as a learner in the school of Christ.

The doctrine of the glorious future was a pleasing theme to him, believing that a future state of existence is made to depend upon a resurrection, and the resurrection is made to depend upon our being in Christ—"chosen in him before the foundation of the world."

In his death, the Church of God in Darlington has lost a good member, and children a kind father, and the community an honest man, and the writer a true friend. R. V. LYON.

FORREST.—At Havana, N. Y., July 5, 1885, of hemorrhage of the lungs, Mrs. M. E. Forrest, aged 69 years, and three months.

Sister Forrest was the only sister of the writer. She took care of Mother Ongley in her last days, and now she and her husband sleep with her in the same burial grounds, awaiting the resurrection morn, while Father Ongley sleeps near us in Pennsylvania.

Lyrical Poetry of the Bible.

JACOB'S BLESSING UPON JOSEPH.

Out of the hand of the Mighty One of Jacob,
From thence, from the shepherd, the rock of Israel
From the God of thy fathers who helped thee,
From the Almighty, who blessed thee,
Shall come the blessing of heaven above,
The blessings of the deep, which lieth beneath,
The blessings of the breast, and of the womb,
The blessings of thy father exceed the blessings of the ancient mountains,
The delight and ornament of the ancient hills!
Let it come upon the head of Joseph,
And upon the crown of the consecrated one of his brethren.

MOSES' BLESSING UPON JOSEPH.

Blessed of Jehovah be his land,
With the most precious things of heaven;
With dew, and with the deep which lieth beneath,]
And with the most precious products of the sun;
And with the choicest things quickened by the moon,
And with the greatest things of the ancient mountains,
And with the most excellent things of the eternal hills,
And with the richest things of the earth and her fulness.
And let the blessing of him that dwelleth in the thicket.
Come upon the head of Joseph,
Upon the crown of the chosen one of his brethren.

The closing passage of this ode has peculiar interest, as being substantially the last words of Moses to his people.

JEWISH NATIONALITY.—THE INDICATIONS OF ITS APPROACH.

The one hope and expectation of the Jews from the very commencement of their national existence has been the coming of Messiah. Moses prophesied that he would come: "The Lord thy God will raise unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me: unto him ye shall hearken." Deut. xviii. 15. Succeeding prophets described yet more fully the person and work of the expected Messiah. The Jews knew this, and a spirit of expectancy was awakened in the latter centuries of the Jewish era. There was a spirit of expectancy, and when Jesus came they gave him a hearing—at least, the common people—while a few faithful ones gave their avowed allegiance, and gave themselves to him. After his resurrection and ascension, when he was declared with power to be the Son of God, and while there was still a spirit of expectancy, we find three thousand on the day of Pentecost willingly receiving him, and on the succeeding day about five thousand. We are told a great multitude, both of men and women, believed on him, and then went forth and preached him boldly. And Paul himself went forth preaching Jesus, the Son of God, to the scattered Jews, who were in expectancy of the Messiah, and there was some everywhere who believed.

The Judeo-Christian element was the most important element in the history of the Primitive Church, although we are apt now to forget that. Still, after all, He was rejected by the nation to whom he was sent, but the election obtained mercy. But we find this spirit of expectancy continued, notwithstanding the building up of the Talmudical system, which arose to take the place of the Messiah, who had not come, and to account for his absence.

This expectancy has continued. In the second century a false Messiah arose, and drew many into rebellion against the Romans, who with great difficulty subdued him. Others followed at various times, and even in the seventeenth century one found adherents in all parts of Europe, Africa, and Asia.

Consider for a moment how much this spirit of expectancy had to do with the basis of the Christian Church. It was prevalent when Christ came, his disciples were drawn from the people who were looking for Messiah. After his death and resurrection the Apostle Paul, who was a Pharisee, went everywhere preaching the same message that Jesus was the expected One, and in all places some were convinced. In the miserable condition in which Jews now are—in many countries, scattered, scorned, hated, persecuted, and tormented, you will find burning in their hearts the hope of the Messiah affording them consolation and comfort. There are numbers of Jewish men and women who forgetting everything else, are rejoicing in this hope, and finding in it a balm for all their wounds.

In these times there are expectant ones in all lands; and even in the darkest times of the Talmudical system, when it pressed heavily on the Jews, squeezing out their faith, and in these rationalistic days, there were and there are Jews who have been led to acknowledge Christ, not by the labors of the church, but by the Spirit of God. The church of the Middle Ages did all it could to make Christianity hateful to the Jews, yet even then many, from the study of Scripture, were led to accept Christ as their Messiah. And this expectancy has been growing.

Since the beginning of this century, since the French Revolution, things have changed more or less concerning their outward condition; the Jews, even in the East, are no more shut up in Ghettoes, but take part in the social and political life, and in the arts of civilization and culture among the nations among whom they dwell. And a change has also come over the Rabbinical system. That system was the product of the isolation of the early ager, but the moment this isolation ceased Rabbinism lost its vitality, although the form still exists. Being gradually emancipated from the Rabbinical system many went to Atheism, some to Pantheism, and others adopted certain forms of the Christian Church in the synagogue, so that very much which distinguished our ancestors from the Gentiles began to disappear.

And here we come to see that, while modern Judaism and Rabbinism are diametrically opposed in many things, they have this in common—no Christ, no Christianity; while all the time there is still, as there has been in the past, a spirit of expectancy. Always in prosperity this dwindled away; in adversity it revived. So we see the strange fulfilment of the old words: "I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably to her." The alluring is to proceed by leading her into the wilderness; we have seen this wilderness in these days. Israel has been prosperous, and she forgot her hope. But there is a turning of the tide. We were startled years ago by the rising of anti-Semitism in Europe—the bloody persecutions in Russia. Blood lies at the door of those who enacted these persecutions, and there are many things which may well make the Christian Church ashamed. I would speak more strongly if it were not I were myself a Jew—but for all that these things mark the turn of the tide. Israel is being allured into the wilderness by the anti-Semitic movement, and notwithstanding the unbelieving spirit beginning to prevail, thousands of hearts have been turned to the hope of Israel, and more Jews have been brought into the Christian Church than in the preceding fifteen hundred years. And not merely individuals, but numbers, for we have now, it is estimated, in the Christian Church somewhere between sixty and seventy thousand Jews, and among these many distinguished for learning, Christian zeal, Christian love, and Christian works, which gives a little sample and foretaste of what will be the case when "all Israel shall be saved" and be recognized as the people of the Messiah, and be known everywhere as his messengers and missionaries.

Now here the anti-Semitic movement has occurred, marking the turning of the tide nationally. There were many who were striving to throw off their nationality—they would be Jews no longer; or, at all events, only Jewish Germans or Jewish Russians, not German Jews and Russian Jews. They wanted to throw off their Jewish nationality, and especially was this the case in Russia. But they have been made again to feel there is a deep chasm between them and the Gentiles, and that they cannot throw off their peculiarities, for, as it is written: "Lo! Thy people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations." They shall dwell alone; they were not doing so when the persecution broke out, but they saw their error, many of them, and now the special hope of Israel has revived, and many are talking of going back to Palestine.

Ever since the persecutions in Russia and the social ostracism in Germany, the longing of the nation to return to Palestine has been growing, and it is still gaining in intensity and extent, notwithstanding all the difficulties that meet them. Their eyes are being directed anew toward Jerusalem. I wish you believers would take that vis a vis. There is much spoken against Jewish missions, but they are accomplishing the grand purpose of God; and, besides, you are bound by the noblest motives of gratitude to give back to the Jew what you received of him. You received mercy through their unbelief, that through your mercy they may obtain mercy.—Theodore J. Meyer, in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

The Resurrection.

Resurrection is our hope; our hope in life, our hope in death. It is a purifying hope. It is a gladdening hope. It comforts us when laying in the grave the clay of those whom we have loved. It cheers us when feeling the weakness of our own frame, and thinking how soon we shall lie down in dust. It refreshes and elevates when we remember how much precious dust earth hath received since the day of righteous Abel. How sweet that name —"Resurrection!" It pours life into each vein and vigor into each nerve at the very mention of it!

It is not carnal thus to bend over the clay-cold corpse and look for the time when those very limbs shall move again; when that hand shall clasp ours as of old; when those eyes shall brighten; when those lips shall resume their suspended intercourse; when we shall feel the throbbings of that heart against ours, for it is scripture; it is spiritual. Some may call it sentimental; but it is our very nature. We cannot feel otherwise, even if we would. We cannot but love the clay. We cannot but be loth to part with it. We cannot but desire its reanimation.—The nature that God has given us can be satisfied with nothing less. And with nothing else has God purposed to satisfy it. "Thy brother shall rise again." "Them that have been laid to sleep by Jesus will God bring with him."

We feel the weight of that mortality that often makes life a burden; yet we say, "Not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality may be swallowed up of life." We lay within the tomb the desire of our eyes, yet we cling to the remains, and feel as if the earth that struck the coffin were wounding the body on which it falls. At such a moment the thought of opening graves and rising dust is unutterably precious. We shall see that face again. Not only does the soul that filled that clay still live; but that clay itself shall be revived. Our risen friend shall be in very deed—form, look, voice—the friend that we have known and loved.—Our risen brother will be all that we knew him here when, hand in hand, we passed through the wilderness together, cheered with the blessed thought that no separation could part us long, and that the grave itself could unlink neither hands nor hearts.—H. Bonar.

Youth's Column.

Where is Your Boy To-Night?

Life is teeming with evil snares,
The gates of sin are wide,
The rosy figures of pleasure wave,
And beckon the young inside.
Men of the world with open purse,
Seeking your own delight,
Peace and reason is wholly gone—
Where is your boy to-night?

Sirens are singing on every hand,
Lurking the ear of youth,
Gilded falsehood with silver notes
Drowneth the voice of truth.
Dainty ladies in costly robes,
Your parlors gleam with light,
Fate and beauty your senses steep—
Where is your boy to-night?

Tempting whispers of royal spoil
Flatter the youthful soul
Eagerly entering into life,
Restless of all control.
Needs are many, and duties stern
Crowd on the weary night;
Father, buried in business cares—
Where is your boy to-night?

Pitfalls lurk by the flowery way,
Vice has a golden gate;
Who shall guide the unwary feet
Into the highway straight?
Patient worker, with willing hand,
Keeping the home hearth bright;
Tired mother, with tender eyes—
Where is your boy to-night?

Turn his feet from the evil paths
Ere they have entered in;
Keep him unspotted while yet he may;
Earth is so stained with sin!
Ere he has learned to follow wrong,
Teach him to love the right;
Watch ere watching is wholly vain—
Where is your boy to-night?

"One good mother," says George Herbert, "is worth a hundred schoolmasters. In the home she is a loadstone to all ears and loadstar to all eyes." Imitation of her is constant—imitation which Bacon likens to a 'globe of precepts.' It is instruction; it is teaching without words, often exemplifying more than the tongue can teach. In the face of bad example, the best precepts are of but little avail. The example is followed, not the precepts. Indeed, precept at variance with practice is worse than useless, inasmuch as it only serves to teach that most cowardly of vices—hypocrisy."

Carrier Pigeons.

I was delighted with the four beautiful carrier pigeons, or doves, which my brother brought home one evening in July. He had bought them on the train, of a boy who had raised them and was taking them to Newark, N. J., to sell, probably to Mr. H. P. Baldwin, in that city, who is using carrier pigeons as messengers of the sea. One, which he had sent out with the steamer Westland, that sailed from New York on Friday, July 3, when set free flew home and was found in its coop with this note fastened to one of its legs:

"Sunday, July 5—Liberated at 1 P. M., 213 miles from Sandy Hook, wind south, fresh breeze, weather clear."

The bird reached land that night. Another was sent out with the Circassia. On the morning of June 7 it was set free at seventeen minutes after nine, when 255 miles out, and arrived home that same afternoon with its message. The message is written on very thin paper, rolled up tightly, and so fastened to the upper part of the bird's leg as not to hinder its flight, or be shaken off by the flapping of its wings. In olden times it was attached to the neck or wing.

You well remember the Bible story of Noah and his dove. Three times was it sent out of the ark that he might learn from it whether the waters of the deluge still covered the earth. The first time it "found no rest for the sole of its foot" and returned; the second time it came at evening with a plucked olive leaf in its mouth; the third time, finding a resting place, it remained away. Then Noah and his family were sure that they could safely leave the ark.

It is not known when or by whom pigeons, or doves, were first used to carry messages: all nations seem to have employed them in this service. The Egyptians carved them on stone as carrying messages from priests. Asiatics, Greeks and Romans all learned to prize these "couriers of the air," and sent them to bear important messages to places and persons far away.

The best carrier pigeons are said to be those which are trained in Turkey. There the young pigeon, as soon as it has strength to fly well, is taken in a covered basket half a mile from home and set at liberty. If it fails to return it is thought to be stupid and without value, but if it returns, the distance is increased more and more from time to time. The younger it is when this training is begun, the better is its chance for becoming a good messenger.

When a young wasp is ready to leave its nest it will not fly from it at once, but will hover near it for a while, and then move farther and farther away until it has made itself familiar with the objects about its home. So the carrier pigeon in its successive flights becomes acquainted with the objects which serve as landmarks, by which it is guided in returning home. Should these be hidden from its sight in foggy or hazy weather, or after a heavy fall of snow, the best trained pigeon would probably be lost if allowed to start for home. When let loose it rises to a great height, flies round and round as if looking for one of these landmarks, and then on seeing it darts away in its arrowy homeward flight. From its elevation it can see to a great distance. Its accuracy of flight is said to depend very much on the points of the compass, though each bird may have a different line of flight; one, for example, choosing a line east and west; another, a line north and south. The electric or magnetic currents continually crossing the earth are said to influence the birds.

The ordinary flight of the carrier pigeon is about thirty aerial miles an hour, though some fly much faster. I have read of twenty-four started at the same time to fly a distance of 150 miles. The one winning the prize arrived home in an hour and a half, having flown at least ninety miles in the hour: sixteen arrived an hour later.

Philadelphia claims to have a pigeon which has flown the greatest distance recorded in this country or abroad. On the 21st of July last, at 7:30 A. M., the "Red Whizzer," a pigeon belonging to R. L. Hayes, of that city, started from Pensacola, Fla. (to which place it had been taken), and arrived at its home in Philadelphia at 7:15 A. M., August 2. It had flown the air-line distance of 930 miles in 12 days 23½ hours. Another, named "China Bill," was found in its loft on Sunday morning, August 9. There were eight pigeons set free. Red Whizzer, having won the prize, will receive with golden leg-bands the name of "Pensacola," and will have freedom from all flights in the future.

Our pigeons, which I mentioned at the beginning of this article, were given a snug little house three stories high, with parlor on first floor, and sleeping-rooms above. The front door and three front windows open into a pleasant court-yard enclosed with a covered arbor of lattice work. In the back window, which is quite large, there are several panes of glass. As carrier pigeons are mild and gentle, true and loving, and have a great fondness for their home, I hoped that ours would live happily together, and in this "sweet home" would forget the one they had left. On Sunday morning, as I was starting for church, I heard my father say: "One of the pigeons has flown away!" "Has it gone home?" I inquired. "No doubt about that!" replied my brother. When I took my seat in our pretty village church I was still thinking of the lost bird, and, as it was early, I opened my Hymn Book and read these verses by Thomas Moore:

"The bird let loose in eastern skies,
When hastening fondly home,
Nor stops to shun the robber's eyes,
Nor flies
Where idle warblers roam;
But high she shoots through air and light,
Above all low delay,
Where nothing earthly bounds her sight,
Nor shadows dim her way.

"So grant me, God, from every care
And stain of passion free,
Aloft through Virtue's purer air,
To hold my course to thee!
No sin to cloud, no fear to stay
My soul, as home she springs!
Thy sunshine on her joyful way,
Thy freedom in her wings!"

This beautiful hymn, and our bird's homeward flight that lovely Sabbath morning, led me to remember the words of the great and good missionary Dr. Judson:

"I am not tired of my work, neither am I tired of the world, yet when Christ calls me home, I shall go with the gladness of a schoolboy bounding away from his school. Death will never take me by surprise: I feel so strong in Christ."

I visited our pigeons yesterday and learned, to my sorrow that another had flown away. How either escaped I cannot tell. This morning my brother wrote to the boy who sold them, telling him where our home is and asked him to send back the pigeons and two more. We do hope they will stay with us when they come.—Emily, in New York Observer.

Dear Children:

In this beautiful earth God has formed nothing without a purpose. Many children of men exist, but one only hath God begotten, whom he calls his well beloved Son, through whom alone we obtain eternal life. The high and lofty mountains whisper his wonderful ways, but one among them all, hath God chosen which is called "the Mountain of his Holiness," from thence "the perfection of beauty God hath shined." And of the depths of the sea, there is a river the streams thereof shall make glad the city of our God, "the pure river of water of life." And of all cattle which God hath caused the earth to bring forth, the lamb without spot or blemish did he provide for Israel's morning and evening sacrifice. Many cities have been constituted by man, but the City of the Great King hath God chosen to place his glorious name there, even Jerusalem, or "the vision of peace." Lovely flowers deck the earth with their splendor, but the rose of Sharon, or "this song," and the lilly of the valley, was God's choice of beauty, to characterize his beloved Son.

And of all the elegant birds with their rich plumage, and rapid flight, the little gentle dove was God's peculiar choice to bear in its mouth tidings of peace, and to be the very embodiment of eternal power resting on Jesus. Among all the trees, and fruitful plants God hath chosen one vine only, of which he is the husbandman. Of all peoples God has gotten to himself one nation, whom he called his first-born, when he brought them out of Egypt. Beautiful crowns of rare brilliancy have given glory and honor to the kings and queens of this world, but a crown, bright and sparkling with gems of light and life, has our Lord laid up for them who love his appearing.

Children beloved strive for this. I remain,

Your affectionate Teacher,

E. COFFMAN.

True Devotion to God.

"Whoever deceives himself, his heart has but a vain religion."—Revision's version of Jas. i. 26, last clause. How many mistakes are made respecting devotion! Some make it consist only in a multitude of prayers; others in numerous external works, which tend to the glory of God, and the good of our neighbor. Some place it in a continual desire to secure salvation, and others in rigid austerities. These things are all good—they are even necessary, in a certain degree; but we deceive ourselves, if we deem them the foundation and substance of true piety. That piety which sanctifies and devotes us entirely to God, consists in doing his whole will, and accomplishing precisely at the times, in the places, and in the circumstances which he appoints, all that he desires. Whatever may be the exploits which you wish to perform—however brilliant the deeds which you are pleased to attempt, you will be rewarded only so far as you have done the will of the sovereign Master. The servant who attends you may accomplish wonders in your house, but if he does not therein execute your wishes, you will make an account of his deeds, and will complain with reason that he serves you ill.

Perfect devotement, (from which the term devotion is derived,) implies, not only that we do God's will, but that we do it from love.—God accepts that only which is given with joy, and in all his requirements, it is always the heart which he demands. Such a master well deserves that we should consider it a privilege to be subject to him. This devotion must maintain itself equally on all occasions, leading us to submit to the divine will in that which naturally displeases, and afflicts us, and contravenes all our views, inclinations, and designs—yea, it should make us ready to sacrifice, if need be, our happiness, our property, our time, our liberty, our life, and our reputation. To have this disposition, and to realise its effects, is to exercise true devotion. But since the object which God has in view is often concealed from us, there remains another step of self-renouncement and mortification to be taken—to accomplish God's will by simple obedience or submission, an obedience which is blind, yet wise even in its blindness. This requirement is made of all without exception, since he who is the most enlightened, the best qualified to draw souls to God, and the most capable of conducting them to him needs himself to be led.

THE WORD OF GOD, THE OLD AND THE REVISED.

Did it ever occur to you, my reader, why we are told that "the word" of God is our authority for the truth? Why not words or language forsooth? Can much truth be expressed in one word? What is a word? Rhetoric answers, "a sign of an idea." Is an idea a thing of much importance? Let us see as tried by the test of Scripture and common sense as well.

A man has invented an instrumentality or process that is of great practical utility. You ask him where did you get hold of that process? Why, it was my own idea. He means of course the thought considered as a whole, as for instance the idea contained in the word "telegraphy," and, moreover, all the complex relations of ideas involved in the working out of the general idea contained in the word. Again in the Scriptures we find this statement in the 3d verse of the 5th chapter of Genesis, "And Adam begot according to his idea." Bear in mind now that this word idea is merely the old Greek word Anglicized and used by them just as we use it in common parlance. The importance of that one word in this passage has been ignored and overlooked in its relation to the question of the seed of promise and the idea contained in the word "regeneration," and when understood suggests immediately the world-wide difference there is between an Adamic begettal and a divine begettal, the one being a human idea and the other God's idea. Scripture illustration then of the truth of begettal would be, In the line of the promised seed Adam begot Seth according to his idea which was human of course.

In the line of the promised seed God begot Jesus Christ according to his idea which is divine of course, and this leads us up to the importance of another word, "God," which is the center of every converging line in the whole cosmos of truth. But there are just about as many different ideas of God as there are people and certainly as many as there are systems of theology. If, therefore, we have in our search after truth assumed as our first postulate that the Scriptures or God's word is the best authority for a definition of this name or term, we would look there for our authoritative teaching would we not? And the first thing for us to determine is whether it is an absolute or relative term, and to accurately determine this an analysis and definition of the word is of first importance. What then is the meaning of the word in the original which has been translated into English "God?" We find it to mean "a person who disposes according to his will or purpose" or in one word "a disposer." Then we find it indiscriminately applied to "God" or the Lord God Almighty to "Christ" "The Son of God" and to men who have been "rabsgotten" according to spirit or according to the laws of spiritual generation as contrasted with the begetting natural or according to flesh.

For instance, I have said ye (men) are gods and all sons of the Most High. Psa. lxxxi. (lxxxii. Septua.) Does this mean that these persons in any sense have become partakers of the personality of "the Lord God Almighty?" By no means, as clearly taught in the context and elsewhere in the Scriptures. What then? Why, that by their regeneration they become "disposers" in the spiritual cosmos as they were in a more limited and finite sense in the natural or Adamic cosmos into which they were first begotten according to natural law. The word "God" needs to be defined in order to determine what particular person or personal God is meant, and we do not find the teaching of Scripture in any way equivocal on this point. Every term and qualifying expression of which language is susceptible is applied to this one person whom we commonly know as "the Almighty." He is therefore "The God" who is a disposer in the sphere of the whole universe according to his sovereign will, and every other person or will be it human or angelic, must be subject to this one controlling, personal will. This is the fundamental teaching and first postulate of "The Word of God," and, starting with this as an accepted fact, everything that has been revealed is a harmonic whole in all its related parts. Moreover every system of theology built upon any other foundation than this first principle and premise must and does fall when tried by "The Word of God."

Having thus called the reader's attention briefly to the importance of one or two words in "The Word of God," I purpose in what I further have to say, to bring a few passages in "The Revised Old Testament" to the test of "The Word" and "the words." And first, Job xiii. 15, (Old Version), "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." (New Version), "Though he slay me yet will I wait for him." (American Company). "Behold he will slay me, I have no hope." (Orig.) "Though the Mighty One take me in hand when he hath overpowered me (lit. convinced) yet will I speak plainly and convict in his sight."

Again, Job xix. 25. (O. V.) "For I know that my Redeemer liveth and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." (R. V.) "But I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand up at last upon the earth. And after my skin hath thus been destroyed, yet from my flesh shall I see God." (Original) "For I know that there is an Everlasting One who is going to release me upon the earth, to stand up my skin that is going patiently through these (experiences)."

Where are all the vexatious questions that worried the English and American Committee of Savans for a month or more in their wrestling with this passage? Where is the word "flesh" or the word "worms" or the idea of "seeing God" in "out of" or "from" "my flesh?" Where are the words "at the latter day" or "at last" "my redeemer" "been thus destroyed?" They do not follow this passage certainly. For the next clause reads, "For these things have been fully revealed to me from the Lord."

Again. (O. V.) "O that mine adversary had written a book," (R. V.) "O that I had one to hear me, (lo here is my signature, let the Almighty answer me). And that I had the indictment which my adversary hath written. Original. "Who would have granted me a hearer, had I not feared the hand of the Lord, when, for instance, I put the garland (the mind of praise as a judge he means) upon shoulders, had I not recognized the bond of agreement which I had against any one? And had I not torn it up and given it back, though I had received nothing from the debtor? Job is here justifying himself to his three friends by reviewing his past life, private and public, and trying it by the law of uprightness. He is reviewing his career as an umpire and as a trustee of bonded securities, in the passage above quoted.

Again. O. V. Jeremiah xvii. 9, "The heart is deceitful and desperately wicked." R. V. "The heart is deceitful and desperately sick." Original. "The heart is profound—or deep—and it is man—or the natural man—and who will comprehend him?"—that is man. The next verse gives the answer. "I the Lord am the one who searcheth hearts and proveth the reins of secret thoughts, that I may give to each one according to his ways and according to the fruits of his doings. Where is the word "wicked" or "sick" or "desperately" and what did the translators do with the clause "and it is man?" And yet this has been one of the "proof-texts" to teach total depravity."

Again. O. V., ii. 17, "Every man is brutish by his knowledge." R. V., "Every man is become brutish and is without knowledge." Original, Every man hath become vain—having no utility—away from comprehension—that is when blinded by idolatry he has had no true comprehension of God. This has always been another proof-text.

Again. O. V., Ezekiel x. 13, "It was cried unto them in my hearing, O wheel." R. V., "They were called in my hearing the whirling wheels." Original, "And these wheels were addressed in my hearing as Gelgel—that is the same Gelgel was applied to them. The same word occurs in one of David's Psalms. The wicked fleeing before the wrath of the Lord are compared to a gelgel fleeing before the gale. The word is still used in the Arabic as the name of a plant in Syria whose seed is wheel shaped and goes rolling over the plain before the propelling wind. At least this is the statement of modern travelers there. This whole symbolic vision of Ezekiel is very little understood now-a-days. The concentric circles are evidently the courses of the planetary system in this cosmos of ours. God's throne is represented as over and above all these "circles" and the fact that life pervades them, even intelligent life, is intended to teach us probably that God presides over all this life whether animate or inanimate, according to law and rule. This symbolic teaching is like the symbolic teaching in John's Apocalypse, and must be interpreted by the same Scriptural rules. In one word it is sign or picture-teaching.

Again. O. V., Psalm xvi. 2, "My goodness extendeth not to thee." R. V., "I have no goodness beyond thee." Original, "Thou—God—hast no use for my good things."

Same Psalm 10, O. V., "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell." R. V., "Thou wilt not leave my soul in sheol." Original, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hades," meaning "my dead organism in the grave." Sheol is synonymous in the Hebrew with the Greek Hades, and Hades means literally a place where one does not see or know anything. It is a poetical expression for "the grave." The Scriptural teaching being very specific and full on the unconscious state of the dead between death and the resurrection. For instance "there is no thought nor device nor any such thing in the grave" Apostasy has borrowed its intermediate heaven and hell state of the dead directly from heathendom and not from the Bible. There is "a hell" taught in the Scriptures of the Old and New, but it is not designated by the word sheol or hades, but by the word Gehenna which is also a poetical or rather parable word full of meaning, as every obdurate sinner will some time learn to know.

Christ, in reproof of the old church apostasy, quotes the following words from the prophecy of Isaiah which we will do well to heed also. "In vain do they worship me, teaching commandments and teachings of men," Chapter xxix, 13.

Nehushtan or Piece of Brass.

In 2 Kings xviii. I read how Hezekiah after being make king, destroyed among other things, the brazen serpent which Moses had made. "For unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it: and he called it "Nehushtan" (piece of brass).

I think it was very prudent in Hezekiah waiting until he became a king before giving these illustrations of his religious zeal.

I read the narrative carefully to see if no one dared to condemn his acts, especially the breaking of the serpent which Moses had made, and which Jesus our Lord alluded to when speaking of how he would be put to death: —"And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up," etc.

I think were he to come into our places of worship now and attempt to break up our St. Patrick snakes, St. Moses snakes, bleeding pictures, front benches where "souls are born again," (the second time do you ask? Yes, and the third time, there is no limit to the number of times one can be born at the front bench,) his being a king would hardly be sufficient to save him from the wrath of the worshipers.

I am not much of a believer in relics whether it be a lock of hair from Balaam's talking mule, a tooth from Jonah's fish, or a handful of earth from St. Patrick's grave. Yet it would appear to me even now, a look at the serpent with a record such as the one God commanded Moses to make would lift even a Gentile's thoughts heavenward.

The account says they had been burning incense to it. Ah! here was the cause of Hezekiah's—I should say God's—displeasure.

"Thou shalt have no other God before me." When anything is diverting our attention and homage from the one living and true God, it at once becomes a stumbling block and a snare, a heartless observance of things in themselves commendable, becomes an offence to the Almighty.

"Living God." I have often wondered at the frequency of these words in the Scriptures. As I grow older, I think I begin to understand the reason. Gentiles as well as Jews have their "Nehushtan's" or something just as dead. Christians—so-called have to-day their "Nehushtans" in the form of "time honored customs," traditions, invented by men like ourselves, and if incense is not burned publicly to them, it is done secretly. The sacred Scriptures are being supplanted by them.

A few years ago a private member in one of our fashionable churches here in Baltimore dared to say in the presence of the church that searching the Scriptures was the best way to seek and know the Lord. The minister had first been urging the people to prostrate themselves before "Nehushtan," or piece of wooden rail. "Your fathers and mothers," said he, "were born again right at this railing." The minister was indignant at the private member who plead for the Bible. He was rebuked as a disturber of Israel, and has not had a pastoral visit or recognition since that time. He is looked upon now a worthy of "alf an' alf." They are putting him to death by the very easy method of freezing. It is a serious thing now as well as in Paul's day to speak contrary to the customs.

In a church not many hundred miles from Baltimore, they have a "Nehushtan" in the shape of a man, life size. No it is not a piece of brass, it is a piece of wood. It is called St. Joseph. To make the likeness complete he wears a real overcoat, in the hand a cane and the other is open and extended. Widows and other marriageable women greet the church sometimes as early as two o'clock in the morning. It is believed the first to put their hand in Joseph's will be married that same year. A friend of mine arranged with the Sexton one morning to take Joseph's place, and the first lady to give him her hand he squeezed it. She screamed and fainted, and while they were looking after her, the manager to escape. The news spread far and near that a most wonderful miracle was wrought in St. Josephs. My friend of course could not contradict it as he dreaded what might follow. The Sexton's tongue was also tied for the same reason. And, pray, unlikely that Moses' serpent, before Hezekiah, was made a source of revenue by the artful priests as well as an object of worship. My friend says St. Joseph's Church after the miracle above described did an immense business financially. Once it was the increase of truth which called the evidence of prosperity, now it is the increase of the treasury.

Never perhaps in the history of the world were men of the Hezekiah ring needed more than now. Men who are not afraid to voice their convictions and show up pious nonsense any where regardless of consequences. Mankind everywhere, Jew and Gentile alike, appear to be smitten with spiritual blindness. Just think of intelligent Israelites binding fragments of God's word to their head and arm, like mustard plasters, as though it were possible to enlighten the mind by absorption. What would we think of a hungry man binding a poultice of bread and meat to his stomach hoping in that way to satisfy its cravings?

The Sabbath we must allow, is one of heaven's best gifts, but just as soon as men begin to burn incense to it, we are turning down the living God and setting up a dead one.

"Keep yourself from idols," is an admonition as much needed to-day as when spoken by the Apostle.

If the sick man I here alluded to called Joseph, did really help lonely widows and others to get married, I do not see anything wrong in touching his hand, the wrong was connecting the living God with a piece of wood. We should beware lest we fall into Israel's sin of burning incense to men like St. Joseph, or men like ourselves, human creeds, "time honored customs," or anything beside the God who speaks to us in his word.

Pictures of Memory.

Among the beautiful pictures
That hang on Memory's wall,
Is one of a dim old forest,
That seemest best of all:
Not for its gnarled oaks olden,
Dark with the mistletoe;
Not for the violets golden
That sprinkle the dells below:
Not for the milk white lilies
That lean from the fragrant ledge,
Coquetting all day with the rushes,
And stealing their golden edge;
Not for the vines on the upland,
Where the bright red berries rest,
Nor pinks, nor the pale, sweet cowslip,
It seemeth to me the best.

I once had a little brother,
With eyes that were dark and deep;
In the lap of that dim old forest
He lieth in peaceful sleep:
He lieth in peaceful sleep;
Light as the down of the thistle,
Free as the winds that blow,
We roved there the beautiful summers,
The summers of long ago;
But his feet on the hills grew weary,
And, one of the autumn eves,
I made for my little brother
A bed of the yellow leaves.

Sweetly his pale arms folded
My neck in a meek embrace,
As the light of immortal beauty
Silently covered his face;
And when the arrows of sunset
Lodged in the tree-tops bright,
He fell, in his saint-like beauty,
Asleep by the gates of light.
Therefore, of all the pictures
That hang on Memory's wall,
The one of the dim old forest
Seemeth the best of all.

The Firstfruit.

A little girl was once made the owner of some grapes upon a large vine in her father's yard. Very anxious was she that the fruit should ripen and be fit to eat. The time came.

"Now for a feast," said her brother to her one morning, as he pulled some beautiful ones for her to eat.

"Yes," said she, "but they are the first ripe fruit."

"Well, what of that?"

"Dear father told me that he used to give God the firstfruit out of all the money he made, and then always felt happier in spending the rest; and I wish to give the first of my grapes to God, too."

"Ah, but," said her brother, "how can you give your grapes to God? And if you were able to do such a thing he would not care for them."

"Oh, I have found out the way," she said, "Jesus said: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me;' and I mean to go with them to Mrs. Martin's sick child, who never sees grapes, because her mother is too poor to buy them.

And away ran this little girl with a large basket of the "firstfruit" of the vine, and other good things all beautifully arranged, to the couch of the sick child.

"I have brought Mary some ripe fruit," she said to Mrs. Martin.

"Dearest child may God bless you a thousand-fold for your loving gift! Here, Mary, see what a basket of good things has been brought you!"

The sick one was almost overcome with emotion as she clasped the hand of her young benefactress and expressed her sincere thanks.

My Boy.

In Norwich, Connecticut, many years ago, I spoke to a large audience in a railroad station. I knew whom I had in my audience, and I said: "Ladies and gentlemen, Mrs Falkner, who lives a little way out from here, gave me some interesting incidents with regard to her son.

"My boy," she said, "was a drunkard. He signed the pledge. He said, 'Mother I will go away from home. I will not stay in the midst of temptation, but I will keep this pledge.'" He went away, but she continued to hear good news from him. By-and-by, after he had been gone a little over two years, a letter reached home to say, "Mother, I am coming home to spend Thanksgiving with you."

"My boy is coming home to Thanksgiving! Well his poor old mother will get a dinner for him, worthy of New England; and if there is but one guest, it will be a famous dinner."

And he came by stage into the town, which stopped at the door of Solomon Parsons' tavern. The stage passed on. It was just after dark. Some young

"Hallos, Fred! how are you? What will you have to drink?"

"Nothing."

"Not on Thanksgiving? Come, take a little."

"No, I'd rather not. I've come home to see mother. She hardly expects me to-night. I thought I'd wait till dark and go in and surprise the old lady."

By-and-by Solomon Parsons, who was leaning his elbows on his counter, looked at him and said:

"Fred Falkner, if I were six foot tall and broad in proportion as you are, and yet afraid of a paltry glass of ale, I'd go to the woods and hang myself."

"But I am not afraid."

"Oh, yes, you are—ha! ha! ha! I say, boys, there is a great big fellow afraid of a glass of liquor. I suppose he's afraid of his mother."

This young man, with all the strength of mind to keep the pledge, was weak when they jeered and joked him. They handed him the liquor and dared him to drink it.

"Well," he said, "I'm going to mother, and I may as well show you that I'm not afraid to drink it."

He drank it. Then came another glass! and they plied him with more. Twelve o'clock that night he went into the barn, and was there found in the morning—dead!

They brought him to his mother stretched out on a plank, with a buffalo robe thrown over the body.

She said to me: "Parsons came, and I said to him, You tempted my boy."

"Well, I didn't know it was your son."

"You did! called him by name. You knew it was Frederick Falkner, the only son of his poor crippled mother. You knew it, and you have killed him."

"Mrs. Falkner, I am not used to having such language applied to me."

"God forgive me if I have sinned?" said the poor woman: "but I put my hand on the face of my dead boy, and I lifted up my finger and cursed him! He went out with a face white as chalk."

Then I said, "Ladies and Gentlemen, Solomon Parsons, the man who tempted Frederick Falkner to his ruin—Solomon Parsons, who staggered through life under the weight of that poor woman's curse—Solomon Parsons is in this hall, and he sits right there! and this same Solomon Parsons keeps a grog-shop on the bridge of your city, licensed by the State of Connecticut. Rout him out!" And before twenty-four hours had elapsed, bag and baggage, bottles and demijohns of liquor, licenses, and all, were carried out of the city.

They violated no law. They laid no hands upon him; but they made him go out himself. They helped him not to pack a single article of his furniture, but they went to him in a body and declared that such a man should not be tolerated in the city, and he was obliged to go.—John B. Gough.

Dear Children:

I have endeavored in my lessons to draw your tender minds to the moral of each subject taught, desiring to attract you to the study of the Scriptures. In this letter by way of variation first I weary you with the same kind of food, I want to interest you in a sweet story told me by my beloved father when yet a girl. You have often heard it said, "Many a cloudy morning brings forth a brighter day." Every saying of this kind is based upon some foundation, and it will please you to hear the root of this. A college youth who was exceedingly dull and stupid was nicknamed, "Cloudy." The student was accustomed to athletic exercises, and a rope hung from the ceiling for that purpose. One evening when the students were called for prayer, Cloudy, who was not much interested in what was going on, saw a rat coming down the rope, which caused him to laugh loud, this grieved the school master and Cloudy was called for reproof. The school master knowing he was so dull and stupid, told him he should not retire to rest until he had composed four lines of poetry, or be punished with a severe whipping for his irreverent behavior, so poor Cloudy made choice of the former. In a few moments Cloudy was at the desk presenting his first composition which ran thus,

Though Cloudy be my name,
O cast me not away,
For many a cloudy morning,
Brings forth a brighter day.
A rat one day for want of studies,
Came down a rope to say his prayers.

The school master instantly perceived he was a greater genius than he had dreamed of, and saw it required circumstances to draw out the talent Cloudy possessed. As his brain matured, he was remarkable for learning and skill, and progressed until he became the prime minister of England.

Many parents and teachers discourage dear children when they develop slowly. I remember when I was a child it seemed impossible for me to gather a lesson from a book, which was a grief to my dear mother especially as my sisters were bright and intelligent. An old friend who watched with pleasing interest the progress of each, said to her one day, Do you not know that a winter apple takes longer to mature than a summer one? With a friendly touch on my head he said, It is there, and you will find circumstances will produce in her what books at this age are powerless to do. Then he kindly took me on his knee and said, my dear little girl, never forget this, that the ripe fruit is always picked first. I fully comprehended both these sayings, and loved him, because his tender sympathy met my childish wants. And I desire to tell you my dear children nothing tended to brighten my intellect like the early study of the Scriptures, giving me strength of will, and purpose to do right.

Your affectionate Teacher.

E. COFFMAN.

P. S. A little girl from the West India Islands said when she first saw ice, Mother, are the waters gone to sleep?

A bright little boy once said, when looking at the starry heavens, Those brilliant stars are gimlet holes, to let his glory through.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, September 23, 1885.

NOTE.—As there are five Wednesdays in September, our next paper will bear date October 7, and there will be no paper published next week.

As we enter upon the closing quarter of the year we kindly ask our brethren and friends to aid in extending the circulation of THE RESTITUTION. Some might be induced to try it for the coming three months. We will try hard to make our paper interesting and instructive to all its readers.

THE notice of a cheap excursion to Chicago, over the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne and Chicago Ry., came too late for insertion in last week's issue. As we have no paper next week, we say, to all interested, that the Pennsylvania Company will probably run several very cheap excursions during the next three weeks.

WE should have been highly pleased had circumstances permitted us, to meet with the brethren at Brooklyn, N. Y., at the second anniversary meeting of The Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge to be held in that city at the close of the present week. That the Divine blessing may rest upon our brethren in their deliberations and labors is our most sincere prayer.

SEVERAL papers have come to our office recently which we can do no more this time than to name with briefest notice.

The Voice—A capital paper advocating the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating beverages. Published by Funk and Wagnalls, 10 and 12 Dey Street, New York, at $1.00 a year.

Woman's World—Edited by Helen Williams, North Evanston, Ill., at $1.00 a year. Well edited and seems well worthy of patronage.

Problems of Nature—A paper issued twice a month, at No. 21 Park Row, New York, at $1.50 a year. While we do not exactly get the drift of this paper, from reading one number containing an important continued article, yet the comments of some others are quite favorable.

The Woman's Magazine—This is a neat good sized monthly, published at Brattleboro, Vt., at $1.00 a year, or ten cents single number. It is devoted to art, literature, biography and home science, as well as to woman's work in industries, missions, charities, and reforms. The specimen sent us evinces talent. Coming from our native State we greet the visitor with a welcome.

News Items.

MONTREAL, September 21.—The returns at the Health Office to-day show twenty-eight deaths from smallpox in the city on Saturday and forty-one yesterday, making a total for the week ended last night of 216.

The cholera continues to increase in Palermo, Sicily.

There is a marked diminution in the death rate from cholera in Spain.

LONDON, Sept. 18.—An earthquake of eight seconds duration occurred to-day at Naples.

LONDON, September 19.—The populace of Philippopolis, the capital of Eastern Roumelia, almost to a man, rose in rebellion, yesterday, seized the Governor General, deposed the Government and proclaimed a union with Bulgaria. A provisional government was established. The revolt was so well planned that no disorder or bloodshed occurred, everybody being in sympathy with the movement except the Government officials. The foreigners in the city are perfectly safe from harm, as also the property of foreign residents. Immediately after the organization of the provisional government, the militia were sworn in, taking the oath of allegiance to Prince Alexander of Bulgaria. It is generally believed in diplomatic circles that Russia arranged the programme of the rising and suggested the union with Bulgaria. No definite statement can be made at present as to what action the signatory powers to the Treaty of Berlin will take respecting the matter.

Eastern Roumelia was created by the Congress of Berlin, 1878, and was given an autonomic government, though forming an integral part of the Turkish empire. The Governor General was appointed by the Porte, subject to the approval of the treaty powers.

PHILIPPOPOLIS, September 19.—The insurgents in Eastern Roumelia, acting under orders of the Provisional Government, have occupied all the strategical points on the Turkish frontier, blown up all the bridges which would likely be used by a force advancing from Turkey to the relief of the deposed Government, and destroyed the telegraph wires leading into Turkey.

SOFIA, September 19.—The Bulgarian army has been mobilized, and a corps has been sent to the Roumelian frontier. Prince Alexander has proceeded to Philippopolis and has appointed M. Stransky as Commissioner. M. Stransky is now President of the Roumelian Provincial Government.

ST. PETERSBURG, September 21.—The Russian press are jubilant over the recent events in Eastern Roumelia, but seem surprised at the suddenness of the rising, and express the belief that the affair was arranged at the meeting of the Emperors at Kremsier and Skiernowice.

LONDON, September 21.—The news from the East is to the effect that the Bulgarians have occupied all the Balkan passes. The Balkan Mountains form a natural barrier between Turkey and Roumelia, and while in 1877 Turkey fought so stubbornly to prevent Russia from forcing them, she will now no doubt fight as stubbornly to regain them. The most important of these passes is known as the Gate of Trajan, by which communication has been kept up between Vienna and Constantinople. Then there is the famous Shipka Pass, which cost so many thousand Russian lives before it was taken. It is an utter impossibility to take these passes when there is any sort of a force defending them.

Large numbers of Russians, believed to be volunteers, are passing through Bucharest daily, en route to Bulgaria.

The combined force of Roumelia and Bulgaria amounts to about 60,000 men.

The Turkish forces have not yet crossed the frontier, but the authorities are greatly excited, and active preparations are being made.

A levy en masse of all able-bodied men throughout Bulgaria, from the age of 18 to 40 has been ordered.

There are exciting rumors from Europe in connection with the recent revolution in Roumelia. The armies of Turkey, Austria and Servia are reported to have been ordered on a footing for active service. A decline in British and Russian securities would seem to indicate serious apprehensions.

Destructive floods are prevailing in the Gulf districts of Texas as a result of unusually severe storms of rain.

MADRID, September 21.—Disastrous rains have prevailed during the past twenty-four hours in the southeastern part of Spain. The rain came down in torrents, and soon the rivers overflowed their banks, causing immense destruction of property and the loss of many lives. Houses, trees and dead animals are being carried out to sea by the raging flood which stretches for a mile around the city.

The recent extensive prairie fire in Dakota is a severe blow to many farmers, who have lost their entire proceeds of their year's work. Over a hundred farms were burned over and completely swept of their grain crops, along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, between Bismark and Fargo.

Dr. Talmage in Europe.

War must come. We have hoped against it, but a visit to Great Britian and the Continent this summer will convince any one that unless there be speedy providential interference, France will not much longer keep her hand off Germany, while England and Russia cannot much longer be at peace. Nine out of ten Englishmen whom I have met want immediate arraignment of Russia. They say war must come, and the sooner it comes the better. They are glad that Mr. Gladstone is out, and Mr. Gladstone as I saw him the other day, looks as if he felt relieved at being out. Meanwhile Frenchmen want to get back Strasbourg and Metz, and will be in irritation until Alsace and Lorraine return. When these wars break out the nations of Europe have so many grudges to settle that there will be the hemorrhage of a continent. Blessed are the United States, in being three thousand miles away from the field of inevitable strife.

This approaching collision has nearly ruined the cities dependent on the patronage of foreign tourists. This apprehension and the expectation of cholera make plenty of room for travelers, and give them the choice of places at hotels. Besides this, the cities of Northern Europe are unusually clean, and all the laws of sanitation have been better observed. While in Spain and Southern France the pestilence has been terrific, the death-rate in the most of Europe has been very moderate. Baden-Baden, Carlsbad, and many of the German health resorts are as full as ever, the lack of American and English patronage more than made up by the coming of the more affluent classes of Spaniards, who have fled from home to escape sickness.—Extract from letter.

INSPIRATION'S FIRST SENTENCE.

The opening sentence of the Bible, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," contains five great universal terms, and speaks of as many boundless totalities—God, heaven, earth, creation and the beginning. It is, perhaps, the most weighty sentence ever uttered, having the most gigantic members. In its comprehensive sweep it takes in all past time, all conceivable space, all known things, all power and intelligence, and the most comprehensive act of that intelligence and power. It gives a theory of the origin of things, names the originator, states the time of their origin, and makes all stand together in one system. This sentence is a declaration on nearly all the great problems now exercising scientists and philosophers—God, creation, the whole, eternity, cause, time, space, infinity, force, design, intelligence, will, destiny, and, in general, universality. There is in it the germ of the whole Bible, as of the whole of philosophy and the sciences.

This sentence is worthy of a God, and fit for the first utterance of a revelation. Did the world want to hear the Deity speak, it could conceive of nothing greater that he should say; and the fact that the Bible commences with this sentence is a proof that it is from God. Man never uttered a greater proposition, and he cannot conceive that a greater could be uttered. In speaking his first words to earth, God spoke in terms worthy of heaven. The thunder might have been a fit voice to utter this sentence, and infinite minds fit intelligences to hear it. God did not, in speaking to man, commence by telling how to cut a priest's coat or swing a censer. He spoke of the greatest things there are, and in their greatest relations. The Bible opens big, and in its commencement, at least, is worthy of God. He who begins well read on, if he is a thinker; for, though he can find nothing greater as he proceeds, it is proof enough of divinity if the dimensions found at the beginning are kept up. The author here spoke what has ever since seemed the first word of history; for we can go no further back than this utterance, and think of nothing beyond what it relates. He spoke the first word of philosophy; for we cannot go beyond the beginning in tracing causality, or think of any force behind creation. He spoke the first word of science; for we cannot go beyond the formation of the heavens and the earth. This is a sentence, therefore, of great beginnings—the beginning of the world, the beginning of history, the beginning of force, the beginning of revelation, the beginning of religion, the beginning of science; the beginning, in short, of the whole course of things which has come down to the present. God spoke of the commencement, and spoke of the whole, and spoke of what will continue to the end. His utterance concerned things that reach from everlasting to everlasting, and that spread over all space. It was, in short, an infinitely great utterance, worthy of the great speaker and of the great subjects of which he spoke. It was God speaking of infinity and eternity—Omniscience talking of universality.

Let us specify what is here said in this pregnant sentence so full of the speaker and of the subject. This sentence declares that there is a God, and so is a negativing of atheism. On one of the greatest questions of the day it gives an answer—the question of theism. The universe, it declares, is not all. Beyond matter and beyond the minds of which we have experience there is something else. God is represented as outside of Nature; something distinct from matter, or from the incessant universe which has (according to the Nebular Hypothesis) been developed from Chaos.

This sentence also declares an intelligent origin of things; that intelligence precedes development, and does not merely follow in its train as an effect. It stands at the beginning of the world's career. This sentence, in denying the origin of the world by chance or insentient law, negatives the idea that force and matter—the materials of the world—are eternal. It claims absolute origination by God, teaching that power is greater than things, and has produced them. God is represented as excepted from the laws of Nature. Having made them, instead of being made or regulated by them, he is not to be judged by them.

It teaches, also, the freedom of the will, or power of intelligence to originate. Thought is at the beginning of the chain of cause and effect, and not a middle link. God created, and did not act as one compelled by an exterior force. Cause has a beginning, and does not run back infinitely. There are starters of forces, and not merely communicators. Instead of all being fated, and proceeding by necessity, there are breaks in the line of causality. For if God creates, the principle of absolute origination is established, and we need but one case of free will to be able to believe more.

This first utterance of the Bible also teaches the Unity of God, saying that "in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," not "the gods" or "a god." As God created all—heaven and earth—there is nothing else in which a second Deity could exercise supremacy; so that Jehovah has control of the whole universe. This thought, though trite now, because it is generally believed, was singularly new when uttered, and has powerfully influenced history.

It teaches, likewise, as a corollary of this, the unity of Nature. All things—heaven and earth—are created by one power, and created together, so that they stand related in one system. There is here a foundation for the universality of law, for the complete harmony of things, and for reasoning from analogy and induction. An acquaintance with a part raises a presumption that the rest is like it, because it springs from the same source and is part of the same plan.

This sentence also teaches the reality of design. The heavens and the earth being the work of intention, the adaptations which suggest wisdom or benevolence are the result of purpose, and not accidental. This utterance, if accepted, settles the question of the anteriority of design; that it is a cause and not an effect, going, like volition, with the real origin, instead of being a mere consciousness accompanying a result. There is here a foundation for the goodness of God, and for our reliance that things, being designed, will work out desirable ends.

We are taught in this same first utterance of Scripture the antiquity of the earth. It was created in the beginning, along with the heavens, and is coeval with the whole as one system. Instead of being produced 6,000 years ago, or produced as a separate work, it appeared along with the universe, and has run as part of the same history. The earth as well as the heavens came down from eternity, or from whatever we conceive the "beginning" to be. We should study the earth along with the other planets to know its history, and we should never forget the unity of cause or similarity of construction. There is a foundation here for the resemblances in the atmosphere, light and elements of the different planets, as revealed by the spectrum, just as there is for the like application to all worlds of gravity and the other natural laws.

And so I might show in this first sentence of the Bible a declaration on all the other great questions mentioned the question of the distinction between mind and matter, of intelligence and unintelligent force, of the natural and supernatural, of a control by intelligence, of a purpose in the movements and properties of things, of a planned destiny for the world and man, of a comprehension of all things in intelligence, and of many others which can be deduced from these. This sentence is a philosophy in itself; and one has but to believe the first line in the Bible to be able to accept nearly all the rest; so that, had the revelation closed after the first sentence, man would not be without a revelation, and a comprehensive one at that. The scientific world is still engaged on the first verse of the Bible, which furnishes nearly all their current problems. Though they have from the very dawn of philosophy been working on this verse, they have not yet, in the nineteenth century, got any further. If they get over this sentence they will enter the whole field of creation, and be at one with revelation. When God here spoke he spoke problems for all time, and men are now working them. For, though he spoke so clearly that all can understand, he spoke so greatly that none can fully comprehend.—Austin Bierbower in the Independent.

JEWISH NOTES.

Herr Israel Lahn, of Barchen, in Galicia, has announced his readiness to devote 20,000 florins for the benefit of the Holy Land on condition that other gifts to a similar amount be forthcoming. With the collective capital a factory shall be established in any one of the following towns, Hebron, Jerusalem, Safed, or Tiberias, in which competent and strictly religious Jewish workmen shall be employed. For the present Herr Lahn has deposited the 20,000 florins in a bank.

In spite of the anti-Semitic pamphlets which have been liberally distributed in the Baltic Provinces, the aristocracy have not become tainted with prejudices against the Jews. Recently, when Count Joseph Tyskiewics celebrated his golden wedding, he presented to the Jewish congregations in Polangen and Krattingen a sum of money, the proceeds of which are to be employed in educating eight poor Jewish children at the District School at Polangen. The right of selecting these children is entrusted to the Rabbi for the time being of that town.

Monsignor Makari, Archbishop of Nijni-Novgorod, who is distinguished for his pro-Jewish sympathies, has been promoted to the position of Metropolitan of Tomsk. Before leaving Nijni-Novgorod, his Eminence preached a farewell sermon, in the course of which he said: Remember the words which I addressed to you last year on behalf of the unhappy Jews. I am not unaware of the fact that I have been bitterly slandered on this account. Nevertheless, before we part, I beg you to take care that no harm shall ever befall a Jew, and I hope that my successor will continue to work in the same path as that which I set before me with regard to the Jews.

Besides Elias Pasha, the Sultan's special oculist, another Jewish medical man in Constantinople is attaining a high position in his profession. This gentleman is Dr. Isaac Molko Bey, who holds the rank of Colonel, and is a physician on the yacht of the Sultan. Dr. Molko Bey, who is already Officer of the Turkish Orders of the Osmanie and the Medjidie, and of the Greek and Montenegrin Orders, has just been decorated by the King of Sweden. To the qualification of an eminent practician, he adds that of a philanthropist: twice a week he is at home to poor patients of all creeds, whom he attends gratuitously, and in cases of necessity he also visits them at their houses. A correspondent writes that to see Dr. Isaacl, as he is generally termed, is to his poor patients synonymous with a complete and prompt restoration to health.

Latest advices from Damnat are to the effect that the situation of the Jews has not been improved by the recent measures adopted with this object by the Sultan. Without any longer possessing direct jurisdiction over the Jews, the Governor still exercises aginst them a pernicious influence, by the obstacles which he places in the way of the settlement of legal disputes between Jews and Mohammedans. He has, it appears, incited the rural population against the Jews to such an extent, that the latter dare not proceed beyond the gates of the town. To this state of affairs is attributed the murder of Mordecai ben Okba, whose corpse has been found in the village of Khations. The Ministers of England, France, and Italy, and the Consul General of the United States have been officially informed of the occurrence.

Fresh measures have again been lately taken against the unhappy Jews of Roumania. In the district of Botoushani, orders have been given to expel all Jews from the villages. A young Jew employed at a mill was brought, bound hand and foot, before the Sub-Prefect of Botoushani, who addressed the captor in the following remarkable words: "Why do you seize the Jews? You should kill them and then bring them to me!" In Roumania the Jewish cattle salesmen have been forbidden to transact any business in the market. Twenty families have thus lost their livelihood. This order of an all-powerful Chief of Police is based on no public law, but in Roumania, as in Russia officials do not trouble themselves about the law when they can injure the Jews. Steps are also to be taken to exclude from the public schools the Jewish pupils, who, according to reports from every quarter, distinguish themselves above all others by their exemplary conduct and their progress. Hence the animosity against Jewish scholars.

The anti-Jewish demonstrations in Algiers have recommenced. On the evening of the 24th great scandal was caused by a number of men, who seemed disposed to renew the disgraceful scenes which occurred in that town some time ago. They paraded the streets, shouting "Down with the Jews!" "Down with Jazi!" (the Adjutant of the Fire Brigade whose appointment as a Knight of the Legion of Honor has caused so much annoyance to anti-Semites). A police constable who sought to restrain them narrowly escaped being killed, and several Jews were ill-used by the brawlers. The Jewish Consistory of Algiers has sent a deputation to Paris, in order to request the Government to take such steps as will tend to the better protection of the Jewish population. M. Brisson, the Prime Minister, himself received the deputation, and assured it that on the recurrence of any disturbances the strongest measures would be adopted against those who took part therein.

The anti-Jewish manifestations have been loudly condemned by the Akhbar of Algiers, and more emphatically still in the Parisian journal Gil Blas, which in an eloquent article calls upon the Government to do its duty, so that the rights of French citizens may be fully respected, no matter in what part of France they reside, or what faith they profess. If such afflicting scenes should recur, adds the Gil Blas, France will no longer be able to denounce the anti-Semitism of Germany, Roumania and Russia.—Occident.

Bulgaria and Roumelia.

A little Turkish principality, by the success of a peaceful mob in overthrowing its prejudiced government, has come near to kindling a blaze of war throughout Europe. The cause of the uprising, the pretexts on which it was based and the objects which it had in view, are not very clear to observers at this distance.

Eastern Roumelia is part of a Turkish state province of the same name, which existed as an integral part of Turkey previous to the Turco-Russian war of 1877-8 and the treaty of Berlin. It was then constructed into a sort of a state, with some autonomous or independent qualities, but under the direct political and military control of the Sultan. Its chief officer is a Governor General, whose name is Gabriel Pasha Chrestovich. The area of Eastern Roumelia is but 13,500 square miles, or a little greater than that of Maryland. Its population is 850,000 or slightly less than that of Maryland. Of this number 573,000, or three-fourths of the whole, are described as Bulgarians.

Bulgaria has a more independent form of government. It is styled a principality, with Alexander I., of Hesse, as the reigning prince. He is a nephew of the late Empress of Russia, and thus a cousin of the present Czar Alexander. He is, of course, a relative also of the German Emperor, though he cannot be considered as a member of the reigning family of either empire. The treaty of Berlin rendered all members of the reigning families of Europe ineligible to the princely throne of Bulgaria. The country is styled in the treaty of Berlin "an autonomous and tributary principality under the suzerainty of his Imperial Majesty, the Sultan." Its government is Christian, similar to that of Russia. Bulgaria has an area of 24,360 square miles, which is about the size of West Virginia. It has a population of 2,008,000, which is about that of Missouri. It has a legislature consisting of a single chamber, the members of which are elected by universal suffrage. It has an army of 17,000 men on a peace footing, of 52,000 on a war footing.

These facts will enable the reader to explain for himself as well as the press correspondents can explain the present existing movement.—Evening Journal.

The death of the Mahdi appears to receive confirmation from various sources. A letter from Suakim gives the following particulars: "Mahomed Achmet fell ill on Friday, June 19, at 1 p. m., and by his own desire was at once conveyed to a tent outside the camp. No doctor being at hand, two of the captive missionaries who had medical knowledge were summoned to the sick bed. They immediately said the patient was ill with the small pox, and later in the day, seeing that the disease was assuming the most virulent form, they told the patient to prepare for the worst. The Mahdi thereupon called his nephew Abdullah, named him his successor, and gave him his sword. On Sunday evening the patient was in a condition past hope. He then bade a solemn farewell to his family, and adjured his successor to continue the war against the Christians. He expired at 5 a. m., on Sunday, the 21st, and was buried at sunset in a grave within his tent. The tent was afterwards burnt." The Viennese newspapers all write of the event as being certified beyond doubt, and congratulate the British government upon it. The Fremdenblatt says the event must be regarded as a truly fortunate occurrence. The impostor has vanished, and the common manner of his death must dispel the delusion which the credulous entertained as to his being a man favored by heaven. The Presse observes that the Mahdi did not live through the three years which he had predicted as the term of his mission, and this fact alone must shake the popular superstition about him.

The Soudan difficulty is being solved by the Arabs themselves in a more effective manner than we should have done for a long time with our army. As long as a common enemy threatened their safety, they kept on good terms among themselves; but no sooner are the British troops withdrawn than they fight over the spoil. The Treasury at Khartoum has been ransacked, the Mahdi's successor and some of his chief men have been slain, and there appears to be general anarchy. The Mahdi was himself a man of great individuality, and by his own religious fanaticism infused valour into his followers, but we can scarcely expect that a successor can immediately be found to supply the place of their great Prophet.

WHAT JESUS PREACHED.

Abstract of a sermon preached in the House of the Brethren, Winchester, Va., Sept. 6, 1885:

Looking into the Bible record as given by the evangelists, we find that in every instance where it is stated what Jesus preached, it is the "Gospel of the Kingdom of God." Also that the disciples selected and sent out by him preached the "Gospel of the Kingdom of God." With that preaching there were accompanying signs which clearly demonstrated that "the majesty of the heavens had appeared," for the lame were made to walk, the blind to see, the sick were cured, devils cast out and even the dead raised to life.

Continuing our search through the Acts of the Apostles, record of after the ascension of Jesus to heaven, we find that the same "gospel of the kingdom is preached and in addition "Jesus and the resurrection." And that the command was to believe that gospel, the same gospel that was preached before unto Abraham, the same gospel that Jesus commanded to be preached unto all the world for a witness. To mark more correctness of understanding, every passage in which "preach" or any of its derivatives occurs in the Bible, should be read, and this having been done, the truth stands clear as to what was preached and what should be preached until the end of the age.

Continuing the search through the epistles we do not find the same phraseology used as in the evangelists and in the Acts. Nor on reflection could we scarcely expect it should be so. The letters are addressed to those baptized ones who have entered into personal relationship with the Lord, and already been thoroughly indoctrinated, and perfectly well knew that that which was preached by Jesus and his apostles was the gospel or good news of a kingdom of God on earth, in the which the same principles should regulate and the same laws govern that exist in heaven, hence also synonymously called the kingdom of heaven, and for the coming of which Jesus taught his disciples to pray for in these words: "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

It is only in the wording of the epistles that any advantage can be taken by those opposed to the teaching that the kingdom of God on earth is the grand purpose and finale of God's plan as regards man. But let us consider furthermore that there are gradations in the school of Christ, necessarily, as in any other school, that elementary teaching is first in order, and that first principles once taught, need not constantly be recurred to. The really connected teaching of Christ became obscured during the early centuries, and especially after Paul was taken away, the mystery of iniquity which commenced to work during his day continued as he predicted, and finally culminated when "fully blown" in the establishment of an ecclesiastical despotism with a priestly class rule.

The poor of earth had the gospel specially preached unto them by Jesus, who was one of the poor himself, and that gospel was the good news that the meek should inherit the earth, that injustice and oppression should cease, that the captive should be set free, and that all artificial class distinctions should be broken down. Good as heaven may be for God and the angels, it is not set forth in the Bible as the goal for man, and those well founded in the elementary teaching of Christ and his apostles know that it is not.

But by taking the abstruser teachings addressed to advanced scholars in the school of Christ, and contained in letters to those competent to leave the first principles of the gospel, not by ignoring them but by advancing in thought to higher conceptions, and addressing those teachings to misinformed and undisciplined minds in our day, we have the same mental phenomena occurring now that occurred in that day when Peter wrote 2 Pet. iii. 16, that in the writings of that master mind, the apostle Paul, there are "some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest as they do also the other Scriptures unto their own destruction." (Not destruction of a holy nature, but destruction of whatever advantage might accrue from understanding of things set forth), and by learned even better than by the unlearned the Scripture can be wrested so as to rob the gospel of Christ of its true connected meaning. Error has it been and ever will it be until the predicted glorious reign of righteousness on earth is established, that the true teaching of the gospel will be obscured and combated by all minds that are interested in maintaining class privileges, which give opportunity for individual distinction, place and power, the opposition of that brotherhood condition which recognizes no master but Christ, and all others really brethren, and insures the wealth of all worthy ones and not individual accumulation.

A DIRGE.

"Earth to earth, and dust to dust!"
Here the evil and the just,
Here the youthful and the old,
Here the fearful and the bold,
Here the matron and the maid,
In one silent bed are laid:
Here the vassal and the king
Side by side lie withering;
Here the sword and sceptre rust—
"Earth to earth, and dust to dust!"

Age on age shall roll along
O'er this pale and mighty throng;
Those that wept them, those that weep,
All shall with these sleepers sleep.
Brothers, sisters, of the worm,
Summer's sun, or winter's storm,
Song of peace, or battle's roar,
Never shall break their slumbers more,
Death shall keep his silent trust—
"Earth to earth, and dust to dust!"

But a day is coming fast,
Earth, thy mightiest and thy last:
It shall come in fear and woe,
Heralded by trump and throe:
It shall come in strife and toil;
It shall come in blood and spoil;
It shall come in empire's gloom,
Burning temples, trampling thrones;
Then, ambition, rue thy lust!—
"Earth to earth, and dust to dust!"

Then shall come the judgment sign—
In the east the King shall shine;
Flashing from heaven's golden gate,
Thousands, thousands round his state;
Spirits with the crown and palms:
Tremble, then, thou sullen tomb!
Heaven shall open on our sight,
Earth be turned to living light,
Kingdom of the ransomed just—
"Earth to earth, and dust to dust!"

Then thy mount, Jerusalem,
Shall be gorgeous as a gem;
Then shall in the desert rise
Fruits of more than Paradise;
Earth by angel feet be trod—
One great garden of her God!
Till we dread the curse's levin,
Through a thousand glorious years!
Now in hope of Him we trust—
"Earth to earth, and dust to dust!"

THE COMING OF THE LORD FOR HIS CHURCH, AND THE JUDGMENT OF BELIEVERS.

The first preparation for the coming of our Lord, we may say, is the formation of Christian hope in the believer's soul. This hope, stirs and animates those who have it, whether as individuals or as a body, to forget the things of the present that they may press forward to those which are before.

Now we come to the first actual event for which as Christians we are instructed to look. This is none other than the taking-up or translation of the Church to be with Christ when he comes in the "air" or the heavenlies. We are not told to watch for any sign or to look for any token, but simply to "wait and be ready," Luke xii. 36-40.

The Jews may or may not be restored to their own land before this event; there may or may not be signs in the heavens and upon the earth; but we are commanded to fix our expectation upon the advent of the Lord only. We are not even told that we shall die first. The Lord is gone to receive for himself a kingdom and to return. He may come at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning (Mark xiii. 35); but we are bidden to be as servants waiting for their Master.

In the plainest words our blessed Lord taught his disciples that he was going away to prepare a place for them. He said, "I go to prepare a place for you," and "I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also," John xiv. 2, 3. Again upon the Mount of Ascension, when the Lord was departing, the two men in white apparel said to the disciples, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Acts i. 10, 11. Afterward it was more fully and distinctly revealed to the Apostle Paul by the Lord himself that he would come and take his believing people to himself.

This is the definite hope and expectation of the Christian Church as given in the word of God—the hope which is now being revived and established upon the authority of the Lord himself.

We may next inquire, What is the Church here referred to, and for which the Lord Jesus is thus coming? Our answer is, That it is the body of believers who have been gathered or "called out" by the preaching of the gospel of the grace of God—persons who have been saved by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ.

We will describe the Church as briefly as we can under three aspects, namely—

1. WHAT IT IS INWARDLY.
2. WHAT IT IS OUTWARDLY.
3. WHAT IT IS ACTUALLY.

First, as to its inward character. The Apostle says to the Ephesians, in words which are applicable to all the Churches, "God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ (by grace ye are saved); and hath raised us up together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus: that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us in Christ Jesus," Eph. ii. 4-7. In these words we have the spiritual standing of the Christian Church inwardly.

Second, let me refer you to a passage of Scripture which illustrates the outward character or appearance of the same. In St. Luke's Gospel we have an account of the procession of the Lord in his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. I need scarcely say that this is actual history. At the same time, it is a prophetic type of the manifest coming of the Lord hereafter. What is more, this history and prophecy is also a representation of the Christian Church in its progress at the present time. We read that "the whole multitude of the disciples began to praise God with a loud voice for all the mighty works that they had seen, saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord; peace in heaven, and glory in the highest" Luke xix. 37, 38. These rejoicing ones were persons who had left all to follow Christ, and they were following and praising him with grateful demonstrations.

Among them were persons who had been healed of all manner of diseases. The blind had received their sight the lame were made to walk, the lepers were cleansed, the deaf heard, and the dead were raised up. See Matt. xi. 5. These persons were individually healed of single diseases or possessions, as they were severally afflicted; and the miracles wrought upon them were of a visible and life-long character.

In the Christian Church the multitude of believers are persons who have each one been delivered from most, if not all these diseases, in a spiritual form. They have been raised from the death of sin; their eyes have been opened, their ears unstopped, and their tongues set free to praise God. If, then, the multitude of old time had reason to rejoice and to thank God for their visible and temporal miracles, how much more reason have we to leave all, follow Christ, and praise him—we, who are partakers of benefits lasting to all eternity.

Third. We come now to the actual and heavenly character of "the Church" which Christ is coming to receive to himself. It is composed of Jews and Gentiles, "called out" from their previous manner of life into union with Jesus Christ. This, St. Paul tells us, is the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, "that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs" (with the Jews), "and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel." See Eph. iii.

This Church so gathered and composed is united with Christ, even as a bride is united with her husband. We have this actual figure given to us from the earliest time. In the book of Genesis we read that the Lord God put Adam into a deep sleep, and during this time he formed or "builded" a woman. She was not created, as Adam was; but added too, or "builded." In like manner Christ was put into a deep sleep upon the cross; and out of his side is formed or "builded" his Church. Stone by stone the edifice has been, and is being, put together. When the formation of the first woman was completed she was brought to Adam. He welcomed and received her, saying, "This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man," Gen. ii. 23.

So when the Church of Christ is fully formed by the preaching of the gospel of grace and the operation of the Holy Spirit, she will be presented to Christ, and welcomed by him. Adam not only received his wife, but exalted her to his own position. So Christ will receive his bride, and make her the partner of his glory. Even now the union of believers with the Risen Christ is so complete that the apostle says, "We are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones," Eph. v. 30. How much greater and more complete will be this union hereafter.

This Church is saved, cleansed, and united with Christ, not for any merit or suffering of hers, but for his sake alone. No suffering on her part is needful for her acceptance; nor is it conditionally required to fit her for the glory which is to be. Therefore it cannot be necessary for this part of the Church to go through the tribulation in order to be partakers of the Lord's glory....

The world will not see them go: nor does it appear anywhere in Scripture that the graves even of those who sleep in Jesus will be disturbed. This translation will be sudden as it is certain, and secret as it is sure.

It will, no doubt, be a startling fact to the world, a surprising event to those who are not ready. Enoch was taken up to be with God, and no one saw him go. Elijah ascended up in a chariot of fire, with horses of fire; and yet he was seen of none but Elisha and some of the sons of the prophets. See 2 Kings ii. Christ was taken up into heaven in the presence of his disciples, but the world did not see him depart. Such was the manner of the Lord's ascension; and the same will be the manner of the translation of the saints when the Lord comes to the heavenlies. This is the Parousia, or secret coming of the Lord, for which believers should be waiting.....

If the question is asked, Is not a great part of that which is commonly called the "Christian Church" to be left behind at the translation of the saints? unhappily the answer must be in the affirmative. It is sadly true that a large portion of the body which professes and calls itself Christian, is so only in name, and not in spiritual power and vitality. From the beginning of the Christian dispensation there have always been those who have departed from the simplicity of the faith as it is in Jesus. Such persons have insisted upon working for life, instead of from life; they have labored to obtain God's love, instead of working because they have obtained it; they have endeavored to establish their own righteousness, instead of submitting themselves to the righteousness of God. See Rom. x. 3.

In Matt. xiii. the Lord predicted this, in the parables which he spoke concerning the Christian Church, or the kingdom of heaven.

It will be seen there that three parables were spoken outside the house to the multitude, and three inside to the disciples. These three last, namely, the parables of the treasure hid in the field, the pearl of great price, and the net that was cast into the sea, refer to the inward or Spiritual Church. Those parables outside the house, namely, the tares and the wheat, the mustard-tree, and the leaven, refer to the outward Church.

In the first of these parables the Lord represents the enemy sowing tares among the wheat, and tells how both are allowed to grow together until the harvest. In the second, he shows how the outward Church from a very small beginning will become an important organization, and how it will shelter in its arms that which destroys the good seed. In the third, he shows that as the woman took and hid leaven in the pure meal so that all the lump was leavened, so the Church will hide in or mix with the simple truth of God the leaven of evil or error which will vitiate the whole outward Church.

God never leaves himself without witnesses. However evil an organization may be, there are always some members of it who are better than their system. We may be sure that in every generation there are the Lord's hidden ones, who have not bowed the knee to Baal. The Prophet Elijah did not know them; but God did. Through all ecclesiastical ages and systems there have been persons who were not really Roman, or Greek, or Anglican; though they were numbered among one or other of these sections. They did not believe in receiving grace through sacraments, but by direct and personal faith in Christ. They made use of the sacraments or ordinances not in order to obtain grace, but to show they were really partakers of it. They were persons who had been raised from the death of sin, as Lazarus was raised from his grave; though they continued to be wrapped in many ecclesiastical) grave-clothes. These no doubt, will be found among the living believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, though, it may be, they knew nothing whatever about the Lord's coming.

In the Old Testament Scriptures there are many passages which refer to the Lord's coming to take his kingdom and to reign; but there are not so many which so clearly tell of his rising up from his Father's throne (where he is now sitting) to come to his place in the heavenlies to receive his Church. The fact is, that the whole subject of the Church as the Bride of Christ, though originally proposed, has been kept secret from the beginning of the world. Now that the secret is revealed, it is easy to trace the lessons or types by which it was foreshadowed. As these types display their mystery, we cannot do otherwise than admire how well they have kept their secret. The very angels who desired to look into Scriptures which concerned "the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow," 1 Pet. i. 11, did not suspect the meaning of the types which referred to the Church as the Bride of Christ.

Now we can understand the meaning of the deep sleep of Adam, the formation of Eve, and her presentation to her husband. We know the meaning of her reigning in Eden with her husband. Now we can understand the meaning of Joseph's rejection by his brethren, his being raised from a dungeon to a throne, his taking a bride from the Gentiles during the time of his rejection, and his reigning with her, after his reconciliation with his brethren, over them and the Egyptians in Egypt. What a complete type throughout is this of Christ, his Bride, and his Millennial Kingdom!

Other Scriptures there are like these which typify his reign, but there are comparatively few which represent the Coming of Christ to meet his Bride Perhaps the clearest one is that of Isaac walking or watching in the field to welcome Rebekah. See Gen. xxiv. 63-67. We know from New Testament Scripture that Christ will leave his Father's throne to come to the heavenlies, and that his saints will be taken up in glorified bodies to meet him there. He will appear to them as on the Mount of Transfiguration (see Matt. xvii. 2), in his glorified state; and they shall be like him in brightness, for they shall see him as he is. See 1 John iii. 2. In this dazzling glory the heavenlies will be too much illumined for Satan and his angels to abide there. Their long-continued sojourn in that place, and their resistance against God's saints, will now be over (See Eph. vi. 12,) and Satan and his hosts will be cast down to the earth.

In reference to this time and event we read in the Book of Revelation that "there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him." Rev. xii. 7-9.

After the translation of the saints and their reception into the heavenlies, the next event which will take place is the judgment of believers for their works. The Apostle tells us that "we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in the body, according to that he hath done, whether it is good or bad," 2 Cor. v. 10.

This is the first of the three great judgments which are as landmarks in the vast plain of prophetic vision. "We all," in this verse, does not mean all men in general, but believers only and all believers. As such, we must appear with glorified bodies before the Bema of Christ. This tribunal is not to be confused with the throne of glory (Matt. xxv. 31), or with the great white throne (Rev. xx. 11.) It is a tribunal for judging believers, not for their lives, but for their works.

We can well understand that upon this occasion the Lord will not ask the question, Are you a believer? for that glorious throne will be compassed with none but such as have been saved for time and eternity. The question will be, What have you done for me? How many Christians there are who overlook the obligation to work; and live as if they had no other care than looking after their own salvation. They do not appear to know that when they were saved by grace they were created in Christ Jesus "unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." Eph. ii. 10.

As a fruit-tree is created to bear its distinctive fruit, so each believer is created anew unto his particular work for God. It is not enough, then, to have vitality; nor is it enough to grow and spread abroad with much foliage of profession, if there be no fruit. Too many Christians think that it is the best thing to learn more and more, and therefore content themselves with acquiring knowledge. But God says, "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." James i. 22.

Again: too many, though they are doers of the word, are not abiding in Christ to bring forth fruit unto God. The souls of such persons are saved; but their lives are wasted. It is a great mistake to think that the glorified state which we are at present considering is in any sense a reward for a good life. Salvation in all its everlasting fulness, let me repeat, is the gift of God for Jesus' sake alone; but the reward or crown we speak of, and which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give at that day, is offered for our work and labor of love. See Tim. iv. 7-8; also 1 Peter v. 4.

The idea or figure of such a reward was very familiar to the Corinthian mind. It was their pride and joy to run in a race, that they might obtain a laurel crown. Many of them ran together in this race, though only one could win the prize. But the apostle urges us so to run that we may all obtain. 1 Cor. ix. 24, 25.

This Corinthian race will help us to elucidate our subject, especially in drawing attention to the Christian life, as distinguished from the Christian race. As Corinthians who ran in the race had to appear before the chair of the president of the games in order to secure the laurel crown, so must those who run in the Christian race appear before the Bema, or judgment-seat of Christ, to receive their crown of reward.

There were three kinds of persons in Corinth: Those who did not run in the race, those who did run, and were not successful, those who ran and gained the prize. So among the glorified ones who appear in the heavenlies there will also be three similar kinds: those who have not run in the Christian race, those who have run, but not aright, those who have run successfully.

We may observe that the unsuccessful Corinthians were not punished for coming short of the crown—certainly were not put to death; so we may be sure that Christians will not be punished or "cast away," in the sense of being lost, if they are accounted unworthy to obtain the crown.

There were four conditions requisite before a Corinthian could be admitted to compete for the prize: he must be a citizen of Corinth, he must be free from blame, he must willingly offer himself, he must be accepted.

Somewhat similar conditions are necessary for the Christian race:—The candidate must be a citizen of the heavenly city, Phil. iii. 20, he must be in Christ; free, without condemnation, Rom. viii. 1, he must offer and present himself a living sacrifice, Rom. xii. 1, he must be accepted, and filled with the Spirit, Acts ii. 4.

The Corinthian conditions being fulfilled, the competitor entered upon a course of training, and, to ensure success, willingly put away all hindrances.

So must the Christian "lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset him, and run with patience the race that is set before him," See Heb. xii. 1.

St. Paul says, "I therefore so run, not as uncertainly; so fight I, not as one that beateth the air; but I keep under my body, and bring it into subjection; lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway," 1 Cor. ix. 26, 27. That is to say, lest I should be found unworthy to obtain the crown for which I exhort others to run.

Next, let us consider the three conditions which are necessary for the race itself.

The Corinthian must start from the accredited starting-place, he must keep the course, he must run all the way to the mark for the prize.

Thus it must needs be in the Christian race also: he must stand in, and start from, the place of enduement of power for the service; he must keep the course, that is, follow Christ, who is the Way as well as the Life; he must press on toward the mark; that is, to be conformed to the likeness of Christ, that he may obtain the crown. Referring to this mark the apostle says, "Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do; forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Phil. iii. 13, 14.

I have said this much by way of illustration, to show the difference between the reward or crown which is given for our works, and salvation, which is given for believing in the Lord Jesus Christ. As the race was not necessary, but voluntary, so the Christian's work which is to be rewarded must be voluntary. It is not necessary for salvation; but it is necessary in order to show forth the full thankfulness of the believer's heart.

This is especially the character of Christian work which is to be rewarded. Our salvation is given us that we may show forth the praises of him who hath "called us unto his eternal glory by Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. v. 10.

The Apostle Paul bids us "work out our own salvation," see Phil. ii. 12; not to work for it, but to work it out, as a mine of treasure might be wrought for the benefit of all concerned. We have not to make the mine any more than Adam had to make the garden of Eden. He was put in it, and was bidden to dress and to keep it; so we are placed in the Eden of salvation that we may dress it and keep it. There is, however, this essential difference, that Adam was trusted to work as an agent; but we are only employed as instruments. For this reason the Apostle adds, "It is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Phil. ii. 13. Every man's work will be tried to see of what sort it is; and it will be accounted good or bad according to the motive which actuated it. Some work will be as gold, silver, and precious stones; and other as wood, hay, stubble to be burned, though the worker be saved so as by fire. See 1 Cor. iii. 12-15.

For instance, if a believer works merely because he loves work, or because he thinks he ought to work, or if he labors at something he has set himself to do—even though he call upon the Lord to help him, yet these works will fail. They will be counted as "wood, hay, stubble," because they proceed from motives which originate in self. On the other hand, if a believer is constrained by the love of God, if his work is in accordance with God's will and in obedience to his word, it will be successful. And inasmuch as it is done not by him, but by the Lord himself, though by his instrumentality, it will be reckoned as gold, silver, precious stones, and rewarded accordingly. The Lord's work must ever be done by the Lord himself; not by us with his help, but by him with our help.

Only the Lord knows for what special work a believer is created anew in Christ Jesus; and only he can put him into his right place. So again, only the Lord can bid him take up his work and enable him to accomplish it. It may be said that all believers work. Thanking God and recommending his salvation is a work in which the youngest believer may engage. Again, when a believer has given himself to be kept and led by Christ, he does a good work to recommending the Master by his life and example.

These works, however, are but manifestations of spiritual vitality. They may aptly be likened to the reflection of a light. Just as the moon, which has no light of her own, receives and reflects the light of the sun, so these persons receive salvation from the penalty of sin, or keeping from the power of sin. But the work I am referring to here, and which is to be rewarded hereafter, may be likened to showing a light rather than reflecting it. In order to show a light we must needs have it. "Let your light (Christ) so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven," Matt. v. 16.

We must have Christ himself dwelling and working in us to will and to do his own good pleasure, in order to make our work profitable. So far as merely being in a receptive state, such a believer or worker is "spending" and "being spent" for the Lord. Instead of living to be protected and guided only, he is on the aggressive, and going forth to his work, whether as a servant or under-shepherd or as a warrior setting out to battle.

Many there are who have no such work, and who know nothing beyond the receptive life. Others there are who cannot rest there; they long to be led out, and used of the Lord for his glory and the good of souls. Like their Master, and in his Spirit, they desire not to do their own will or to please themselves, but rather to give themselves a free-will offering to the Lord, who loved and gave himself for them.

The Apostle Paul was able to say toward the end of his life, "I have fought the good fight; I have finished the course; I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. This is the crowning "day" to which he bids us look forward with joyful hope and anticipation. We shall then see the Lord himself; and more than that, we shall hear his words of welcome and approval.—W. Haslam, in Prophetic News.

The Bible.

The path of the Bible is not like the path of the infidel production, a steep descent to dark oblivion, but it is like the path of those who are justified by its faith, which is as the "shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." In some old Bible of your grandfather, between the leaves which inclose some cherished passage that had often cheered the old man's heart, there is, perhaps, a little relic of the past—"its but a little faded flower," the color is gone, but a good deal of the form is still there. You must touch it very tenderly, or it will crumble into dust and be gone. It abides, after a fashion, as human things abide; it does not live or abide as divine things live and abide. But the promise ever against which the little faded flower is lying, not only abides, but lives—lives! It lives in ten thousand hearts as well as in yours, as rich in color, as fresh in fragrance, as delightful to the soul as ever it was. "All flesh is grass,"—and even our forelovers come under that head—"All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away; but the word of the Lord endureth forever." The word of our God is not like that of Demosthenes or of Cicero, whose speeches may still move to admiration, but cannot longer lead men on to action, as in the days when they were fresh and strong. The word of God lives and breathes—lives with the life and breathes with the breath of the Spirit of the living God. This is the secret of its perennial freshness; this is the secret of its immortal youth. "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." Of Homer and Virgil, Dante and Milton, of Aristotle, Seneca, Descartes, and Bacon, of Demosthenes, Cicero and Burke, it may be said, "He, being dead, yet speaketh;" but of the author of the Bible, and of him alone, it can be said, "He, being alive, yet speaketh." "The mighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken:" and speaketh still: "I am he that doth speak; behold, it is I." The Spirit of God may use, often does use other books, but he identifies himself with the Bible. He makes it vocal with his loving voice, and vital with his living power. He breathes through it on the living soul, and thus communicates the life eternal.—Dr. Monroe Gibson.

NOT AS I WILL.

Blindfolded and alone I stand
With unknown thresholds on each hand;
The darkness deepens as I grope,
Afraid to fear, afraid to hope;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That doors are opened, ways are made,
Burdens are lifted or are laid,
By some great law unseen and still Unfathomed purposes to fulfil,
"Not as I will."

Blindfolded and alone I wait,
Love seems too bitter, pain too late;
Too heavy burdens in the load,
And too few helpers on the road,
And joy is weak and grief is strong,
And years and days so long, so long;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That I am glad the good and ill
By changeless law are ordered still
"Not as I will."

"Not as I will!" the sound grows sweet
Each time my lips the words repeat,
"Not as I will," the darkness fold
More safe than life when this thought cries
Life whispered voice to calm and bless
All unrest and all loneliness,
"Not as I will," because the One
Who loved us first and best has gone
Before us on the road, and still
For us must all his love fulfil—
"Not as I will."

LOCALITY OF EDEN. No. VI.

The Holy Land, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Assyria Proper, are manifestly countries in Eden. But in the beginning, Eden contained a Garden, "pardeis" or Paradise; so also in the beginning, of the Millennial Aion, the same Eden will rejoice in a Paradise adapted to the necessities and enjoyment, not of two persons only, but of 'a great multitude which no man can number'—Rev. vii. 9. Adam and Eve's Paradise was upon a small scale, yet ample enough for them. From its Mosaic geography no other locality, I believe, can be reasonably assigned to it than between the Gulf of Persia and the confluence of the four rivers named. The text reads, 'and a river went out of Eden to water the Garden: and from thence became into four heads.' This I understand to mean, that a river, formed by the confluence of four others flowing out of Eden, was caused to water the garden on its way to the sea; and that, tracing this river northwards from the garden, it diverged into its tributaries which terminated in four several heads. The heads were not in the garden, but at remote distances from it; therefore, they err who locate Adam's Paradise at the heads, or original sources, of the Tigris and Euphrates in the Mountains of Armenia. A warmer climate was necessary for the comfortable existence of two naked persons. The heads, I say, were not in the garden, for it was watered by one only; as it is written, 'a river went out to water it,' which certainly excludes the four from its inclosure.

From subsequent developments in the history of their posterity, the Babylonian region of Eden was a very appropriate locality for the origination of 'sin, which is the transgression of law.' In the Adamic Paradise was laid 'the foundation of that gigantic system of iniquity, which is styled, apocalyptically, 'Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and abominations of the earth.' The principle, which may be termed, 'the vital principle,' of this 'mystery,' is disobedience. Adam's Paradise was the birthplace of this principle, and at once the arena of the Serpent's victory and defeat.

The individual serpent prevailed, and was buried in the Paradise of the first Adam; so also he has prevailed, and is destined to be bruised in the Paradise of the Second. The Serpent principles, embodied in the Power symbolized by the Goat and his Five Horns (Dan. viii. 8, 9,) have thus far prevailed. The Power has desolated the Holy Land, and made it a field of blood. But this fair portion of Eden is not always to lie in ruins under the serpent dominion; for the sentence is, 'Thy Head, O Serpent, the Woman's Seed shall bruise!' the dominion shall therefore be destroyed, and the Holy Land of Eden in the East be delivered from the enemy.

That the Holy Land is to become the Paradise of the Deity is manifest from the following testimonies, which every one acquainted with the history of Eden, in whole, or in part, knows have never yet been accomplished. Thus the Spirit saith, 'Thy land, O Zion, shall no more be termed 'Desolate;' but thou shalt be called Hephzibah (that is; My Beloved is in her), thy land Beulah (that is, Married); for Yahweh delighteth in thee, and thy Land shall be married. For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee; and as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thine Elohim rejoice over thee'—Isa. lxii. 4, 5. Here Zion and the Holy Land are represented as a Virgin-Bride; and the Elohim, or Messiah and his brethren in their One Spirit-Body manifestation, as the Bridegroom. This Virgin-Bride and her Bridegroom are the loving couple, whose loves are celebrated by Solomon in his 'Song of Songs.' The land, in its Paradisa development, is typified in his 'garden enclosed,' and which, as king, he styles, 'my sister spouse,' as already quoted. This is the literal, which is also allegorical of something more recondite, as hereafter will be shown. At present we have to do chiefly with the geo-material aspects of the subject.

When the marriage, or union, between the Sons of Zion and their King, as the Bridegroom, and the Holy Land as the virgin-bride, comes to pass, the country will become the Paradise of Yahweh, which his own right hath planted. Thus, the Spirit saith, 'Yahweh shall comfort Zion; he will comfort all her waste places, and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the Garden of Yahweh; joy and gladness shall be found therein, thanksgiving, and the voice of melody'—Isa. li. 3. 'Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree: and it shall be to Yahweh for a renown, for a memorial of the Olahm, which shall not be cut off'—Isa. lv. 13. At that time, 'I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water; I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle tree, and the oil tree; I will set in the desert the fir tree, and the pine, and the box together, that they (Israel) may see, and know, and consider, and understand together, that the hand of Yahweh hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it'—Isa. xli. 17–20.

Lastly upon this point Ezekiel's testimony may be adduced; as, 'Thus saith Adonai Yahweh; In the day that I shall have cleansed you, O Israel, from all your iniquities, I will also cause you to dwell in the cities, and the wastes shall be builded. And the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by. And they shall say, 'This land that was desolate has become like the Garden of Eden;' and the waste and desolation and ruined cities fenced, and inhabited. Then the nations that are left round about you shall know that I, Yahweh, build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate: I, Yahweh, have spoken it, and I will do it'—Ezek. xxxvi. 33.

When thus converted into Paradise, the same prophet tells us that there will be 'a river that cannot be passed over' by wading; and that it will be formed by a confluence of 'water springing out from under the threshold of the temple eastward, from its right side, at the south of the altar'—ch. I–5. He then informs us that 'on the bank of the river was a great wood, eitz rav, (both words in the singular number) on the one side and on the other. The waters issue from Mount Moriah down its south side, and flow on toward the east through a vast cleft in the Mount of Olives (Zech. xiv. 4, 8. When they have past this valley they divide into two rivers, the one flowing through the desert and emptying into the Dead Sea; and the other into the Mediterranean; both of them abundant and never failing streams.

The effect of the eastern river upon the Dead Sea will be to heal its waters. Both streams are healing waters; for the prophet says, 'It shall be, that everything that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the two rivers shall come, shall live: and there shall be very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither; for they (of the Dead Sea) shall be healed; and every thing shall live whither the river cometh. And it shall be, that the fishers shall stand upon it from Engedi even unto Eneglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the Great Sea (or Mediterranean) exceeding many.

'And by the river on the bank thereof, on this side and on that side, shall come up every tree for food, whose leaf shall not fade; neither shall the fruit thereof be exhausted; for its months it shall yield, because their waters they issued out of the sanctuary: and the fruit thereof shall be for food, and the leaf thereof for healing.'

After these statements, the Spirit then proceeds to point out the boundaries of Paradise. He commenced the line from the Mediterranean at the outlet of the Orontes, called 'the entering in to Hamath,' and passes on to a direct course of one hundred and thirty-three miles to Berothah upon the Euphrates. This is marked out as the natural boundary on the north by the range of mountains called Amanus, which, as a natural barrier, extends across the country from the Great Mediterranean sea to Berothah; to which the Euphrates is navigable from the Persian Gulf. When Messiah is enthroned king of the land, and proceeds to take possession of it to its utmost limits, he will then say to his companions, 'Come with me from Lebanon, my Spouse, with me from Lebanon: look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lion's dens, from the mountains of the leopards'—Cant. iv. 8. Taking up their position upon that commanding border, the Sons of Zion may view the landscape of a goodly and glorious land, fragrant of rich odors, and flowing with milk and honey, outstretching eastward in all the length of Euphrates to the East Sea. this its border on the east. From the junction of the Euphrates with the Persian Gulf in lat. 30 degrees, the frontier is drawn 'from Tamar to Meribah of Kadesh, to the river towards the Great (or Mediterranean) Sea.' This is the south border of Paradise; a line of over a thousand miles abutting on the Nile, and thence to the sea; and affording free access to the Red Sea by the Elanitic Gulf. The boundary on the west shall be the Great Sea, from the border (south) till a man come over against (the entering in to) Hamath.

Thus we have an ample area; containing by estimation three hundred thousand square miles, for the length and 'breadth of Immanuel's land,' extending, as covenanted to Abraham and his Seed, 'from the river of Egypt unto the great river Euphrates, for a possession in the Olahm'—Gen. xv. 18.

Such is the territorial Paradise or kingdom of the Deity; which all the prophets testify shall be inhabited by the Twelve Tribes of Israel, and their nobles, all of them Priests and Kings with Messiah pre-eminent in all things over all. The twelve tribes will have had a new heart given them, and a new spirit put within them by the refining process they will have been previously subjected to. Their present stony heart will have been abolished, and a heart of flesh substituted in its stead, as it is testified in Ezek. xxvi. 25-32. Then, for the first time since their revolt from the house of David in the days of his grandson Rehoboam, they will again become 'one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all.' They will then rejoice in Jesus of Nazareth, as High Priest upon the throne of his father David after the order of Melchizedec for the 'season and time,' or Olahm of a thousand years. The former troubles will all be forgotten; and they will 'no more be made a reproach among the nations'—Joel ii. 19.

Under this new and glorious Constitution of the Hebrew Kingdom, the tribes will be settled in Paradise in parallel cantonments, extending across the country from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates. Dan's canton is the first reckoning from the north border. Then Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben, and Judah. This brings us down to 'the midst of the Paradise of the Deity.' South of Judah is the Foursquare Oblation, 'a holy portion of the land,' containing 'the sanctuary, the Most Holy;' the holy portion for the Levites: and the Profane Place for the City, for dwelling, and suburbs. On the east and west is the Prince's portion, the foursquare oblation being in his portion, and bounded north by the canton of Judah and south by that of Benjamin. Thus, 'Yahweh shall inherit in the (canton) of Judah his portion upon the land of holiness, and shall delight in Jerusalem again'—Zech. ii. 12—The Holy Oblation and Prince's portion being thus reckoned of the canton of Judah.

The Holy Oblation is to contain the Millennial Temple described by Ezekiel, which is to be in the midst of the Most Holy Portion of the Oblation, 'upon the top of the mountain, the whole whereof is Most Holy'—ch. xlii. 12. The details are given in ch. xlv. 1-8, which concludes with the remark, that, 'in the land shall be his (Messiah the Prince's) possession in Israel: and my princes (who will then be the saints) shall no more oppress my people: and the rest of the land shall they give to the house of Israel according to their tribes.'

The City will be square, will be 4,500 measures on each side, or 18,000 in circumference; its twelve gates will open into suburbs of 250 measures broad; and to the east and west there will be areas of 10,000 measures each, making altogether 'a profane place' of 25,000 measures from east to west, by 5,000 from north to south, which 'shall be for the whole house of Israel;' and 'the name of the city from that day shall be Yahweh-Shammah,' because 'He who shall be is there.'

Next to the Holy Oblation a portion is allotted to Benjamin, and successively afterwards to Simeon, Issachar, Zebulon, and Gad, which is the most southerly of all the tribes. Such is the area of Paradise from north to south, and from east to west, a royal domain larger than that of any kingdom or empire of Europe, Russia alone excepted. It exceeds in the aggregate amount of square miles, the territories of ten kingdoms of Europe, as Prussia, Belgium, the Netherlands, Bavaria, Saxony, Hanover, Wirtemberg, Denmark, Sardinia, and Greece; and its relative proportion to Great Britain and Ireland is 300 to 118, or more than two and a half to one.

The situation of Paradise is peculiar in relation to its borders. The Mediterranean, the Red Sea, and the Persian Gulf, form on the west, the south, and the east, borders of a land which, but for these inland seas, would be wholly encircled by Asia, Africa, and Europe, and shut out from all direct communication with the Pacific and Atlantic, and lesser oceans of the globe. The river of Egypt to the Mediterranean, and that sea from the mouth of the Nile to the estuary of the Orontes, and the Euphrates from the foot of Amanus to the Persian Gulf, leave not the smallest portion of the west side, or of the east side, that is not actually or virtually a navigable coast to the extent on both sides of two thousand miles; while on the north, the intermediate barrier of Amanus, at the breadth of less than one hundred, renders the land 'a Garden Enclosed.' No country could be better situated for the establishment of a kingdom whose sovereignty is destined to rule all nations, peoples, and tribes, inhabiting the land and sea to their utmost bounds.

Such, then, are the geographical and the literal of the Paradise of Deity. It belongs to the earth, and is as real, visible, and actual a region, as Britain or America.—Beulah.

The Recent War Crisis Momentous Signs.

A lecture on "The Signs of our Times as indicating an Approaching Crisis in Human History," was delivered at the Albert Minor Hall, by Mr. S. Davies, of Morriston, to a large and intelligent audience. Mr. Davies said the question in dispute between England and Russia was causing widespread anxiety and alarm. There was, however, no need for perplexity, as the final result and destiny of every nation had been decided beforehand by the Creator Himself, and this destiny was declared in unmistakable language throughout the Scriptures. Paul in Acts xvii. 31 said—"He (God) hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given assurance in that he hath raised him from the dead." This was a foundation upon which to build our belief.

The final destiny of all nations was to be ruled by this Man (Christ) who was raised from the dead for that purpose. There were signs abroad at the present time indicating that the end of the existing governments is at the door. Many well-meaning people believed that this opinion was founded on fanaticism, but their belief was due to ignorance of the Scriptures. In Genesis we are told that great lights were placed in the heavens to "divide the day from the night, and to be also for signs and for seasons." The position of rulers in the political heavens was analogous to that of the sun, moon, and stars in the physical heavens. Hence we had greater and lesser lights in the political heavens. In Isaiah xiv. 4 and 12, for example, we had the downfall of the king of Babylon represented as that of a morning star. "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer (day star), Son of the morning." Many people examined the political heavens but were unable to see anything except the clash and opposition of human interests. They were unable to see that things were universally working together for the destined end. To them Christ was merely an historical personage who had ceased to have any connection with the earth, Christ who had said after his resurrection "All power is given me in heaven and in earth." His birth had been indicated by a bright star in the heavens, and his public ministry had been heralded by the remarkable preacher, John the Baptist; but his second coming would be without any heralding; Christ himself had said that it would be like the advent of a thief in the night. The general ignorance that prevailed of Christ's second coming to the earth was in itself a remarkable sign, as it exactly answered to the character of the time that would obtain upon the earth when he appeared. Christ told us this in Luke xviii. 8. "When the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" If the gospel had been intended to convert all nations to Christianity, as people believed who send their missionaries abroad, the state of things here described could not exist. The world was not intended to be converted by the gospel. The gospel was to be preached in all the world for a witness to all nations, Matt. xxiv. and xiv. It was an easy task to decide whether a man or a nation followed Christ. By their fruits ye shall know them. The characteristics of those who followed Christ are these: "Seeking first the kingdom of God. Doing unto others as they would that men did unto them. Laying not up treasures on earth. Loving their enemies. Doing good to them that hated them. In view of what Christ himself had said, "Ye are my friends if ye do what I command you." These things were worth the attention of men. Where was the Christian nation or Christian community that conformed to Christ's standpoint? As in practice so in doctrine the teachings of Christ were falsified. This had to be the condition of things when Christ came. Another sign of the approaching end was the warlike attitude of all Christendom.

Christ said, "All they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Christendom professed to obey Christ, but in this particular its practices were directly opposed to its profession. This attitude was foreshadowed in Joel iii. and ix. to xvi. Another remarkable sign was the drying up or decay of the Turkish Empire, as signified in Rev. xvi. and xii., "And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates, and the waters thereof were dried up that the kings of the east might be prepared." There was no time to go into this verse fully, but it was sufficient to say that it had reference to the Turkish Empire. It was a well-known fact that the Turkish Empire was decaying. Another sign was the taking away of the temporal power of the Pope of Rome, who was the little horn referred to in Daniel, whose dominion was to last "for a time and times, and dividing of time." This period was reckoned, and, it was affirmed,—(printed in books before the event happened)—that it had to end between 1863 and 1870, which it did, and the temporal power of the Pope was then forcibly taken away. The political power of the pope had gone.

His ecclesiastical power remained, but that would be destroyed by Christ at his coming, recorded in 2 Thess. ii. 8. Another sign was the wonderful upraising of Jewish prosperity and the interest taken in the land of Palestine. In Luke xxi. and xxiv., we read that the Jews should fall by the edge of the sword, and be led captive into all nations, and that Jerusalem should be trodden down until the times of the Gentiles were fulfilled. The times of the Gentiles were nearly over. When they were over, then the engrafting of Israel upon their old stock would take place, and the announcement of the angel would be brought into force "He, Christ, shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." The entanglements of England in Egypt were not foreign to the subject. The Soudan war indicated the policy that England had been compelled to go into war against the will of the prime minister and his supporters. Isa. xliii. 36, would help them to look ahead, "I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee, etc." These verses connected the change of masters in Egypt with the restoration of Israel to Palestine, which would take place when Christ appeared as an active participator in the politics of the world. The aggressiveness of Russia in Roumania and Armenia as well as in Afghanistan was another sign. Her grasping over the territory of the dying Turk and her antagonism to England was distinctly foretold in Ezekiel xxxviii. They were there unmistakably associated with the advent of Christ upon the earth, whose personal presence would end the conflict between England and Russia on the mountains of Israel. These signs were not all; but they were not meteor-like. They would never disappear or grow dim until Christ came, who would rule the earth in righteousness. It was for men to prepare. He would come as a thief in the night. Blessed would that servant be who would be found watching.

LECTURE BY MR. CLEMENS.

A lecture was delivered at the Agricultural Hall, Swansea, by Mr. Daniel Clemens of Plumbton, in which the lecturer, following in the wake of the late Dr. Thomas, contended that the complications present in the political affairs were a powerful evidence of the truth of the Scriptures, and a certain sign of the near approach of Christ. The lecturer contended first that Christ was literally to return to the earth for the purpose of reigning over all the nations. Second, that the epoch which is to witness the return of Christ will not be a period of peace, as commonly supposed, but a time notable for wars, rumors of wars, and political embroilment and upheaval. Third the uneasy condition of politics which will be adjacent to the second advent will be the consequence of a policy inaugurated by the Feeg power identified as the Napoleonic dynasty. Fourth, that the present political embarrassment is the direct result of the policy of Napoleon I., and, therefore, argued the lecturer, we are face to face with the very events that are to usher in the second advent.—The lecture was exceedingly interesting, especially when the latter-day mission of Britain was developed from the prophecies of Isaiah and Ezekiel, and Queen Victoria was shown to be the ruler of the ancient Sheba, now known as Aden in the Red Sea. This address was only a preliminary statement of the argument which was followed up and applied on the following Sunday at the Agricultural Hall. The lecturer promised then to prove to a demonstration that Great Britain is the power spoken of by Isaiah as "Sheba, Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish." It is interesting to find our statesmen extensively seeking their own and British interests, but really working out the declared will of God.—Lectures at Swansea, on the Prophecies by Mr. S. Davies, and Mr. Daniel Clement.

WHAT IS AN AEON?

In the use and acceptation of the Apocalypse, it is evidently this, namely, the duration or cycle of existence which belongs to any object, not individually for itself, but universally in right of its genus.....Under the old and ordinary view of the apocalyptic aeon, which supposed it always meant the same period of time—mysterious indeed, and uncertain as regards our knowledge, but fixed and rigorously certain in the secret counsels of God—it was presumed that this period, if it lost its character of infinity when applied to evil, to criminality, or to punishment, must lose it by a corresponding necessity equally when applied to happiness and the golden aspects of hope. But, on the contrary, every object whatsoever, every mode of existence, has its own separate and independent aeon. The most thoughtless person must be satisfied, on reflection, even apart from the express commentary upon this idea furnished by the Apocalypse, that every life and mode of being must have hidden within itself the secret why of its duration. It is impossible to believe of any duration whatever that it is determined capriciously. Always it rests upon some ground, ancient as light and darkness, though undiscoverable by man. This only is discoverable, as a general tendency, that the aeon, or generic period of evil, is constantly towards a fugitive duration. The aeon, it is alleged, must always express the same idea, whatever that may be; if it be less than eternity for the evil cause, then it must be less for the good ones. Doubtless, the idea of an aeon is in one sense always uniform, always the same, namely, as a tenth or a twelfth is always the same. Arithmetic could not exist if any caprice or variation affected these ideas—a tenth is always more than an eleventh, and always less than a ninth. But this uniformity of ratio and proportion does not hinder but that a tenth may now represent a guinea, and next moment represent a thousand guineas. The exact amount of the duration expressed by an aeon depends altogether upon the particular subject which yields the aeon. It is, as I have said, a radix; and, like an algebraic square-root or cube-root, though governed by the most rigorous laws of limitation, it must vary in obedience to the nature of the particular subject whose radix it forms.

That man who allows himself to infer the eternity of evil from the counter eternity of good, builds upon the mistake of assigning a stationary and unchangeable value to the idea of the aeon; whereas the very purpose of Scripture in using this word was to evade such a value. This word is always varying, for the very purpose of keeping it faithful to a spiritual identity. The period or duration of every object would be an essentially variable quantity, were it not mysteriously commensurate to the inner nature of this object so laid open to the eyes of God. And thus it happens, that everything in this world, possibly without a solitary exception, has its own separate aeon: how many entities, so many aeons.

But if it be an excess of blindness which can overlook the secular difference amongst even neutral entities, much deeper is that blindness which overlooks the separate tendencies of things evil and things good. Naturally, all evil is fugitive and allied to death.

I, separately, speaking for myself only, profoundly believe that the Scriptures ascribe absolute and metaphysical eternity to one side living, namely, to God; and derivatively to all others according to their interest which they can plead in God's favor. Having such origin in time, immortality entitles may possibly be admitted to a participation in Divine aeon. But what interest in the favor of God can belong to falsehood, to malignity, to impurity? To invest them with aeonian privileges, is in effect, and by its results, to distrust and insult the Deity. Evil would not be evil, if it had that power of self-subsistence which is imputed to it in supposing its aeonian life to be co-eternal with that which crowns and glorifies the good.—Thomas De Quincey.

Any means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints associated with him in the government of the nations, the restoration of Israel, the literal resurrection of the dead, the immortalization of the righteous, and the annihilation of the wicked, eternal life and glory through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the gospel repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for our salvation.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AS RELATED TO ISRAEL.

I have been requested to read a paper on this occasion on the Second Coming of Christ as related to Israel. By way of introduction, I may say that Israel, the seed of Abraham according to the flesh, is a Sign of the Second Advent. By this it is meant that the history of Israel from the beginning until now, their condition as they live among us to-day, is such as to be a pledge and prophecy that the Lord Jesus Christ, the rejected Messiah of Israel, will verily come again in the very same literal manner as he came the first time in the flesh; in the same literal manner as in the flesh he left the earth, and ascended from Mt. Olivet to the right hand of God. And the argument lies in this way.

FULFILLED PROPHECIES.

We open the Bible, and we find that everything that has befallen Israel from the beginning until now has been predicted long before it happened, and ever thing that has been predicted concerning them while in their state of apostasy from God has so far been fulfilled. If they sinned, they were to be scattered among all nations. So they were. They were to suffer cruelly in their exile; so they have suffered; and so they are still suffering to-day.

The point might be illustrated indefinitely, but this must suffice. Every prediction with regard to Israel from the beginning to the present time has so far been fulfilled literally. This is the premise of our argument. The conclusion is this: The predictions concerning Israel's Messiah and their relation to him must also be fulfilled, and fulfilled in the same way.

As regards the predictions of the Messiah's first coming, every Christian knows and admits that the law has held good. Not a prediction can be named, admitted by the universal consent of the Church to refer to that First Coming, but has been fulfilled literally. Messiah was to be born of a virgin. It seemed impossible; yet so it came to pass. He was to die, and yet to live forever; in appearance, again, impossible. Yet both have come true, for he died and rose again to everlasting life in resurrection. His hands and feet were to be pierced; so they were. They were to part his raiment among them, and for his vesture to cast lots; so they did. They were to smite the Judge of Israel upon the cheek; so they did. But there is no need of multiplying illustrations of facts so familiar. Like all the predictions touching Israel, so all the predictions concerning Israel's Messiah, so far as these relate to his first coming, have been fulfilled literally.

But now turning to the prophets again, we find much about yet another coming of Israel's King—prophecies which have never been fulfilled, and which stand in closest relation to a predicted restoration of Israel in the latter days. He who came to suffer is to come to reign. So is the letter of the word.

Many tell us, however, that the restoration of Israel shall take place long centuries before the coming of the Lord; will, it said, introduce the expected "Millennium;" which age of universal righteousness must then run its long course before the Lord Jesus can rightly be expected. As opposed to this, we maintain that the word of God, wherever it speaks of the two events, the restoration of Israel and the second appearing of the Lord Jesus, the Messiah, always represents them as in close chronological connection. If not simultaneous, one is the immediate signal for the other. This we believe to be taught in the following Scriptures: Isai. xxvi. 19 compared with Rev. xx. Isa. xxv. 8 compared with 1 Cor. xv. 54; Isa. lix. 20, 21 compared with Rom. x. Dan. xii. 1 compared with Rom. xi. 26; Dan. xii. 3 compared with Matt. xiii. 30-43; Zech. xii. 10 compared with Rev. i. 7 and Matt. xxiv. 30.

PREDICTED BY ZECHARIAH.

If we examine the latter part of the prophecy of Zechariah we shall find yet more explicit reference to the glorious personal advent of the Lord, in connection with that last terrible tribulation which shall usher in the final repentance and restoration of Israel of which he writes.

STILL UNFULFILLED.

As to the meaning of this phraseology, be it observed first, that it is utterly impossible to refer this standing of the Lord "upon the Mount of Olives" to anything in the first advent of our Lord. At no time during the life of our Lord on earth was there any such gathering of the nations against Jerusalem as is here described. Nor could it refer to a providential coming of the Lord when Jerusalem was destroyed, for such a supposition is wholly inconsistent with the context.

Of the siege against Jerusalem which is predicted here, it is said (xiv. 2) that "half the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city." This is no description of the massacre and captivity which attended the destruction of Jerusalem under Titus. Neither was the issue of that tribulation such as that which is here foretold as the issue of this. For it is here said that that great conflict shall end in the final and everlasting repopulation of the land. No providential coming of the Lord that history has ever seen can be intended here. The prophecy can be fitted to no past historical event except by the most extreme violence to its plainest statements. Neither can the language be applied, according to the usage of Scripture symbolism, to a coming of the Lord by his Spirit. Where in the Scripture symbolism is there anything which would warrant one in saying that the standing of the feet of the Lord "upon the Mount of Olives" denoted a revival of religion?

The words must then refer to the future. They naturally and most obviously describe the personal presence of the Lord of Israel at the time and the precise spot mentioned in the parable—the very place, it may be observed, whence Christ ascended. They must refer to the future, second appearing of Jesus.

Again: in Luke xxi. 24 et seq. the Lord predicts the destruction of Jerusalem and the accompanying calamities. He said that Jerusalem should be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles should be fulfilled. Surely no man can say that this is the spiritual Jerusalem, the New Testament Church—the ready resource of interpreters in so many other places. For the prophecy has in large part passed into fulfilment, and has been fulfilled in the literal Jerusalem, in the Land of Palestine. That city is trodden down of the Gentiles now, and has been ever since 70 A. D. But the words naturally imply that a time is coming when this state of things shall cease. Israel's restoration is clearly assumed.

But is there anything here about the Second Advent? Let us look at Matthew's account of the same discourse (Matt. xxiv. 30). He tells us that our Lord said explicitly, "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven; and then"—observe that he quotes the words used by Zechariah of the repentance of Israel—"then shall all the tribes of the earth (or of the land) mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Is not this a re-affirmation of that which we have already seen to be the teaching of the Old Testament Scriptures? and that by the authority of the Lord himself? Surely no pleas together the restoration of Israel and his second coming.

Nor is this the only passage where we may perceive a reference to the same truth. For it is written that just before his death, when taking solemn leave of the apostolic nation, he closed an awful series of woes in these words: "Ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

We conclude, then, that there is abundant evidence that the Scriptures of the Old and the New Testament agree in representing the future restoration and conversion of Israel as accompanied by or taking place in closest connection with the glorious return of the Lord Jesus to judge and reign. And according to this inspired teaching with how much reason could Paul say concerning Israel (Rom. xi. 15): "If the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead?" To all which our hearts respond, Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus!—S. H. Kellogg, D. D. in Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

PAUL'S EARNEST DESIRE.

"For to me to live is Christ and to die is gain. But if I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labor; yet what I shall choose, I wot not. For I am in a strait betwixt the two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ; which is far better."—Phil. i. 21-23.

There are few passages of Scripture more frequently quoted—or rather, misquoted and misapplied—than this. It is the favorite text for funeral discourses, and is inscribed upon innumerable tombstones, and repeated by religious teachers as the devout wish of Paul's heart, and the appropriate sentiment of every Christian heart, in view of death. These are the words that are attributed to the apostle Paul; and when taken in the sense in which they were evidently uttered, they are every way creditable, to his unselfish heart, and his supreme devotion to the service of Christ. But it may well be questioned whether the sentiment that has been put into them, in our version, and the sense in which they are generally taken, ever entered his mind, much less ever found any expression in any of his writings.

He is supposed to be considering the question, whether it would be better for himself, to continue his self-denying labors for Christ till he should called to his reward in heaven, or to die now, and go at once to glory; and though perplexed in view of these two alternatives, he feels that it would be real gain to himself and far better, to die now and go immediately to his reward in heaven: and he naturally most earnestly desired this.

It is true, our English version seems to sustain this view and, no doubt, the translators had this thought in their own minds, and so they put it into the rendering of this passage. But I am persuaded that a more careful examination of the text in the original, and of the context will show, that the "gain" he is here speaking of is not gain to himself, but to the cause of Christ, and the "departure" he is represented as desiring so earnestly, is not his own departure from life: but the departure—or rather the return, for this is what the word really signifies—of Christ. For this rendering is quite as close to the original Greek, and in accord with the grammar of the language, and it harmonizes infinitely better with what he has just been saying, and with the character of the man, and indeed, with the letter and spirit of all his teachings, and with the teaching of the Scriptures generally.

This most affectionate and tender epistle to the Philippians was written while he was a prisoner at Rome. His life was in jeopardy, depending on the caprice of the Emperor. He knew not what would be the issue. But, instead of repining and complaining of his hard lot, he even exults and rejoices that his bonds had been the occasion of making Christ more widely known throughout the palace, and elsewhere, and that the disciples of Christ, by his example, had been confirmed in their faith, and emboldened "to speak the word without fear."

Again, he rejoices that even the contentions that had sprang up among them, had contributed to the spread of the knowledge of the gospel, and though his enemies had desired "to add affliction to his bonds" by their manner of preaching Christ, he still rejoiced, and would rejoice that Christ was preached. Indeed he was so devoted to this one object of making Christ known to others, that he had utterly lost sight of every other interest. He had entirely gone out of himself, and centered all his thoughts, hopes, desires and efforts in Christ. He was determined to know nothing else, nor did he, but Christ and him crucified. He was full of joy in the assurance, that whatever might be his own lot, Christ would be honored, and in this he rejoiced. Hence he says, in the verse immediately preceding the passage under consideration: "According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also, Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or death." Mark the expression whether it be by life or death. Then follows this utterance, which is but the repetition of the same sentiment in another form—Emoi gar to zen Christos, kai to apothanein, kerdos: which literally translated is, "For me therefore to live, Christ, and to die, gain." This last word, kerdos which is here translated "gain" would better have been translated, benefit, advantage, profit. This is what it means; and then the idea would have been more clearly expressed. But as it is, there is nothing in the text itself to show whether this gain or advantage or benefit is to accrue to himself, or to the cause of Christ; for the passage is very elliptical; but the context, and especially the preceding verse, most evidently shows that he is speaking of the benefit or gain, which his death by martyrdom would bring the cause of Christ. For if his imprisonment and ill treatment had been made to contribute to this end, inasmuch as he had endured them with so much Christian fortitude and patience, how much more his heroic death as a martyr for Christ? Indeed this is his joyful assurance; as he just said—"Christ shall be magnified in my body whether it be by life or death." Then he goes on to say: For or rather, "therefore"—for this little word gar connects the two sentences—therefore for me to live, and for me to die, in either case for Christ would be gain or benefit. It is impossible that Paul should drop down so suddenly from his supreme devotion to the cause in which he had so entirely lost sight of himself, as to speak of his own personal gain by dying, and to contrast this with what he might accomplish by continuing to live and labor for Christ. This would not be at all like this great apostle, indeed, it would be entirely out of harmony with what he had just been saying, nor can this selfish sentiment be found in the language he used, unless it be first injected into the passage by the reader: much less can we believe that after confessing that the advantages to the cause of Christ were so nearly balanced in his own mind, that he did not know which to choose, he actually did earnestly desire one of these same alternatives, because it would be gain to himself.

Surely, he would not stultify himself by saying that he did not know which of two alternatives to choose, and then, in the next breath express his earnest preference for one of them? But this is just the inconsistency and folly that our common version of this verse charges upon him, that for I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better." The Greek word to analusai here rendered "to depart" is compound of two words, ana, again or back again, and luo or lusai, "to loosen," "to let go," "to cast off" as a ship the lines that hold her to the wharf—"to leave" either to go or to come; but with the prefix ana it means to leave any place for the purpose of returning or coming back. It may have the meaning of "depart," but the prefix ana gives it the sense of again, or rather to come back or return. Let it be observed also, that the only other place in which this word analusai occurs in the Scriptures, is in Luke xii. 36, and here our translators have rendered it "return": "Let your loins be girded about and your lights be burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return (analusai) from the wedding."

There is no reason whatever why this word should not have had the same rendering—"return" in this passage, but that our translators had another idea in their own minds. They thought Paul believed, as they themselves did, that on dying a Christian goes immediately to Christ, and enters at once into heavenly glory, and that this was the gain Paul was thinking of; and hence, they make him say he has a "desire to depart and be with Christ which is far better." And so they not only make him contradict himself,—for he has said he did not know which to choose,—but they put a forced meaning into this word analusai, which actually means "return," and which they have so translated in the only other place where it occurs. This word is in the infinitive mood and is used as a noun: (to, to analusai) and is the object of the preposition (ek) "for," and should be rendered "having a desire for the Return." This was the great object of desire and of expectation of all the early disciples, and of which Paul often speaks—His coming in glory and power to set up his kingdom on the earth, to complete the work which he had only inaugurated by his first coming—his second advent, to raise the saints who were sleeping in death, to change those who were living, to judge the world and purify it by the utter destruction of Satan and all his hosts, and to begin the everlasting reign of righteousness and peace, which had been so fully promised to them.

"But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others, which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this I say unto you, by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then, we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord." This is what Paul means in the passage we are considering by the return, and the being—(einai, another word in the infinitive used as a noun,) with the Lord, which—is far better. Far better than what? Far better than either of the alternatives, between which he did not know which to choose. This is evidently a third object. It is a side thought, introduced by way of parenthesis—a practice so common to the apostle—and then leaving it, he goes on with the main current of his letter, and tells them how confident he is that he will be spared to them "for the furtherance of their joy."

What if the apostles and primitive disciples were in error respecting the time of our Lord's return, and supposed it might occur in their day? It was not an injurious error. Indeed it served to keep them active and vigilant in their Master's service, and to cheer and to comfort them in their trials. Would that the same expectation had been kept alive in every subsequent age—and especially, that this same expectation and hope were more operative at the present day—for surely, everything conspires to assure us that this long expected—long delayed consummation, must be near, very near at hand. But this mistake of these early disciples was not so great a mistake even with regard to its nearness, as may appear to us who look back upon them from this age, and count the generations that have come and gone since their day. For the lapse of time is as nothing to those who are sleeping in their graves. To those who fall asleep in Jesus, the very next event of which they are conscious—if I correctly understand the teachings of Scripture—is the coming of the Lord, and we shall all see him together. We are expressly told in the passage just cited, that those who are alive shall not have any advantage of those who are asleep, and conversely those who are asleep shall not prevent those who are alive. We all shall be caught up together in the clouds to meet him in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. "Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

We are not to comfort each other—with the assurance that our friends go immediately into their promised inheritance, and beguile ourselves with the thought that those who have gone before us, are now rejoicing in the full possession of eternal glory, and that death is the gate which we enter one after another into heavenly bliss, in the presence of our Lord,—or rather that death is the kind messenger that Jesus sends to call us to him. I find no such teaching in the Scriptures, though our hymn-books are full of it. Death is everywhere represented as an enemy, the king of terrors, the great enemy. But it is indeed the last enemy that we have to encounter. He has been conquered by him in whom we trust. "The sting of death which is sin" is come already. He can do us no real harm, nor when our Lord shall come to call us can he hold us any longer in his power. But it is only when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, that we shall appear with him in glory—not before. "There is indeed, laid up for us a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give to us at that day, and not to us only, but unto all them that love his appearing."

Safe in his keeping, we can well afford to wait in peaceful unconscious sleep, till the place he has gone to prepare for us, is ready for our occupancy. For he says, "Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go to prepare a place, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also."

In view of these passages, and of others I might quote, and of the reason I have given, I cannot but think that this is the true understanding of the text under consideration. Indeed, when I see how this construction is required to make it harmonize with the language and sentiment of the context, as well as with the spirit and character of the apostle, I cannot put any other construction upon it. He writes this epistle to comfort and encourage the hearts of his dear friends at Philippi, who had expressed much concern for him, and had sympathized so deeply with him in his trials that had come upon him, and in the danger to which he was now exposed. He tells them, that, so far from being cast down, he exults and rejoices that all these troubles had been made to contribute to the furtherance of the gospel, and the confirmation of the faith of the disciples at Rome: and he felt assured that whatever might be the issue to himself personally, Christ could be magnified in his "body, whether it be by life or by death," and that if his life should be spared, it would be for Christ that he would live and labor; and that if he should be put to death, his martyrdom would still operate to bring gain or advantage to the same cause. So that he really did not know which to choose—nor did he choose—but there was one thing he did earnestly desire—the return of his Lord, which would be far better than either.

I know that those who hold to the very popular notion that dying saints do not wait in sleep for Christ to come and call them, as he promises, but that they go themselves at once into their reward in heaven, will object strenuously to the rendering I have given. For this text, as it is commonly rendered, seems to confirm their view. Indeed it is the one main support of this doctrine. It would be difficult for them to make out a plausible argument for their doctrine without it. It is quite natural that they should be loath to give it up.

But if they will for a moment consider how unworthy and inconsistent is the sentiment they attribute to the apostle Paul, how out of his character it is with his whole manner of life, and how he conflicts with what he is saying and even makes him contradict and stultify himself, by declaring he did not know which of two alternatives to choose, and then immediately expressing his earnest desire for one of them, I think they will be constrained to admit—however reluctant they may be to do it, that the rendering I offer them, is no doubt, the one that should be preferred and adopted.—J. H. Pettingell in Bible Banner.

The Iron Crown of Lombardy.

Describing a visit to Monza, Octavia Hensel says, in the San Francisco Chronicle: We found the Cathedral at this royal Summer palace city a perfect museum of antiquity. In the sacristy, a most fascinating young priest showed us Queen Theodolinda's fan, of brown silk and carved wood, made to close up like the pretty circular pocket fans of our own day. Her dressing comb, of ivory, set with precious stones, and a necklace of emeralds, rubies and diamonds to match her crown of the same precious gems, incrusted in a band of gold, were magnificent, but most quaintistic. Her signet ring of sapphire, upon which was carved her coat of arms—a hen and tiny chickens picking up the grain—and a goblet of sapphire were marvels of art. Innumerable church treasures were also displayed, and then we were taken to the white marble chapel in the crypt where the iron crown of Lombardy is kept.

The ceremony of showing this strange and beautiful historical relic is most impressive. Preceded by two acolytes swinging burning censers, two priests in alb and stole enter the chancel. After incensing the altar the great brass doors of the repository are unlocked and a priest mounts up a small ladder and takes out the crown, hung in a gold and garnered pyx, between plates of purest crystal. This he places on the altar, and after a number of genuflections and bursting of incense, visitors are admitted one by one to the altar to look upon the quaint old jointed crown, whose small golden plates are incrusted with precious stones, but the real treasure of the crown is the small iron circlet within this golden band, roughly wrought out of iron nails, the nails of the cross found by Empress Helena.

The outer crown has six plates, or links, to suit the different sized heads of sovereigns who have been crowned with it, while the iron circlet has small holes, into which it rivets can be placed to make its size correspond with the outer crowns of gold. Napoleon crowned himself with this diadem. When the pope was about to place it on his head that most consummate of self-sufficient individuals, the little Corsican declared as he had won the crown there was no one greater than himself to crown himself, took it and placed it on his head.

This church, built by Queen Theodolinda and dedicated to St. John the Baptist in the fourth century, was destroyed by the Emperor Barbarossa in 1200. In 1262 it was restored, and the history of its foundation, represented by paintings, was added a century later. The carvings on the pulpit represent the crowning of Berengarius in the ninth century. Medallions of all the Emperors, from the time of Constantine, crowned in this church, surround the triforium of the nave, and in the chapel beside the baptistery is an exquisite picture by Guerisino of the Virgin and St. Elizabeth, a picture full of rosy flesh tints and "hill country" landscape almost modern in tone and treatment. This evening, in order to "do" the patriotism, as we had "done" the plebeian during the day, we took a carriage for a drive around the bastions, a superb broad space, built on the old city walls, bordered with magnificent horse-chestnut trees in double rows and public gardens, squares and handsome buildings. We gained admittance to the arena built by Napoleon I. to contain 30,000 spectators. It is used for races or sometimes flooded with water for rowing matches and boat-racing.

Please find enclosed two dollars for your paper another year. I had overlooked the date of subscription of the last year, hence I am a little behind time, and not wishing to be without your paper which I prize so highly, I hasten to forward the amount. I hear no preaching, or the faith of the RESTITUTION in this place, though I believe it is the teaching of the word of God.

We have a small village of four thousand inhabitants, and we are trying to support nine churches all claiming to be Christians. Is it not lamentable? Cannot something be done to bring about a spirit of love and harmony among professed Christians? May God hasten that happy day, is the prayer of yours in hope.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, October 7, 1885.

NOTICES of books and other matters must be deferred as our time since returning from Michigan has been constantly employed.

SINCE our last issue the Editor attended a conference meeting held at Watson, Michigan. The meeting was an occasion of much enjoyment to all who participated in its exercises. The social meetings were of an unexceptionably interesting character. The brethren and sisters were engaged and more than ready to take an active part in prayer, exhortation, and praising God in "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." The faithful labors of the brethren have an influence for good. Eleven persons yielded the obedience of faith to the requirements of the gospel—being baptized by Br. Woodward Sunday afternoon.

FROM a paper sent us by Br. O. W. Young—The Brooklyn World—we clip the following item.

MORE TROUBLE FOR SATAN.

Messrs. George W. Young, John Donaldson, Samuel Wilson, William H. Donaldson and William G. Roth are the incorporators of a new religious society to be organized in this city. The articles of incorporation show that the society has been organized "for the dissemination of Biblical knowledge orally, and by means of the press, prominence being given to the doctrines of conditional immortality and the personal premillennial coming and reign of Jesus, the Christ, the truth of which doctrine this society affirms."

The Eastern Complication.

There has nothing transpired with regard to the Roumelian complications to warrant any very definite prognostications as to what may be the outcome of the disturbances in the East. We append the expressed opinion of one who is familiar with Oriental matters from personal residence and close observation.

EX-MINISTER WALLACE INTERVIEWED.

NEW YORK, Oct. 5.—Gen. Lew Wallace, ex-Minister of Turkey, looking hale and hearty to-day at the Gilsey House, said: "I do not think any action will be taken by Turkey until the signatory powers meet. The Sultan has too much common sense to run haphazard into war. He will await the issue of the conference. In case of a disagreement among the Powers probably the whole of Europe will be swept into hostilities—Russia, France and Italy on the one side, and England and Austria on the other. Germany, guided by Bismarck, will endeavor to act as arbiter. Austria would immediately take possession of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Russia would occupy Bulgaria and Roumelia. The conference is most likely to result in status quo. It is scarcely to be expected that Europe will go to war to further the ambitious plans of Prince Alexander of Bulgaria. Russia is always looking forward, and keeps an eye on strategic points. Russia already has a passage of the Danube. With Roumelia she would have the Balkan Mountains and a clear way any time into Turkey. The Powers desire to pluck the bird, but the question of division can never be satisfactorily arranged. Turkey understands fully that her position in Europe depends upon their rivalry. The small powers, each adjacent, want a slice of territory when a division occurs. Greece, for her part, would make an effort for Macedonia, but in that comes conflict with the ambition of Servia. So you see how many complications can arise in the Bulgarian question."

Editor Restitution:

I write to thank you most heartily for the thirty-five copies of THE RESTITUTION, containing Brother Crookott's article on the life and character of my dear husband. Well known as he was to the "brethren scattered abroad," I am sure there is not one—as there is not one of his own immediate family, but will think it in every respect most fitting and just. He has caught all the points of his high character with singular accuracy.

My husband loved, with a devoted love, THE RESTITUTION. He wrote for it as long as his strength would permit, and when he ceased to be able to write for it, he looked for it weekly with great anxiety. Six months before his death, he drew up some texts of Scripture to be read at his burial—and above an inscription to be put on his tomb-stone—highly characteristic of the great thought of his life—"Looking for the Son from heaven."

Faithfully in the One Hope.

JEWELRY OF THE CAUSE.

Some two hundred independent spirits who had thrown off the shackles of the veil-covered church, listened to men taught of God and led by his Spirit, at the second Annual Meeting of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, held at the Church of the Blessed Hope, Brooklyn. Some sheep were there, which were not of this fold, many were strangely clad, but they are loved by our Shepherd, and they belong to him, for they can pronounce their Shibboleth in their love one to another. I know not what an ordinary church love-feast is like, but I do know that a few of God's chosen ones had a feast of treasures, new and old, brought from the book of God on this occasion, which in joy, rivaled the wildest flights of fancy, and brought that peace which flows like a river, to many hearts. The jewels that were displayed were not new, but many had new setting which added luster to the gems, and increased the joy.

Did you ever contemplate who shall comprise the company that shall stand upon that sea of glass, of transparent gold, before the apocalyptic throne and sing the song, the new song? Do you intend to be there? who, who will be there, will they who look for the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds, when Jesus comes? will they who expect to enter within the Holy Place before our High Priest, Jesus, comes out? Will they sing the song, will they who expect the final salvation of all men's souls by a graduating process through side doors from hell, into back doors of heaven? And what is that song, the burden of it which only the redeemed can sing? "Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power, thou hast redeemed us by thy blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth. The thrones of everlasting empire are ours, and we shall live, the perfect body of Christ, the manifested word, the logos of God for the age and on forevermore.

Look again, we have another picture. Apples of gold in fretwork of silver. Did you ever think, ever stop to think, who you claim to be, whom you represent yourself to be? Christians! and what does the term imply, the bride, the espoused of Christ, the virgin daughter of Jerusalem, the Lamb's wife. Are you really in earnest, are you the betrothed of Christ, has he chosen you from the teeming millions of earth's souls, and do you love him, love him, with a love above all other loves, does your love for him most the love of the Father? Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God. Have you ever weighed the promise, "that ye might be partakers of the divine nature," made just like God's nature? Oh, what precious promises are these, a royal priesthood, a holy nation of priest kings after the order of an endless life, a peculiar treasure unto God above all people. A crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God. Jesus asks you to believe, and all these are thine, and more because of the Father's love. Are we the joint heirs with Jesus to all the promises of God? Now listen! Jesus says, If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not; but if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works, that ye may know that the Father is in me and I in him. Now if we are what we profess, we can speak like him, we can reiterate his words; but stop one moment, are we in earnest, are we what we profess, are we deceiving ourselves? Can we look at our works and say to the sinner and the cold and pulseless professors in the Laodicean Church of the present day, If ye believe not my words, which are the words of the Lord, believe us for the works sake, (and if we do not the works believe not our words) that ye may know by them and believe that the Father is in us and we in him. Are we doers of his word, that we may point to ourselves in such a way? are we doing the work in the absence of the Master, while the shadows deepen on the world's dark pathway, and the opening vista of the millennial day is only held back by the angel proclaiming the morning cometh? Verily the night is far spent, the day is at hand, and the world is trembling at the appearance of a star, while we are looking for the Sun of Righteousness to arise with healing in his wings. Are we listening for that voice that shall call the faithful servants? Have we heard it in the past? To the law and the testimony, he that believeth on the Son hath the witness in himself. He that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life.

He is coming now, is your lamp filled with oil, is it lighted and shedding its radiance on the pathway of some blinded erring one that would believe but never had a chance?

To give more of the scintillations of beauty which flashed from the gems held up to our gaze at the meetings of the Association, would take too much room, so reluctantly I close the lid of the casket, and remain looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ.

J. O. BARNABY.

ONE FAITH.

Notwithstanding the oft repeated declaration that "we cannot all see alike" the Bible abounds in the most positive injunctions that unity and harmony are essential factors in God's plan of salvation. We well know the "holy horror" that is excited in the minds of some when an approach is made toward definite doctrine. "Why! would you have us subscribe to a definite creed"? says one. I answer unhesitatingly yes, for without a creed it is impossible for a religious body to exist. Do not start in alarm at the above statement. Webster defines "creed" as a "brief summary of the articles of Christian faith." Now have you Christian faith? Does it contain one or more articles? Do you know what those articles are? Can you repeat them? Then you have a creed, and if that creed was formulated by the unerring Spirit of God then you ought not be ashamed of it, but if the "creed" you believe emanated from some uninspired ecclesiastical body let it go to the "moles and the bats." In a more general sense creed is defined by Webster as "that which is believed." Now when the inspired servant of God wrote "the things most surely believed among us" he was simply repeating "our creed." A prominent feature of the creed given by "holy men of old who spake as they were moved by the spirit of God" is that it must be strictly observed, no substitute can take its place. Hear Paul on one "article of our faith." "Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel than that ye have received let him be accursed." The gospel which they had received was good news about God's kingdom that the prophets declared should be set up on the earth. Please do not flatter yourself that you will escape the curse if you have "honestly believed" in a sky kingdom, or in a church kingdom. To those who by their writings seem willing to excuse those who though honest are widely mistaken in their religious faith, we would suggest reading the fate of Uzzah, a sincere and zealous man, no doubt honest in his act of trying to save the ark from falling to the ground, but he disobeyed a positive divine law and suffered death for his disobedience. To those who would discourage a hope of salvation without a full belief of the gospel and its subsequent obedience, let the fate of Saul in going beyond the commandments of the Lord be a sufficient rebuke. That unity should characterize God's people is abundantly shown throughout the Bible. David thus beautifully refers to it, "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." He compares it to precious ointment, and to the pure heaven-distilled dew of Mt. Hermon. How can unity and harmony be secured in an organic body? The answer is not a metaphysical speculation but a thoroughly demonstrated truth, it is simply this, that each member composing the body shall yield full and complete obedience to the laws governing the body of which it is a member. This is true politically, socially, morally and religiously. Whoever has witnessed the military movements of a body of soldiers has had a striking example of what strict discipline can do when a uniform rule has been thoroughly followed. See the entire column moving in such perfect harmony that it seems as if one mind pervaded the entire ranks. So it does, for such movement is directed by one mind.

The beauty of this united and harmonious action is shown in a perfect harmony that prevails among the different members of a human body. A lesson of wisdom may be learned from Paul's beautiful illustration of the oneness of God's people. A human body unless a monstrosity can have but one head. It must have members of different degrees of honor, each member must work in harmony with the others, all the members are necessary to completion, for that believeth on the Son still has the body. Let us remember that God has placed the members in the (Christ) body as it hath pleased him. Do not try to make a monstrosity of the one body by dictating terms to others and thereby assume the position of a head to the body. The vital functions of the body are performed by the heart, do not become dissatisfied because you do not occupy that place in the body (the heart) figuratively that the apostles occupied (vitalizing the body by miraculous powers) but content yourself with the position in which God has placed you in the body. If you cannot be a useful and ornamental hand, try to be a serviceable foot. If you cannot be a skilled architect to work on material for this grand temple, be a hewer of wood or a carrier of water and you will in no wise lose your reward. God needs and will have all these diversified workers. May God grant that each member in view of the precious moments allotted for the work, may resolve to faithfully discharge the duties assigned him and thus merit the plaudit of the Master "thou hast been faithful over a few things enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Waiting for the Kingdom.

Conference Report.

The second yearly meeting of the Church of God in the Abrahamic Faith met, as before announced, in Watson, Thursday evening Sept. 24. And we can truly say, never before has Watson ever experienced, and enjoyed such a meeting. O, the blessedness there was in that gathering. It seemed truly that Jesus of Nazareth had called in and taken up his abode, within each heart. The attendance from abroad was large, and each face seemed to beam with a glad, new light. A light from the Son of God. Meeting began Thursday evening with a prayer and social feast, followed by a sermon from B. W. Woodward from 1 Cor. xvi. 13. Friday morning at 9½ another prayer-meeting, then a sermon from Bro. Bennett, text Acts xxviii. 28. Friday evening another prayer-meeting, a house well filled, expecting to hear from Bro. Chaplin, but he was very tired and requested that the brethren continue their prayer-meeting which they did. Saturday morning another feast of prayer and praise, followed by a richer feast of gospel words from Bro. Chaplin. At the business meeting Saturday afternoon the following officers were unanimously elected. President Jacob Lemon, Vicksburg; Vice President Wm. Moses, Byron Centre; Secretary Mary Woodward, Dutton; Treasurer Wm. S. Kent Watson; Executive board, S. N. Pike, W. W. Jameson, Sr. Saville Weaver, J. Grant, Isaac Catt. B. W. Woodward was appointed State Evangelist, and M. A. Woodward assistant Evangelist. Bro. Woodward gave a brief report of his labors the past year as follows: Preached about 200 sermons, baptised 13, traveled over 3000 miles.

Saturday evening Bro. Chaplin preached from Rom. viii. 1. Sunday morning prayer meeting, then another sermon from Bro. Chaplin, Heb. iii. 1. At about 3 p. m., we gathered with many friends at the lake side and witnessed the willing obedience of eleven souls, as they put on Christ by baptism. Sunday evening Bro. Chaplin spoke from a part of Luke xxii. After the sermon, Bro's Houser and Jameson were ordained for the ministry. The Lord's Supper was then solemnized, after which came the handshakes and sad good by's, and as each hand grasped that of our dear Editor's, the hearty God bless you, told only feebly of the good each had received from him. A writer once said, how much we take away from such a gathering depends on how much we bring with us. Judging from appearances each one brought much with him.

We thank God that among those who thought to meet with us, were Bro's. Wm. and Richard Rollabock of Indiana. These brethren will ever be remembered by us all with Christian love. Hoping this is only one of many happy gatherings we may have with them, and we pray God to spare the life of our dear Bro. Chaplin to bring not only to us but many others the cheering messages he brought to this our second yearly conference. On our way home Wednesday morning, we stopped by the water's edge and assisted three others to put on Christ by baptism making 14 in all who were baptised at this meeting; and so the good work goes on, and we repeat what was said one year ago, we may all look for a forward movement all along the line.

Believe the Book.

In closing, let us take the Book, and let us believe it from the beginning to end—every word true—and the words we can't understand, let us believe them. You that are working in the vineyard, feed on the Word of God. I believe the reason the people won't come more than they do into our churches is because we don't feed them enough on the Word of God. They have been fed on sawdust long enough. For men who have nothing but essays it is hard to get pulpits, and it will be harder. The reason there are so many pulpits vacant is that there isn't men enough willing to give the word of God. Go into one of our city parks in winter to feed the birds and throw down a handful of sawdust. You may deceive them once, but you won't a second time. But throw down crumbs, and they'll sweep them up. So in the churches, give people the Word of God and they will know the difference. A man once made an artificial bee, and thought no one could tell the difference between that and a real bee. But another man said he could show the difference. He put the two bees down on the table, and then put a drop of honey before them. The real bee went for the honey. There are a great many artificial Christians, and they don't want the Word of God. They'll go somewhere else. Well, let them go. For every one that goes five will take his place. What we want is to give people the Word of God in season and out of season. I think we have got to have more expounding. A great many churches have more exhortations all the time, and it gets very tiresome. There's got to be expounding as well as exhortation. I have got an idea that the Sunday morning services ought to be given to expounding and the afternoon or Sunday night given to exhortation or preaching. I believe that is the reason the Scotch people have got the advantage of us Americans.

THE SCOTCH.

I don't believe there is any place in the world where error has such a slim chance of getting a hold as in Scotland. The Scotch are a most wonderful people. You've got to be careful in preaching to them, or the first thing you know some old woman will come up with her Bible under her shawl, and say: "Here; you said so and so. The Bible says so and so." If you make a misquotation, a Scotchman will straighten you right up; but you might make forty misquotations in an American church and nobody would know the difference. We would have better preaching if people would open their Bibles and see whether a man is preaching the Word of God. In Scotland a minister doesn't think of preaching till everybody has found the text. Go to Dr. Bonar's church, in Glasgow. One of the most impressive scenes is to see 1,200 or 1,300 people, and not a soul but has got a Bible. The old Doctor will wait till every one has found the place, then he will tell them what the passage in that place means, and then he goes on to another verse. When I was in London the last time, a solicitor—a lawyer—from Edinburgh, came down to London to spend a Sunday there. After I had got through preaching, and had gone back to my little room, he came and said: "I was at Glasgow to hear Dr. Bonar." I said, "I wish you would tell me what he preached about," and he went on and told me. The subject was that passage in Galatians in which Paul tells of his going up to Jerusalem to see Peter. The Doctor, said my friend, just let his imagination loose a little in describing what took place between Paul and Peter. He could imagine that one day Peter said, "Paul, will you take a walk today?" "Yes." So arm-in-arm they walk, talking about the Kingdom of God. A little while and they enter the Garden of Gethsemane, and Peter says, "There is the very spot where Christ prayed. John fell asleep there. James right there. I was right there, asleep. I didn't know what he was passing through, though I had never seen him so sorrowful. When I awoke, an angel stood right there (pointing out the place), and there was Christ, sweating great drops of blood, the blood running down his face—passing through that last agony." The next day Peter turns to Paul and says, "Will you take another walk to day?" That day they go out towards Calvary, and all at once Peter stops, and says: "There Paul; this is the very spot where his Cross was. It isn't quite filled up yet. One bleeding thief was hanging there, and the other there. Mary stood right there, John there, and James there. I was on the outskirts of the crowd. I couldn't bear to get near him that day. I couldn't catch a glimpse of his eye, but just looked on him." The next day Peter turns to Paul and says: "Paul, shan't we take another walk to-day?" "Yes; I would be very glad." They go out toward Bethany, and suddenly Peter says: "There, Paul; this is the very last spot where I saw him. We were talking with him, and all at once I noticed his feet didn't touch the ground, and the last I ever saw of him, he was up there in the air; and while I stood there, two men—might have been Moses and Elias, I didn't know, appeared and talked to us." Now, don't you think people like that kind of preaching? It will warm up these cold hearts of ours to hear about Christ. Don't you think that literally took place? Nineteen hundred years have passed away, and go to Jerusalem and try to find these spots; and tell me that while Paul was the guest of Peter who wouldn't take him and show him the very spot where the Lord and Master had gone away to Heaven! I haven't any doubts about it. And what we want is just to take the Scriptures and make them real. That's what we want—to hear about Jesus Christ—and any minister that can feed his people and tell them about Christ is the man I want to hear. That's what we want in our churches. God help you that are preaching to preach the Word of God. Make it as plain as you can. If we had more of the Word there would be fewer defalcations and scandals inside the Church. It seems to me the time is coming when there should be a change in the churches of God in this land.—Extracts from Moody's Sermon.

My dear wife was a true and conscientious Christian, was baptised in 1880 at Emporia, Kansas, by Brother Elder Lovesey, and was truly devoted to the cause of our Savior Jesus Christ. She leaves the writer with 7 children to mourn for her, but we do not mourn as those who have no hope, for we know that our Lord will bring her with him, when he comes to gather his jewels, and we look forward to a grand reunion at the resurrection. As none of our Brethren are in this part of Kansas we had services by William Morrow of the Seventh-Day Adventists. Your Brother in hope of being found worthy to meet my dear wife with all our loved ones, when our dear Savior comes. Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

IN MEMORY.

Of Phebe Wait who died Sept. 16, 1885, the following sketch is written. She was born in Charlotte, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., Jan. 26, 1810, lived seventy-five years, seven months and twenty-two days, and died. She was the first white child born in that township.

When she commenced to go to school, she went through the forest, finding her way to the log school house by marked trees. She lived to witness the march of civilization, the clearing away of the dense forests, the rearing of commodious farm houses, beautiful villages and towns. Her active mind took notice of these changes, and pleasant has it been to listen to her conversation concerning them; but more pleasant to hear her talk about the great change to take place when the kingdom of God shall be established in the Land of Promise, and shall spread and grow till all the evils of the present age shall be removed, and the earth shall be filled with the glory of Jehovah.

She was married in 1827, April 11, and has been the mother of ten children, four of whom still live. In the spring of 1849, she moved with her husband, Adin Wait, to Erie Co., Pa., and settled in Washington township. For several years they lived on a farm. Her father, Arvah Austin, was a member of the Baptist Church in Leona. Phebe joined the church when she was quite young, but afterward joined the Presbyterian church, because the place of meeting was nearer to her place of residence. Soon after they had settled in Pennsylvania, a man named P. A. Smith came into the neighborhood, preaching that the creature man is entirely mortal; that immortality comes through Jesus Christ; that Christ is soon coming to raise the dead, change the living saints, and set up his kingdom on the earth. His preaching created a great stir in the place, so much so, that Professor Kingsley of Allegheny College came up to put down the "heresy," but failed in the attempt. His learning was not sufficient to overthrow the testimony of the prophets and apostles. The truth took root in the hearts of a goodly number of people, and all succeeding efforts to uproot the truth have failed. Phebe was slow to receive the "new doctrine" at the first, but finally embraced it, and held it fast till the day of her death. Having embraced the truth, she earnestly advocated it, walking with those who came out of the churches and took their stand on the side of the faith once delivered to the saints. She did not learn the whole truth at once, but progressed till her faith took in the restoration of the kingdom of Israel, and the blessing of the nations under the reign of the Righteous Branch of David and his chosen ones. Her house was the house of the pilgrim. Very many of like precious faith have been entertained under its hospitable roof. She was a woman of great decision of mind and character, firm in the government of her children, exemplary in her deportment. In her declining years she became somewhat deaf, so that it was difficult to converse with her. This was a source of trouble to her as she took great pleasure in conversing with her friends; also it deprived her of hearing the word preached.

On the evening of the tenth of the present month, she received a stroke of paralysis. She suffered intensely till the sixteenth, and calmly fell asleep in death at 7 o'clock in the evening. The funeral services were held at her residence in Edinboro, conducted by Mrs. L. M. Stoddard, who gave a short but appropriate discourse concerning the resurrection; then we followed her to the grave where she was laid to rest till the voice of her Savior shall call her forth, we trust to die no more. We mourn, but not as those who have no hope.

Jesus has conquered both death and the grave,
And He clothed with all power his people to save;
Soon to redeem us, in glory he'll come,
And then we will praise him in Zion our home.

HE KNOWETH BEST.

What if the way seems long and weary
Thy tired feet are forced to tread?
Some day thou shalt look back with wonder,
And say, "My steps were gently led,
The way was short."

What if the rough stones wound thee sorely,
And to thy pathway terrors lend?
Turf soft and green thou will find only
When thou hast reached thy journey's end,
Where thou shalt rest.

What if thou seest more of shadow
About thy path than sunshine's light?
The days that are but grey and cloudy
End sometimes with a radiance bright,
At sunset time.

What if the work be very heavy
Thou dorest now with many fears?
When all thy work slips from thy fingers,
Tis'no own shall coy with falling tears,
They were brave hands.

What if the things thou most desirest
Are given to those who price them not?
Perhaps some day thou shalt see clearly
That they would not have blessed thy lot.
He knoweth best.

What if thou fain wouldst shift the burden
In sorrow thou hast borne so long?
Before thee lies the crystal pavement,
There shalt thou cast it with a song.
Thou canst but wait.

What if the blessing of God's favor
Seems held from thee, thy work to crown?
Some day thou shalt see that his mercy
Did forever and aye shine down
On thy faint heart.

ANTICHRIST, 1 JOHN ii. 22.—MAN OF SIN, 2 THESS. ii. 3.

Writers have attempted to prove that these two characters are identical, personal, and future. Of the man of sin, that "Wicked" we have written at some length. Of Antichrist we desire to pen a few thoughts.

John says, 1 John ii. 22, "He is the antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son"—ουτος εστιν ὁ αντι χριστος, ὁ αρνουμενος τον πατερα και τον υιον. This is the antichrist, the denying of the Father and the Son—the relationship of the Father to the Son, and of the Son to the Father. Some (Docetæ or Phantasiasts) said Christ (Messiah) could not assume flesh, and, therefore only seemed to be born, grow up, work miracles, suffer, die, rise from the dead; the relationship, therefore that Jesus of Nazareth assumed, was, in their estimation, impossible and absurd. Another class (the Corinthians,) acknowledged the things written in the gospels to be real, but denied that Jesus was the Son of God. One class denied the humanity of Jesus, the Christ, the other rejected his divinity. The Jews said, For a good work we stone thee not, but for blasphemy, and because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God." John x. 33. The Jews believed that the Christ, their anticipated Messiah, was the Son of God, and that the Son of God is himself God; but an incarnated God was denied.

To the Jews Jesus of Nazareth, was simply the natural son of Joseph. The Jewish idea found its way into the early Christian Church. Of this relationship (Father and Son) Estius saith, the opinion of Irenæus is probable, who understood John as speaking here of the false teachers of his own time, who denied Christ to be the Son of God, and God to be the Father of the Christ."

The word antichrist (used by John) may have two interpretations; 1. It may mean Instead of Christ, and refer to false Christs; or, 2. It may signify, Opposed to Christ, and, therefore include all those teachers that denied, either the divinity or humanity of Jesus of Nazareth.

It will appear, then, that the character of Jesus of Nazareth had its assailants in the apostolic age. To place him in a true light before the church and the world was the mission of John, both in his gospel and in his epistles. He had seen; and had been the intimate companion of the man Christ Jesus, had seen his miracles and heard his instructions; saw him expire on the cross, and conversed with him after his resurrection had witnessed the spread of Christianity; and had seen the rise and progress of its enemies; and knew its most vulnerable points. What they were can be readily learned from his writings.

John says, "Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus (of Nazareth) is the Christ, (Messiah of the Jews) the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name. John xx. 30, 31. Turn to the beginning of his gospel and examine, to its close. How expressive and pointed:—The word was made flesh and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father) full for grace and truth. Jno. i. 14.

After years of toil and persecution, he speaks again and appeals to his own knowledge and personal experience:—That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the word of life; (for the life was manifested, and we have seen (it), and bear witness, and show unto you, that eternal life, which was with the Father and was manifested unto us). That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you. 1 John i. 1, 2, 3. Read his entire epistles.

The Apocalypse is his third Revelation of the Character of the Son of God. Read a list of his names: "Jesus Christ;" "the Faithful Witness;" "the first begotten of the dead;" "the Prince of the kings of the earth:—washed us from our sins in his own blood;" Rev. i. 5, 14, 18. "He that holdeth the seven stars (churches) in his right hand;" "who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks; he that hath the sharp sword with two edges;" "the Son of God, who hath his eyes like a flame of fire, and his feet like fine brass;" "who hath the seven spirits of God, and the seven stars;" "he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth and no man openeth." "The Amen, the Faithful and True Witness, the Beginning of the creation of God;" "the Lion of the tribe of Judah;" "the Root of David;" "the Lamb;" "worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing;" "God and the Lamb," "the word of God," "King of kings, and Lord of Lords;" "the light thereof (New Jerusalem)." John sees the glory of his person, and has a distinctive view of him in the exercise of his royalty as well as of the divine honors paid him in the presence of the Father Almighty.

No one can read the Apocalypse, without having the most exalted view, of Jesus' divine character.

John's writing (contained in his gospel, in his epistles, and in his Revelations) are sufficient testimony of his view of the divine nature of Jesus of Nazareth. No intimation that he was the natural Son of Joseph.

If any one has the least shadow of doubt as to the divine nature of Jesus of Nazareth (as he was termed), let him study the writings of John, who was his familiar companion, and, therefore, a competent witness.

The fact that John lived to extreme old age, and saw the early development of the great apostasy, should also be taken into consideration, he having, in his epistles, taken special notice of such heretics as attacked the character of the Son of God. No one conversant with John's writings, can have any doubt of his faith in Jesus' exalted character, as the Son of God, and as such, was made flesh and dwelt on earth as the incarnated Messiah.

Who can believe the apocalyptic writings, as they describe the personality—the sayings, and doings of the "Lamb of God," and witness the adorations of the heavenly hosts; and then say from the convictions of his own enlightened reason, This man, companion of the Almighty on his throne, before whom angels fall and ascribe all honors, is simply like James and Joses, and Simon, and Judas, and their sisters, the naturally begotten son of Joseph!

While looking, for the last forty-five years, in fond anticipation, into the heavens, to see the returning Messiah in all the glory of his divine nature, the reflection, that, from the midst of us, has arisen a class of persons, adopting the fatal heresies of the first century, is by no means cheering.

We would kindly request such persons, again to review their position. Read, and fully master the thoughts expressed by John. Examine carefully his sketch of the nature, words, and deeds of Christ as recorded in his gospel; then study Jesus as presented in the Apocalypse; after which study John's epistles, where he describes by the name of Antichrist, those who attack the character of Christ as the Son of God. After you have mastered his ideas, as therein presented, please examine the internal evidence of his claim over James and Joses, and Simon and Judas, to be the Messiah the Son of God.

We cannot believe it possible that a man, such as Joseph, could beget a Son, so distinct in his nature, life and acts, as was Jesus from Joseph's natural born children; this problem perplexed the Jews. Assuming that Joseph was the real father of Jesus, as well as of James and Joses, and Simon and Judas, "Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren, James and Joses, and Simon and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath this (man) all these things?" Matt. xiii. 55, 56.

Whence his name (Jesus): his wisdom? (at the age of twelve years), His private character? his words? his deeds? He has not obtained this knowledge and wisdom from our schools, for he never went to their schools, besides he did not teach what was taught in their seminary nor in any other institutions of the world.

They said, "Never man spake like this man;" such knowledge, and yet had never learned it from man. The problem could not be solved by the Jews, because they said that he was the natural son of Joseph. Jesus himself, solved the problem:—God is my Father. I teach not my own doctrine but that of my Father; I learned it of him. I command the tempests by virtue of being the Son of God. I am the resurrection and the life (eternal) for the same reason.

Take this view and all his life is clear, and full of light; assume the Jewish position, and all is dark. The internal evidence that Jesus was not the begotten Son of Joseph, but of God, is overwhelming. No man can master its teachings, without being converted to their irresistible convictions of truth.

We do not wish to utter any unkind remark, yet we must defend the character of Christ. It is certainly true, that on the eve of Christ's return, the errors of the first century, relative to Christ's nature are waking up, and entering upon their destructive mission.

Much has been recently said about a personal antichrist. According to John's definition, the antichrist is here already. We have now a class of persons, who, though differing on other points, agree in denying the Relationship of Father and Son. They deny the elementary and cardinal truth to establish which, John wrote his gospel and his epistles, and for the truth of which the Apocalypse was also given.

I am not willing, as one looking for the return of Jesus, the Son of God, to be satisfied with the return of a personage, inferior in any particular to the one described by John in the Apocalypse. Of him I say, "Come, Lord Jesus, quickly. Amen. Even so."

J. P. WESTHER.

RESPONSIBILITY.

Each person and each class, is responsible for the talent or talents given them. "Where much is given more is required." Luke xii. 41, 48.

The leading publishers of our Bible have felt responsible for their fidelity to God and man in giving the word—the text in its integrity. Hence the revision to remove all inaccuracies, as far as possible.

The Christian class feel responsible for faith—the obedience of faith, and its spirit in a godly life.

Hence on confessing Christ they accept his second coming and kingdom, in their relation to God and their fellow men—in earthly kingdoms. This is humanity to man as it is piety toward God; because it has "the promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come," and because "good will to men, brings glory to God."

This surely is solid ground on which all can stand and be strong.

The text having been agreed on, there can be no rational objection to its confession and proclamation—letting its light shine! So far all is plain.

Then the doctrine, condensed in the caption of chapter and page, is authorized and enforced by the facts of the case.

However, our brethren "in position," and churches, and clergy, "of influence," unite to disparage the doctrine of the text, as to the second advent, given us, (Dr. Brooks says over) "300 times in the New Testament"!!

Another class admit the second advent; but object to the time! But here also, they overlook the data and measures of time in the text and margin of the Bible, which started and has sustained, the faith of the second coming near. Amen.

Note. There has been a revision of the general text; but none as to this fundamental doctrine of the second advent or its chronology! It provided for a tarrying time; and having had this, the coming One will come; and will not tarry! Thus the doctrine and its order in time, has a basis for faith that challenges acceptance from all who regard God, or his promise, "the wise shall understand."

The Gospel—What does it Embrace?

First it is a proclamation of God's purpose and plan concerning the earth and the human family, and, secondly, of the means which he saw fit to employ to develop the instrumentality to carry out his purpose. He formed the earth to be inhabited Isa. xlv. 18, and that by a class of beings that would be in harmony with himself. But man put himself out of harmony with God by transgressing his law. Now God is making use of the means he chose to develop the instrumentality that will bring man into perfect harmony with his divine will and purpose, or as the apostle Paul expresses it, "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will according to his good pleasure which he purposed in himself. That in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one, all things in Christ both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him." Eph. i. 9, 10.

This plan was proclaimed to the first pair in Eden that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head and that this instrumentality is now being prepared is evident; for the apostle says:—Rom. xvi. 20; The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. Speaking to those that were being called out by the gospel. And that this plan will embrace the whole human family is plainly stated in the covenant that God made with Abraham saying, "In thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed" Gen. xii. 3. And again "Behold I bring good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people" Luke ii. 10. That God's purpose and plan was frustrated by the introduction of sin into the world we do not admit, for if he is omnipotent in power, he could have prevented it, and caused that to be done that would have most redounded to his glory and honor and the good of the creature man, and that is just what I believe he did; and if he is omnipotent he knew at first just what would be for the best, and what would not, for "known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world." Acts xv. 18.

And that God will ever rule evil to the good of mankind and his (God's) glory I fully believe, for surely the wrath of man shall praise thee, the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain Psa. lxxvi. 10. That God permitted evil to be introduced into the world for a wise purpose seems evident from the fact that prior to the transgression man did not know good and evil. Gen. xii. 3.

Now after that man has had the bitter experience of sin and its consequences he will be prepared to enjoy and appreciate the blessings that God proposes to graciously bestow upon all the nations of the earth through his chosen instrumentality, viz. Abraham and his seed.

No wonder that Paul should exclaim, Oh the depth both of the wisdom and knowledge of God. Rom. xi. 33.

Yours for truth. A. EITSMAN.

[How wide may be the range that salvation may take in a coming age we pretend not to affirm nor deny. We have no faith in the doctrine of universal salvation however. No law in God's universe is more unyieldingly fixed than the law of sin and death when sin is finished. While the perishing may be saved by the operation of the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, the perished are inexorably doomed. Eternal life is a matter of conditions. There is a class who will have eternal life and a class that will not. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." Jno. iii. 36. Whatever God may do in a coming age, let us labor to save men and women in this age. Let us set life and death before the living multitudes, and urge the claims of the gospel upon all. The Bible has its most solemn warnings to all the impenitent. Repentance toward God, faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ, and obedience to all the gospel requirements are as obligatory now as in apostolic times. If a holy life and a holy character result from these fundamental principles, then an abundant entrance will be administered to each faithful one into the everlasting Kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.—Ed.]

The next quarterly session of the North-western Pa. A. C. Conference will be held with the church at East Branch Warren Co. Penn., commencing Friday evening Oct. 16th and continue over next Lord's day. Conveyances will be at Spartansburg and Spring Creek Stations at 4 o'clock Friday afternoon to meet those coming by rail.

"Ye Do It Unto Me."

O, that I were a king! one day I cried—
Not that I wished for aught of kingly pride,
But simply for the means at my command,
To lend, wherever I chose, a helping hand.

Then would no traveler, weary, sad and sore,
Be turned without assistance from my door!
Nor outstretched palm of beggar, raised to me,
Though fearful, trembling, unrewarded be.

The sick one, too, to cheer his waning hours,
Should breathe the fragrance of the choicest flowers;
And o'er the birds would sing for very joy,
Because my hand had gilded some alloy.

When lo! a voice beside me made reply:
You are but one of many thus who cry;
Yet all can surely do a kindly deed,
Though it be small as mite or mustard seed.

And there are words that only need be said,
To soothe the fever'd brow and aching head;
And there are songs that all can sing who may,
To cheer the pilgrim, faltering, on his way.

And smiles, to earth as dear as April showers;
And sympathy, and charity,—rare flowers,
While one I know it cannot fail to please,
As unto Him ye do the least of these.

A Young Man's History.

I first saw him in a social party; he took but one glass of wine, and that at the urgent solicitation of a young lady to whom he had been introduced. I next saw him when he supposed he was unseen, taking a glass to satisfy a slight desire. He mocked at the thought of danger. I next saw him late in the evening in the street, unable to walk home. I assisted him thither, and we parted. I next saw him reeling out of a low grocery; a confused stare was on his countenance, and words of blasphemy were on his tongue, and shame was gone. I saw him once more. He was cold and motionless, and was carried by his friends to his last resting-place. In the small procession that followed, every head was cast down. His father's gray hairs were going to the grave in sorrow, his mother wept that she had given birth to such a son. I returned home musing on his future state. I opened the Bible and read: "Be not deceived; drunkards shall not enter the kingdom of God."

This is a sad story. Alas that it should be true! When a boy, our friend was as happy as any of us. More than once, when students together, did he sneer at my teetotalism; when I urged him to sign the pledge, he laughed at me, and scoffed at the bare suggestion of danger. Poor Fred! his father had the glass on his table, and there the appetite was formed. Young man, beware of the first glass. Fathers, banish the glass from your tables, if you would not bury your sons drunkards.—Golden Censer.

At the Queen's Table.

Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, had a palace at Schonhausen. One day Queen Elizabeth, the wife of Frederick, was walking in the garden connected with this palace. Her gardener had a niece named Gretchen with him in the garden. She was on a visit to her uncle. Gretchen lived in the city of Berlin. Her father was a gardener, too.

The Queen talked with little Gretchen, and was so pleased with her simplicity and her bright and intelligent answers to the questions she asked her that she told her uncle to let her come to the palace and make her a visit. So Gretchen dressed herself very neatly and went to the palace at the time appointed.

One of the court ladies who knew about it saw her coming, and told the Queen, who was then at dinner. The good Queen was much pleased to hear that her little visitor had come. She ordered her to be brought in at once. Gretchen ran up to her kind friend, courtesied to her very respectfully and kissed her dress. At the request of the Queen she was placed on a chair by her side, where she could see at once all the splendid sights which the table presented. There was a large company dining with the Queen. Lords and princes and officers of the army and ladies were there, sparkling with gold and jewels. It was the first time this innocent girl had ever seen such a sight, and the Queen felt curious to know what effect it would have upon her.

Gretchen looked quietly upon the costly dresses of the company, and at the beautiful dishes of china and gold that covered the table, and was silent for a while. Then, while all the persons at the table were looking at her, she closed her eyes and repeated in a simple, touching way, this verse of a hymn her father had taught her.

"Jesus thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are—my glorious dress,
'Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head."

The company was greatly surprised and deeply moved. One of the ladies said to the Queen with tears in her eyes, "Happy child! We thought she would envy us, but I have much more reason to envy her."—The Fountain.

Dear Children:

I know you all gave with delight upon a lovely garden, and while in it, your childish joy is intensified in the pleasing research of fresh beauties, and if you can pluck a handful of nature's gems of brightness, to gladden the heart of some dear one at home, then your youthful feet seldom tire or grow weary.

Now let me first picture to your eye of imagination an elegant garden, which the Lord God planted, its name signifies, "Pleasure or delight." It looked toward the east, or sun-rising, the warm beams of the ruler of the day touched this spot first, and the brilliant bloom of life left its sweet kiss on every flower, causing it to send forth a most delicious fragrance, and being nature's first effort of strength to cast out her varied beauties of life, every tree was pleasant to the sight, and good for food, no decay causing waste was ever seen there, and the watchful eye of the gardener, who was to dress and keep it,' found no canker worm of destruction feeding on the tender plants, but the breathing leaves fluttered in the glowing sunshine of life. A charming river, clear as crystal, gushing with life whose waters made glad every tree, flower and herb, glided in four peaceful streams through this splendid garden. The name of the first signifies, "Extension of the mouth, or changing." The second, "The valley of grace." The third, "The sharp voice or sound." The fourth, "That makes fruitful." Birds of exquisite plumage would flit from tree to tree singing their sweet melody of cheerful note, and only in this way was the silence of heavenly joy broken, except in the cool of the day the voice of the Lord God was heard walking in the garden. Just imagine, dear children, the Lord taking hold of the hand of the first man he had created, and gently leading him into this magnificent abode. His whole being must have been enamored with delight, his penetrating eye, which had never been dimmed with a tear, saw vividly the beauties which garnished his lovely home, his sensitive organs such as taste and smell, most sacredly drank in the rich supply around him.

But he was alone, he had no pleasant companion to share his joys, none to taste the delicious ripe clusters of fruit which were inviting another hand to pluck, no voice to blend with his in giving thanks, and praise, none to watch the flowing streams wend their way onward, filled with living fish, sporting in the sunshine of life. And perhaps when he named every beast of the field, and fowl of the air, and saw each had its mate, he wondered why he was not blessed with a sharer in his joys. "And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone, I will make him a helpmeet for him." So God caused a deep sleep to fall upon him, and without inflicting the least pain, he took from his side a rib, and with this, God built a woman, and brought her to the man. When he looked upon her, he said, "This is bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh, she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man." From the reading, it seems as though the lovely bride was formed in the garden of delight, and then brought as a gift from the hand of the Lord to her husband, who was created outside the garden. The deep sleep represented the sleep of death, which came upon him when he was what the Lord called "very good," and when he awoke out of this sleep, the first object he beheld, was one no doubt comely in appearance, fair in countenance, and exquisitely beautiful in form, with a face resembling his own, and voice bearing the same image of tone. What a precious mate! No wonder it is written, "Therefore shall a man leave his father, and his mother, and cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh." We can imagine how the gardener and his bride would range about their magnificent home, he having been a dweller there before her, could lead her from one tree to another, no doubt each fruit unfolding to them some new idea. I am not surprised that one whose name signifies, "Exalted Magnificence," should have thought our Redeemer was a Gardener, when he awoke from the sleep of death, for his work is to restore that which was lost. In my next I will tell you of two trees which grew in the garden of delight.

Yours affectionate Teacher.

Down in Buenos Ayres. Education. New England and Rome.

Ex-President Sarmiento, the founder of the public school system in the Argentine Republic, is the leading advocate of the higher education of woman in South America, having gained his advanced ideas while Minister to the United States. He is an intimate friend and regular correspondent of Mrs. Horace Mann, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton and other prominent women in the United States, and has imbibed from them the theories of the equality of sex which their lives have been spent in demonstrating. Through his instrumentality some forty American girls, graduates of Vassar, Wellesley, Mount Holyoke and other institutions, have been employed under ten years' contracts by the Argentine Government in the normal schools and female seminaries of this country, and their success has been phenomenal.

These teachers receive salaries varying from $100 to $150 per month, and are placed in positions, social as well as professional, which they could not hope to acquire at home. In every instance they have conducted themselves with the most commendable dignity, and although some of the economists in Congress and in the newspapers are grumbling over the large salaries they receive, they are greeted with the greatest distinction, and are entertained by the Government in a manner that our own educational authorities might well imitate.

Not long ago the Papal Nuncio, the Ambassador of the Holy See to the Argentine Republic, attempted to interfere with the management of a school over which a New England girl presided, accusing her of instilling Protestant ideas in the minds of her pupils. She declined to be dictated to by him, and he denounced her from the pulpit of the Cathedral. The schoolma'am brought the matter to the attention of the Minister of Education, who made an investigation of the case, which resulted in the Papal Nuncio receiving his passport, with a polite but firm invitation to leave the country. He resisted, and attempted to bulldoze the Government, but his attitude only hastened his departure, and now the Holy See is not represented at the capital of Argentine.—Extract from letter to the New York Sun.

Israel the Center of Divine Purpose.

If we ask what connection subsists between unbelieving Israel of the past and restored Israel of the future, between Jerusalem given into the hands of the Gentiles and Jerusalem restored; there are three facts which, according to the divine word, bridge over this interval.

In the first place, according to the word of God, it is obviously necessary that the Jewish nation should remain in existence as a nation until these latter days. Their enemies must not succeed in destroying them; their friends must not succeed in favoring them that they amalgamate through indifference and worldliness with the other nationalities.* And also it is necessary they should not be absorbed by the Christian Churches, so as to cease to exist as a separate community. How marvellously has all this been fulfilled every one can see, in the countries of Europe and of the whole world, where God has scattered his people.

Co-existent with Israel's continuance as a nation we are to expect, secondly, that throughout the whole of this period there will always be a remnant according to the election of grace. And thus it has been in the ancient, the mediæval, and the reformed churches to this day. And, lastly, that the gospel of the kingdom will be preached among all nations; the apostasy of Christendom will be fully developed, and become universal. And while the faith of the true children of God will be intensified in earnest waiting for the return of their Savior, the times of the Gentiles will thus draw to a close, and restored Israel become the center of the kingdom of God on earth.

How marvellous are God's ways! As at the first advent through the rejection of Jesus the gospel came to the Gentiles, so at the second advent of Jesus he will be received by Israel when he brings judgment upon apostate Christendom. And as at the tower of Babel the whole human race was scattered by the judgment of God, and thus was divided into nations, so by the mercy of God, immediately after the tower of Babel, through the election of Abraham, there was laid the foundation of that nation through which, as a nation, all nations as such shall be blest. Through the Church individuals are gathered out from among all nations to believe in Jesus; but it is through the nation of Israel that national Christianity will be established upon the whole face of the earth.—From "The Everlasting Nation," by Adolph Saphir, D. D., Reprinted from Messenger.

*The profound word of a Spanish Rabbi, uttered during the fearful persecution of Ferdinand, deserves to be remembered: "We are a nation, on whom rest both blessing and curse; now you Christians wish to exterminate us, but you shall not succeed, for there is a blessing resting on us; and a time is coming when you shall try to destroy us, and you shall not succeed, for we are under a curse."

"INCREASE MY FAITH."

Father, I ask for heavenly light:
To chase the mists of earth away;
Your hidden life' eternal truths my sight:
Increase my faith, I pray!

Past, passing all that lies between,
The cloud and sunshine by the way,
My eyes may rest on things unseen,—
Increase my faith, I pray!

That upward, where my Lord has gone,
My heart and hopes may rise each day,
Where he has led, my steps pursue on,—
Increase my faith, I pray!

When threatening clouds are dense above,
And storm and darkness hides Thy ways,
That I may trust—nor doubt Thy love,—
Increase my faith, I pray!

When, in the straits of wind and sea,
The strands of hope well-nigh give way,
Unasked, or I ask, to succor me!—
Increase my faith, I pray!

When alert, o'erwhelming as a flood,
Rise from the past in dread array,
That I may trust th' all-cleansing blood,
Increase my faith, I pray!

* * * * *

That through life's sorrow, care and sin,
And earth-born tumult, day by day,
Thy perfect peace may rule within,
Increase my faith, I pray!

Mine be the eye that through the night
Wait patiently the dawn of day;
Mine be the trust that asks not sight—
Increase my faith, I pray!

Till I have run my mortal race,
Till the last thickens pass away,
Till glory crown Thy work of grace,
Increase my faith, I pray!

* * * * *

The day is drawing to its close,
And what good deeds since first it rose
Have I presented, Lord, to thee,
As offerings of my ministry?
What wrongs redressed? what truths proclaimed?
What struggle pursued? what victory gained?
What good act rejoiced and attained?

JOHN HUSS.

At the death of Wycliffe, the "morning star of the Reformation," John Huss was eleven years old. The bright Bohemian boy had received such education as could be acquired among the poor people of his native village. He had heard of the doctrines of the early English heresiarch with pious horror. At that time the famous University of Prague was the rival of that of Oxford. To this only great seat of learning in Germany came Huss as a charity scholar. Upon the way his devout and devoted mother, who accompanied him, fell on her knees by the roadside and committed him to the care of heaven.

At Prague the child of poverty and toil applied himself to study with surprising ardor. His brilliant brain became stirred by the strong impulse of scholastic learning. He outstripped all competitors. At length he began to preach, and the renown of his rare eloquence and originality became bruited abroad. His novel and vigorous style of discourse attracted crowded congregations to his chapel at Bethlehem. Bishops left their dioceses to listen to the inspired utterances of the ardent and distinguished Bohemian.

Finally the poor charity student rose to be rector of the Great University at Prague. He became the most learned and illustrious man of his time. His engaging manners, his genius, piety and extraordinary eloquence made him eminent throughout Europe. His position at Prague was almost imperial. He enjoyed the esteem of nobles and princes. The king and queen were among his admirers and influential friends. All Bohemia was justly proud of its gifted son. His personal appearance was particularly impressive and attractive. His form was a pattern of physical grace, clear-cut, Grecian features possessed an irresistible charm of expression. His close-cut hair and beard, his Attic air and attire, his elegant exterior and courtly carriage suggested a picture of one of the polished philosophers of the period of the Painted Porch.

Yet he had made unforgiving foes. Europe was then embroiled in metaphysical strife. The controversy became boisterous, abusive and bloody. Huss was the recognized head of the faction known as the Realists; the French and Germans were mostly Nominalists. The factional feeling rose to such a pitch at Prague that, notwithstanding the popularity of Huss, five thousand German student professors withdrew from the University and instituted a rival school at Leipsic. Hoffman became the rector of the new college of the Nominalists. He and Gerson, rector of the Paris University, regarded Huss with relentless hate, as chief of the accursed Realists. They afterwards boasted that his death was indirectly due to them. We of this liberal, material age can scarcely understand how cultured, Christian gentlemen could thus do each other to death merely for a metaphysical matter that is now deemed too misty for discussion.

But Huss had other enemies whom he had more bitterly offended. He had already begun to exhibit the early elements of religious reform, anticipating the era of Luther by a hundred years. He saw that the Papal church had ceased to be Christian. At this time there were three contending Popes, John XXIII., Benedict XIII., and Gregory XII. He deprecated in unsparing terms the sinful and disgraceful conduct of these squabbling successors of St. Peter, and denounced with sharp satire the doctrine of indulgences, the corruptions and superstitions of the church, the pride and shameless license of the priests, and the ignorance, bigotry and brutality of the malevolent monks.

Jerome of Prague had returned from Oxford where he resided as a student. He was another bold and brilliant Bohemian of the same stamp as Huss. He had made a tour of Europe, eloquently defending his theses of reform against the most learned opponents that the universities could place against him. He had been imprisoned at Vienna as a disciple of Wycliffe. Upon being set at liberty he joined Huss at Prague, bringing him the books of the English heretic. These were eagerly devoured by the Realistic rector, who soon began to expound the doctrines and Bible of Wycliffe from the pulpit of the University. Prague became the centre of the progressive impulse in Europe.

Of course, the clerical class conspired to crush Huss. The Archbishop of Prague ordered the writings of Wycliffe to be burnt. Huss refused to comply. He was then cited to appear before the Pope at Bologne. He refused to comply. He was then pronounced a heretic and excommunicated.

HUSS BEFORE THE COUNCIL.

The Council of Constance soon assembled. This was the sixteenth ecumenical council, and was by far the most imposing and important ecclesiastical gathering ever convoked in Europe. According to the chronicles of Breslau, still preserved in manuscript, the assembly numbered four patriarchs, twenty-eight cardinals, thirty metropolitans, two hundred and six bishops, three hundred titulary bishops, two hundred and three abbots, eighteen auditors of the sacred palace, four hundred and forty doctors, twenty-seven prothonotaries, two hundred and forty writers of bulls, one hundred and twenty-three procurators of the Pope, a crowd of attendants of various kinds, twenty-seven embassadors of kings, dukes, or counts, and finally a great number of deputies from bishops, cities and universities. The Emperor Sigismund was present with all his German chiefs and prelates.

Constance was then the chief city in the little duchy of Saabia, on the borders of Switzerland and Germany, situated upon the lovely lake of the same name that replenished the romantic Rhine. It is now sunk in decay and grass grows in its streets. But at the time of the celebrated council it was a scene of splendor seldom surpassed. Its hitherto quiet streets were suddenly filled with revelry and license, with royal retinues, the red robes of cardinals, the pomp of prelates and princes in ermine and jewels, and legions of lords and legates. Its sittings commenced in the autumn 1414 and continued until April, 1418. After deposing three popes and electing a fourth, the council having healed what is called the great Western Schism and restored peace to the church, proceeded to deal with heretics, of which Huss was considered chief. He was summoned before it. Had he refused to comply with this citation, as he had that of the Pope, King Wenceslaus and the powerful barons of Bohemia, who had adopted his opinions and would have fought for him, would have successfully shielded and saved him. But he apparently had nothing to fear, as the Pope had sworn to protect him, and he was provided with a safe-conduct from the emperor.

With those guarantees of Papal and imperial protection, and assured of the constancy of his king and his country to his cause, Huss bid adieu to his faithful friends and disciples, whom he was no more to behold, and set out for Constance in October, 1415. His journey rather resembled that of a victorious hero than that of a proscribed heretic. Immense throngs gathered along his route to greet him as he passed and give him courage. It is related that he was respectfully saluted by even his ecclesiastical enemies. Some cities provided him a guard of honor. He entered Constance flushed with feelings of triumph. He made no effort to disguise his hated heresies, even in the hearing of maddened monks. It pleased him to provoke the anger of the pompous priests. What had he to fear? He possessed pledges of protection from the Pope and emperor, and all Bohemia was ready to withstand him from danger. He did not dream of the depth of popish perfidy. After he was cast into a dreadful dungeon of the Dominican convent and chained to the floor, he was informed that the church had adopted a rule forbidding faith to be kept with heretics. He had been lured to destruction by premeditated perjury.

The Emperor Sigismund gently expostulated against the outrageous violation of his safe-conduct; but the council pressed to him, from arguments adduced at great length, that he was free to break his faith with a man accused of heresy, and that the council, being above the emperor, could absolve him from his oath.

Before proceeding to punish Huss the council resolved to brand the source from which his heresy had been derived. Wycliffe had expired in peace, and his remains still reposed in consecrated ground. The council went through the farce of citing the buried reformer before it; and after due deliberation declared "that the said Wycliffe died an obstinate heretic, therefore they condemn his memory, and so order his bones to be dug up, if they can be distinguished from the faithful, and thrown upon a dunghill." The zeal of the executioners led them to transcend the strict letter of the sentence, when in 1428 they resurrected the bones of the English heretic from their grave at Sutterworth, where they had reposed for over forty years, burnt them to ashes, and cast them into a neighboring brook.

"The Avon to the Severn runs,
The Severn to the sea;
So shall Wycliffe's ashes spread abroad,
Wide as the waters be."

After languishing in a loathsome prison for six months, Huss was led out to his dreadful death on the 6th of July, 1416. After his executioners had placed on his head a sort of crown, upon which were pictured frightful figures of demons in flames and upon which was the inscription, "The Arch Heretic," he was made fast to a stake driven deeply into the ground. It being objected that he was bound with his face to the east, he was unchained and fixed again with his face to the west. His head was held fast to the wood by a chain smeared with soot. Faggots were placed about his feet, and around him was piled a quantity of straw. Fire was set to the pile, and Huss prayed and sang a hymn in the midst of his torments. After his voice had been drowned by the roaring of the flames his head and lips were observed to move as if still praying, until at last he gave up the spirit. The executioners tore in pieces the remains of his body and threw them back upon the fire until absolutely consumed, and then the ashes were cast into the Rhine. His clothes and furniture were also sunk in the river, lest his followers might preserve them as relics. Sigismund was present at the horrid ceremonies. Being cautioned by a by-stander that the course of the wind might bear an offensive effluvia to the position he occupied, he answered, "The odor of a burning heretic can never be offensive to Sigismund." The faithful and illustrious friend of the martyr, Jerome of Prague, was dragged to a noisome dungeon, where he was kept chained till the flesh literally rotted off his bones alive. He was at last led forth by barbarians of the Pope and tortured to death at the same stake at which Huss had suffered.

There is nothing in the history of the Roman Church that reflects upon it such indelible infamy as the proceedings of the Council of Constance. This assembly not only established the abominable doctrine that faith is not to be kept with heretics, but provided a horrible precedent by burning the gentle and gifted Huss. The following is extracted from the first of its decrees referring to the subject: "And the person who shall have promised them (persons accused of heresy) security, shall not, in any case, be obliged to keep his promise, by whatsoever tie he may be engaged." From the second of those decrees, which relates to the safe-conduct of Huss in particular, the following is quoted: "And though according to the natural, divine, and human laws, no promise or faith ought to have been kept with him (Huss) to the prejudice of the Catholic faith.

This execrable doctrine was still more emphatically enjoined by the Pope who owed his elevation to the Council of Constance, Martin V., in a bull addressed to Alexander, Duke of Lithuania in 1421, in which he tells the Duke "that he would be guilty of a mortal sin should he keep faith with heretics, who are themselves violators of the holy faith, because there can be no fellowship between a believer and an unbeliever."

This doctrine is boldly defended by the universal authority of the Catholic church. Says Dens: "Notwithstanding it is not lawful to lie, or to feign what is not, however, it is lawful to dissemble what is, or to cover the truth with words, or other ambiguous or doubtful signs, for a just cause, and when there is not a necessity for confessing." (Theol. Vol. II., p. 110.) Again he says: "The Vicar of God, in the place of God, remits to man the debt of a plighted promise." (Ibid. IV., 134-5.) St. Liguori says: "It is certain, and a common opinion among all divines, that for a just cause it is lawful to use equivocation and to confirm it with an oath." (Less., 1, 2, ch. 41.) Pope Urban, elected in 1087, says: "Subjects are not bound to observe the fealty which they swear to a Christian prince who withstands God and the saints, and condemns the precepts." (Fithou, p. 260.) Pope Gregory IX. says: "The fealty which subjects have sworn to a Christian king who opposes God and his saints, they are not bound by any authority to perform." (Decret, Vol. I., p. 618.) Again he says: "An oath contrary to the utility of the church is not to be observed." (Ibid. II., p. 353.) Again he asserts: "You are not bound by an oath of this kind, but on the contrary you are freely bid good-speed in standing against kings for the rights and honors of that very Church, and even in legislatively defending your peculiar privileges." (Ibid., p. 360.)

Dean Waddington, in his "History of the Church," page 458, make the following just remarks relative to the burning of Huss and the violation of his safe-conduct: "The guilt of the murder was enhanced by perfidy, and for the purpose of justifying this last offence, they added to those principles another not less flagitious than those already recognized, that neither faith nor promise, by natural, divine, or human law, was to be observed to the prejudice of the Catholic religion. This maxim did not proceed from the caprice of an arbitrary individual, and a Pope—for so it would scarcely have claimed our serious notice; but from the considerate resolution of a very numerous assembly, which embodied almost all the learning, wisdom, and moderation of the Roman Catholic Church.—*N. ## Arithmetic in Celestial Time-Keeping.

A time-piece perfectly constructed and adjusted according to the laws of horology, keeps accurate time without intelligence or understanding. But is there no intelligence involved in the construction of such a time-piece? A certain man had a watch which would not keep time. He carried it to a watch-maker, who examined it and pronounced it all right; still it would not keep time. He carried it from watch-maker to watch-maker, but none of them could point out any defect in its machinery, and none of them could make it keep time, or correctly mark the passing hours, keeping step with the motions of the earth and sun and stars; until at length one careful man counted the cogs in every wheel in the watch, and found that there was one wheel which lacked one cog of the proper number. Then the mystery was solved: all the watchmakers in the universe could not make a watch keep step with the stars, when a cog was missing from one of its wheels, or when a wheel had but fifty-nine cogs when it should have sixty, or only eleven cogs when it should have twelve.

A watch must run according to the law of its being; but the law of its being is only the embodiment of the will and plan and intellect of its inventor and producer, who reckoned the proper number of cogs needed in every wheel, and so arranged and combined them that the shafts which move the second, the minute, and the hour hands, can only revolve according to mathematical law, at certain relative rates of speed, corresponding with the revolutions of the earth, the moon, and the stars, making the passage of time in accordance with those revolutions.

The miscounting of a single cog is sufficient to thwart the purpose of the inventor of a watch, derange the whole programme, and render the watch useless. But the stars that shine above us are also parts of a great time-piece, which keeps the same time that is kept by our clocks and watches, only more accurately than any human mechanism can keep it. If the miscount of a single cog ruins the watch, what, then, of the miscounting of a single star? Can we, then, believe that this vast celestial time-piece, whose jewelled wheels count the, passing seconds, and whose majestic pointers mark upon the dial of the skies, not only hours, days, months and years, but centuries and ages unnumbered and untold, is the work of blind, unreasoning chance, or lifeless, inactive matter; or that it was tumbled out of unorganized chaos by the throbs and struggles of unintelligent and unconscious force? Shall we not rather recognize in the mathematical precision which marks the movements of the universe, the presence of one omnipotent, presiding, Mathematical Mind, who "calleth the number of the stars," and "calleth them all by their names?" Psalm cxlvii. 4.

When the French infidel said to the Vendean peasant, "We will pull down your churches, destroy your pictures, and demolish everything that reminds you of God," the peasant replied, "But you will leave us the stars!" And so long as the stars revolve and shine, so long the heavens shall declare the glory of God, and the firmament shall show his handiwork.

Chiseled upon a marble tablet in the wall of the Observatory at Williamstown College, are the words of Isaiah: "Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things, that bringeth out their host by number: He calleth them all by names, by the greatness of his might, for that He is strong in power; not one faileth." Isa. xl. 26. This was a prophet's call to the skeptics of his time, and it is as timely to-day as it was then. The French officers could dispute and deny the existence of a Creator, as they sailed down the Mediterranean beneath the splendors of the evening skies; but when Napoleon, wearied of their babble, pointed upward to the myriad stars above them and said: "All very well, gentlemen, but who made all these?" they were silent, as all atheists must be.

At not infrequent intervals, some pretentious scientist frightens the silly and simple-hearted by asserting that some wandering orb in its erratic flight is about to dash into this globe, and overwhelm the world in ruin. But the earth sweeps on in its orbit, and there have been no collisions yet. The myriad orbs that go careering through the skies have never lost their balance or rushed staggering from their proper spheres. And can this order, regularity, balance, and stability, based upon mathematical law, be the effect of blind unreasoning force?

The steam engine exhibits force, but it needs fuel to fire it, and a will to control and guide it. There must be a keen eye on the rails, and a firm hand on the lever; and back of all this there must be a central, calculating, planning, controlling, mathematical mind, a superintendent who counts the miles and counts the minutes, who knows the weight of trains, the power of steam, the speed of locomotives, and the value of curves and grades, and who gives the law by which trains are to be run. Talk of a universe run by chance, without regard to a guiding intelligence acting through mathematical law! You could not run a branch railway from Podunk Junction to Pug Hollow on such principles! A railroad where trains were left to run by force and chance, without mathematical control, would be strewed from end to end with derailed locomotives, wrecked trains, bruised heads, and broken bones. The boldest skeptic would fear to take passage on a railway train run without a controlling superintendent or manager, and without an intelligent engine driver, who would subject the train to mathematical law, as revealed in the time-tables established for its guidance.

And as the locomotive requires not only an inventor and constructor at the beginning, and a superintendent and driver to constantly direct and control it, so such a world as this indicates, in its constitution and order, not only the working of an omnipotent and omniscient Creator at the beginning, but the constant action of an omnipresent God, who rules and guides the destinies of creation, "upholding all things by the word of his power."—H. L. Hastings.

Marks of the Lord Jesus.

"I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." Gal. vi. 17.

A slave once carried a message, written in punctures on the skin of his head, which had been previously shaved to receive the writing. When his hair was grown, so as to hide the letter, he went unsuspected, and the person to whom the letter was sent, having shaved the letter-carrier's head, read, the message. The slave in old times often carried in his body the marks of his master, just as the sailor, in our own times, loves to have printed on his arm the initials of his name and ship, the figure of his cruel-faced Redcoat, or the anchor and cable. St. Paul carried in his body the marks of the Master to whom he belonged. The scars made by the Roman lictors' rods, with which he was "thrice beaten"—the red lines of those two hundred stripes which had been laid on him in the Jewish synagogues—the scars left by the stones which had bruised and beaten him down, and "left him for dead"—these marks of the Lord Jesus he carried with him, the proofs as to "whose he was and whom he served."

INSPIRATION.

"All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and (all Scripture) is profitable for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."—2 Tim. iii. 16.

It is strange that any should have affirmed that this text means only "that all Scripture inspired by God, is profitable." The context shows this to be incorrect; for St. Paul is urging Timothy to continue in what he had learnt from a child, even "the holy Scriptures, which alone are able to make us wise unto salvation," he then declares the source of those Scriptures as a reason for their being thus profitable—viz: because they are all inspired. He should have said, according to the opinion of such persons, those parts of the Scripture which are inspired. Besides, the original will not bear it; the first proposition, to speak logically, is distinct and independent; the subject "all Scripture," the predicate "inspired by God," the copula "is" understood; and the other part of the sentence, "and is profitable," etc., is either a continuation of the same predicate, or must form the predicate of another proposition, of which the same subject, "all Scripture," is the implied subject. If a superior says to a servant—"Sit down, and write an account of what I tell you, or what you saw, and I will see that it is correct; I will dictate the words where minute accuracy is necessary, and while I leave you to write in your own style, and express the things in your own words, I will look over you as you write, so as to ensure that each important fact and point is truly stated"—that servant's writing would as fully give what his master wished and approved, as if he wrote all himself. And this we believe, with reverence, the Great Master of the Apostles and Prophets did, as they wrote his word; so that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God."

A Beautiful Incident.

A poor Arab traveling in the desert met with a spring of clear, sweet, sparkling water. Used as he was only to brackish wells, such water as this appeared to his simple mind worthy of a monarch, and, filling his leather bottle from the spring, he determined to go and present it to the caliph himself. The poor man traveled a long way before he reached the presence of his sovereign and laid his humble offering at his feet.

The caliph did not despise the little gift, brought to him with so much trouble. He ordered some of the water to be poured into a cup, drank it, and, thanking the Arab with a smile, ordered him to be presented with a reward. The courtiers around pressed forward, eager to taste of the wonderful water; but, to the surprise of all, the caliph forbade them to touch a single drop.

After the poor Arab had quitted the royal presence with a light and joyful heart, the caliph turned to his courtiers and thus explained his conduct: "During the travels of the Arab," said he, "the water in his leathern bottle became impure and distasteful. But it was an offering of love, and as such I have received it with pleasure. But I well know that had I suffered another to partake of it, he would not have concealed his disgust; and therefore I forbade you to touch the draught, lest the heart of the poor man should have been wounded."

Greek versus Hebrew. The Original Manuscripts of the Old Covenant Scriptures, Which the Oldest and Most Credible; and Why do we Not Have their Translation in the hands of the People and the Ultimatum?

I purpose in this article to assert some truths that should be proclaimed from the house-tops; truths that have been throttled and held down for centuries by church bigotry and superstitious prejudice, truths that pertain to eternal life and the integrity of God's word and promise confirmed by an oath.

After due investigation, I assert and challenge intelligent contradiction, that the Greek manuscripts of the Old Covenant Scriptures are older by at least six centuries than any extant Hebrew manuscripts.

In the second place that they are more complete and reliable in every particular than any Hebrew or any other manuscripts of the Bible as a whole. In the third place, that the Hebrew manuscripts are the least reliable and most corrupt of any extant, and that the Hebrew text now extant and based upon them is the result of centuries of tinkering and correcting from comparison with the Greek, Coptic, Arabic and other sources, and that, too, by men who have no little knowledge of the old Hebrew language that they have not agreed among themselves as to the true meaning and use of as simple and fundamental a thing as "the letter-points" of the language, to say nothing of a proper understanding and use of the tenses of the verbs.

In the fourth place that "the Massora" or "Massoretic fragments," the only Hebrew manuscript authorities we have, are notoriously corrupt in their source, and emanate from a school of Jewdaistic theology started in opposition to the apostolic teaching, and that of the early Christian Church, the rise of which school was the fountain-head of all the flood of apostasy that still submerges the New Covenant Church, even in this nineteenth century of God's grace.

Of the fact of this apostasy as well as of the apostasy of the old Jewish church, the Scriptures themselves are the best evidence, but no student of secular history ever can deny the fact however widely they may disagree as to the causes. All Protestantism is a living assertion of the fact as well as a protest against it. We do well then to inquire practically into its causes. There is no question in the mind of any intelligent and honest inquirer that the apostasy of the Jew was owing to his blindly and obstinately standing away from, or in a word, his apostasy from God's revealed word; moreover that the consummation of this apostasy was the rejection of "the Christ," all of which and much more had been clearly predicted by their prophets, as well as the subsequent offer and calling to the nations (or Gentiles). God in the meantime in his foresight and providence having transferred verbatim et litteratim his oracular word into a language which was the vehicle of intelligent thought for the universal empire of the then civilized world, namely the Greek.

The recognition of this fact moreover is the acceptance and endorsement of the Scriptures in this language by "The Christ" and his disciples unequivocally and without reserve, as indicated by every quotation from the Old into the New, the harmonic agreement of which I boldly challenge any one to intelligently deny.

Why should professing "Gentile Christians" go to the people or the language then, whom and which, "The Christ" himself discards as of no practical utility? A people of whose leaders and followers he speaks as "blind leaders of the blind?" A language of which Hosea the prophet predicts that it and its wisdom should become confounded and lost? For shame. Shall we limit God, and suppose that God cannot speak his oracular word except in the lisping shibboleth of the primitive Hebrew? When by the mouth of all his prophets as well as by the mouth of his only beloved Son, he says, "I am going to call out a royal people for my name from among the nations [or the world; shall we expect him to speak in an unknown tongue?" Read Paul on this subject. Is there any profit in speaking in an unknown tongue unless it is clearly and distinctly interpreted? Does history show that God left the Gentiles (nations) to dig the golden treasures of his word out of what was the remote and obsolete Hebrew of that day, the day when he called them as he had promised and predicted he would?

Why does he say by the mouth of Hosea the prophet, if this be true, "Woe unto those who make counsel deep and not through the Lord. Woe unto those who hide counsel. Even their works shall be in darkness, and they will say, Who will find us out, and who will comprehend what we are doing?" Was this to be an age of "mystery" and "mysticism," this Gentile period? Does not the beloved Son speaking for the Father say "what ye hear in secret, proclaim ye upon the house-tops?"

If there is any value in the dead and buried Hebrew, bring it forth then; but don't make it a cloak for mystery, contradiction and nonsense. We are called "children of light" and are exhorted "to walk in the light even as he is in the light." Let us do it then and relegate mystery to the heathen which once we were, but now are not, God be praised.

Let us not confound "spirits" with "ghosts" any longer, nor speak of "blessing" our Creator, Preserver and Benefactor, who needs nothing from us except that we shall intelligently use the good gifts of his bounty with "grace" and "gratitude."

"It doesn't read so in the Hebrew," was the final argument of defeated Judaism to Christ's disciples and the early Christian Church, when they quoted the Messianic prophecies of their Old Covenant Scriptures as they read in the Greek, and indisputably proved that "Jesus the Nazarene" was "the One who cometh" and "verily the Christ of God." It was the impudent assertion of the Papal apostasy of later years, and it is the "last ditch" of nineteenth century apostasy and "mysticism" in all the so-called Protestant churches. Even so plain a historical and biographical fact as who "Jobab called Job" was, has, by garbling the testimony been made a mystery of—he who was "fifth from Habraam" (Abraham) in the line of Aesau (Esau) and the second king of Edom, the successor of Balak, the nephew of Moses by marriage, and with him and God's people in the wilderness as far as the foot of Mount Seir, a living monument of the fulfilment of God's promise to Habraam that he would bless Agar's (Hagar) offspring as well as Sarra's, has become in the mouths and minds of Hebraists either an antediluvian uncertainty or a mere myth upon which to build a proverbial philosophy of patience.

While it is that the intelligence of the nineteenth century, is content to take this garbled and perverted testimony when the true is waiting to be heard? Why this groping in the dark, and all this "New Theology" cry from benighted New England? Puritanism so far as it was anything more religious than the gospel was "Judaism" reasserted in the wilderness of this new world. The rest of it was superstition and solidulous ignorance. The true value of American civilization so far as it has any value is due to the light of the gospel which has been shining all this time, and enlightening all the world's darkness, whether it be Judaistic or Gentile. New England undertook to go back to "the weak and beggarly elements" of Judaistic and Hebraistic teaching. It spent too much time in "tithing the mint and the cumin" and neglected the weightier matters of the law (of love).

New England theology has undertaken to mold the great West to its apostate pattern. Thank God, it has failed. There is a revolt and "the new theology" cry all over the land is the result of it. In fact what they call "new" is not new, but a reassertion of the old, old truth of God's Word. It is the old, old battle cry of "to the word and the testimony," away with "mysticism and mystery."

Practical morality is better than a mysterious and absurd theology. This is really all the milk there is in the covenant of legalism. It is the result of common sense from Hebraistic and Christian apostasy, and professing Christians will do well to heed it. Stopping the ears will do no good, nor ostrich-like sticking one's head in the sands of time. Neither let us fall into the old error of crying peace, peace, where there is no peace. Remember, the Master's warning, "I come not to bring peace but a sword." This sword moreover, remember is "The word of God." The question then in its simplicity is, has this "sword of the spirit" been sheathed in the scabbard of apostasy or not? Has it been rusting in mystery and disuse? Have the churches "been worshiping God in vain, teaching commandments and teachings of men?"

In the light of the gospel here in the West we think so, and are not afraid to say it. This is the same old "battle of the standards." Under "The Old Covenant," it was Hebrew against "the Gentiles" (nations); now it is "The Gentiles" against the Hebrew. Then God was on the side of the Hebrew. Now God is on the side of "the Gentiles." For these are "the times of the Gentiles," and God is "calling out a people for his name." "To your tents then, O Israel." The gospel trumpet is echoing with no uncertain sound, and its call is to you "the lost sheep" wherever you may be among "the Gentiles" or "Gentiles" yourselves. It matters not. God knows and "The Christ" knows, and the simple test is "hearing." "My sheep hear my voice." "All that the Father hath given unto me will come unto me."

Do you hear? If you want to understand how the simple gospel call is related to all the grand purpose and plan of God Almighty in creation and redemption, the distribution of the angelic rule over the nations under the "Old Dispensation," the subordination of this angelic rule to "the Christ and his saints" under "the new," discard your futile efforts to get behind "the rail," which God Almighty has cast with a beneficent and wise purpose over the Hebrew people and their language "until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled" furbish up your Greek, or get somebody to honestly furbish up his and read God's word in the language of "the Gentiles," and you will be amazed at the idolatry so-called orthodoxy is bowing down to to-day in every land. The translations you are reading of God's word are expurgated and excoriated editions, vamped and twisted, and perverted to fit "the creeds" of apostasy and "the teachings of men." Read and see for yourselves. CHAS. GARDNER.

Jerusalem. Recent Changes in the Ancient City.

There is probably no town in the Dominion of the Sultan which has undergone more changes during the last few years than Jerusalem, and, as any change which implies progress implies also the increase of foreign influence, and is always viewed with suspicion by the Porte, the march of events in Palestine are watched by the Turkish statesman with a jealousy that finds its expression in a persistent effort to oppose it. As, however, the basis of the movement to which Jerusalem owes its increase during recent years is a religious one, and founded upon sentiment which proverbially thrives by opposition, all efforts to retard the influx of population and capital into the Holy City have proved unavailing. Owing to increased facilities of travel, the pilgrimages of both the Latin and the Greek churches have been more numerous. A new feature is that some of the richer pilgrims from time to time establish themselves here. This is especially the case with the Russian members of the Greek church. The influx of Jews has also been increasing to a remarkable extent. The Protestant sects are constantly enlarging the fields of their operations, and new charitable and educational establishments are springing up from year to year. An American society of Second Adventists has been resident here for many years, while many isolated religious cranks find within the Holy City an appropriated dwelling place for reasons known only to themselves.

The result of all this is that where as when I was last here, six years ago, only a very few houses had been built on the Jaffa road outside of the walls of the town, where now there is an extensive and constantly increasing Frank suburb. The price of the land has risen 50 per cent., and is still constantly rising. New hotels and shops have been opened to meet the increased demand. Within the last twenty years the population of the Holy City has certainly doubled, the increase consisting entirely of Jews and Christians. Apart from its sacred associations the city has no attractions as a residence of any kind, but quite the reverse. This fact possesses a highly important political significance, because it is evident that in the degree which the vested interests of rival sects and religions accumulate upon this spot, it is destined some day to become a bone of contention between them. It is probably the only city in the world where the same amount of capital and enterprise is expended upon subjects which are in no sense remunerative, while in proportion to its size there is none where a larger sum is annually given away, either in the form of charitable or religious donations. Nothing strikes one more than the proportion of buildings having some sort of public character or other to private dwellings, and these buildings are constantly increasing. They are all accommodated in the extensive premises belonging to the Russian Government, in the centre of which the Russian Consulate is situated, and which forms a sort of Russian suburb to the Holy City. Here one feels transported for a time to the dominions of the Czar, as he hears on all sides the Slav tongue, and finds himself jostled by men and women in the peasant costume of their own country, chaffering over wares which the more enterprising have imported to sell to their own country people, while they squat in stalls and booths which they have roughly extemporized for the purpose.

When you consider the amount of foreign money which is annually expended in Jerusalem by these hosts of pilgrims—those of the Latin Church, however, do not equal in number those of the Greek—by the tourists and the general influx of sight-seers who flock here during Easter week, and by the churches and societies in building operations, you can not wonder that many persons have of late years become wealthy, and that many natives of Syria and the Levant are attracted to the town in the hope of becoming so. The tide having thus set in, goes on rapidly increasing, and now the rivalry of the Latin and Greek Churches imparts, as it were, a stimulus to the whole jumble of creeds and nationalities which cluster around these sacred shrines.—N. Y. Sun.

THE RE-OPENING OF THE EASTERN QUESTION.

The seething complications of European politics have during the past few days evolved a new development. The revolution in East Roumelia, quietly and peacefully as it has been accomplished, is a matter of no slight importance to many nations; and, though as yet it has not been attended with bloodshed, may lead to a long and sanguinary struggle. In any case, it must involve the opening of the interminable Eastern question, which has a peculiar fascination for European statesmen, and which has already been the cause of several wars. It may be that diplomacy will settle this difficulty as it has settled others, but that is a presumption by no means assured. To the student of prophecy watching the movements of the nations and considering events in the light of the predictions of God's word, this revolution will be a subject of unusual interest, on account of the influence it cannot but exert in bringing the nations of Europe into that grouping which they must assume before the final consummation.

The startling announcement of the revolution published on Friday last is the product of several causes working together, some of which are obvious, and others are merely suspected. It is no wonder that an intelligent race should rebel against the effete and corrupt despotism of the Sultan, but there is good reason for doubting whether the people would have rebelled had not some motive power been applied below the surface. The hand of Russia has probably been at work for some time nourishing and organizing the prevalent discontent, and it is this suspicion that arouses the jealousy of other nations, who would probably have no thought of interference if they believed that the citizens were acting on their own spontaneous desires.

To the Berlin Conference the people of East Roumelia owed their existence as a separate State. That conference gave them practical autonomy but placed them under the executive control of the Sultan. The object sought was to give Turkey a rampart on the north of Constantinople which would be an effectual barrier to Russian aggression. It included the control of the Balkan Mountains, through the passes of which Muscovite troops would naturally be led in any attack on the Turkish capital. The diplomatists at Berlin were well aware that Bulgaria would be little more than a puppet in the hands of Russia, and if Roumelia had been joined with Bulgaria and the Balkan passes in the hands of the Bulgarian soldiers, officered as they are by Russian volunteers, Adrianople would lie at the mercy of a sudden forward movement by a Russian expeditionary column, which, once intrenched in the old Ottoman capital, would cut off the Sultan from his western provinces, and block the march of an Austrian force to his assistance in the event of the Vienna Government's deciding to interpose.

The New York Sun, in a bold article on the rebellion, thus describes the situation: "It was well understood by the Turks that the treaty wrung from them at San Stefano [which was cancelled by the efforts of the Earl of Beaconsfield and the Marquis of Salisbury, now the Prime Minister of Great Britian, when they went to Berlin] left them strategically helpless, and rendered their retention even of a foothold in Europe impracticable. Should Abdul Hamed fail at this juncture to make the most strenuous endeavors to keep the control of the Balkans, he will be certain to provoke an outburst of popular resentment like that which cost Abdul Aziz his throne and his life. Not only must he insist on his right to quell by force the Roumelian revolt, and thus preserve the means of defence that the Berlin Congress gave him, but he must act with the utmost promptitude, if he would prevent the flame of insurrection from involving the whole Balkan peninsula.

"The Servian rebellion proved that you cannot let a fire get under way in any quarter of south-eastern Europe without setting the whole region between the Danube and the Aegean in a blaze. Already the Servian army has been mobilized, and King Milan will find it impossible to long repress the excitement of his subjects and their passionate desire for extension southward. In Macedonia eruptive forces are so active that protracted hesitation on the part of Turkey, or the semblance of reluctance on the part of the great powers to sanction Ottoman coercion, would produce an explosion.....

"The Porte will lose no time in applying a touchstone to the sincerity of the other signers of the Berlin treaty by demanding their sanction of the enforcement of the rights conferred upon Turkey by that instrument. The existence of Turkey, considered as a European power, is unmistakably at stake. A glance at the map will show that the partition of Bulgaria and the erection of its southern section into a new principality under distinct relations to the Sultan was commended to Lord Beaconsfield by strategic reasons of the gravest character.

"It will be noticed that as yet Prince Bismarck is silent. When he speaks we shall know whether there is an inflexible determination on the part of the central powers to stifle the insurrection. But should his reticence be prolonged it would be construed as an indication of a purpose to let the conflagration get fairly started, and thus bring about the final expulsion of the Turks from Europe."

The Times says, "The Porte has now a perplexing problem presented to it—a problem that recalls the one it undertook to solve in 1877, with results to itself so disastrous. The revolution in Roumelia, though hitherto bloodless, has led to unquestionable infractions of the treaty of Berlin. No doubt Prince Alexander, in assuming sovereignty over South Bulgaria," as he quietly rechristens Eastern Roumelia, does so as his proclamation announces, in accordance with the wishes of its entire population. But whatever the popular ardor for annexation to Bulgaria, the treaty of July, 1878, recognized Eastern Roumelia as an integral part of the Turkish Empire. Prince Alexander's act in confirming the provisional governor who had been set up at Philippopolis was a violation of the treaty, as are his measures to punish opponents of the new sovereignty he assumes. The Porte is entitled by treaty not only to political but to military authority in Roumelia, garrisoning and fortifying all the frontiers, if necessary, although the public peace is to be preserved by native and local constabulary and militia. Yet we now see the Roumelian militia mobolised for junction with the Bulgarian Army, many Russian officers being found in both, and Prince Alexander's troops have occupied the Balkan passes.

"But while these gross violations of the Berlin treaty would justify Turkey in marching its army into Eastern Roumelia and restoring its authority, it has remained for several days in a dilemma. It finds treaty stipulations on one side and fears that the sympathy of Christendom is on the other. The very supposition that the rising has been purely local, not originating beyond the borders of the two countries involved, has grave suggestions of its own. Why should not other surprises occur and other movements as dangerous? While the single Turkish army corps now at and around Adrianople, re-enforced by a like body of troops at and near Constantinople, could easily disperse Prince Alexander's combined militia forces and hold the line of the Balkans, the first move of this sort might stir up a general uprising in the peninsula to aid the Roumelians, and Macedonia and Albania might be to arms.

"Turkey's last war took from her more than half the area of Europe absolutely dominated by her, and nearly one half the population. She may well pause before a contest that might lead to further dismemberment."

From the prophetic standpoint the situation is one of intense interest. Nothing can be clearer than the prediction that the empire of the Sultan must melt away. The Euphrates is to be dried up (Rev. xvi. 12), and that process, which has been steadily going forward for more than half a century, has made another advance in this rebellion. Again: the ten kingdoms which will constitute the reorganized Roman world are believed by prophetic expositors to include Bulgaria, which in the condition it was in two weeks ago would have been too insignificant relatively to occupy a place of such importance. Now, however, with Roumelia added to it, it is by no means an insignificant state, but one whose influence is increased by the fact that its people are a race of brave, hardy soldiers, who would form a valuable contingent in the great army which the Napoleonic Antichrist will gather for the final great battle of the world's history.

Readers who have studied the Rev. M. Baxter's work on prophecy, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," will remember that nearly twenty years ago he expressed the opinion that prophecy clearly indicated the erection of the Bulgarian kingdom and its subsequent aggrandizement and extension as one of the events which would precede the final universal convulsion. On all hands signs are accumulating that the end of this dispensation is now near at hand.—The Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

The Prophecy of the Incarnation.

It appears from the great Prophecy of the Incarnation, that the idea which was given of the Man-God, or Immanuel, was that of a deliverer and rightful inheritor of the land of Israel, the destroyers of all its oppressors, the remover of all its bondage, the multiplier of the nation, the increaser of its joy, the occupant of its throne, and the governor of its people for ever, yea, and the monarch of an universal and eternal dominion upon the earth. These predictions concerning the child are in this prophecy, and no others are in it. If it mean not this, it meaneth nothing. If a child was ever born of a virgin, it was for these ends he was born. And if he have not fulfilled these ends, then he is yet to fulfill them, nor would such a delay weaken but rather confirm the prophecy; for there is mentioned a mysterious waiting on his part, and rejection of him on their part, and a woeful visitation of darkness in consequence thereof. And accordingly they are so found till this day, rejecting his aid in miserable, woeful darkness, nothing of all the glory having been accomplished, but the very reverse; because the season of his waiting is not yet expired.

The prophecy therefore waits still for its great accomplishment in the Son of the Virgin, by the act and power of the Son of the Virgin. If any one say—"No; Jesus of Nazareth shall never sit upon David's throne, nor rule over the house of Jacob;" then, I say, Jesus of Nazareth is not the person here prophesied of, but some other. If they say,—"Yes, but he is the Immanuel born of the Virgin, who is now spiritually filling the spiritual throne of David, and spiritually reigning over the spiritual house of Jacob, and spiritually holding universal spiritual empire;" then all I have to say is, I do not know what the spiritual throne of David means. "It is the throne of a believer's heart." Where learned you to call a believer's heart the throne of David? "It is the throne of the Majesty on High." How dare you blaspheme, and call the throne of God the throne of David? And what use was there to tell Ahaz, in his present straits, that a Son should be born and a child given, who should reign in the hearts of men, and be exalted to a throne of God in the skies? And what signs of such an event were those two which were granted? Besides, these spiritualists know not where they lead themselves. If they will have all the substance of Immanuel's work to be invisible and spiritual, then I will have His birth also to be spiritual and invisible upon earth. If they will annihilate the greater part to please themselves, I will annihilate the lesser part to vex them; and, then, what have they left of all this bright and glorious prophecy but the shadow of a dream!—Prophetical Expositions.

Human Probation.

It has been a great mistake in the past to regard man's trial in this world as taking place under a system of moral law only. Whereas he is placed also under a system of adverse natural law; a system adapted to secure the highest kind of moral training for those who pass successfully through it, but one which cannot be said to provide an even-balanced trial for all men, because the majority are not endowed with the requisite moral strength to enable them to rise above the bondage to the creature which it imposes. Hence all theories of human destiny which presuppose such a fair trial are faulty. No theory can hold which does not take in the fact that other enemies of God, besides sinful man, are to be reckoned with in the final results of this system of Creation, and that the destruction of the enemies who have imposed upon it this yoke of bondage to corruption must bring with it deliverance to man, the highest creature, from these present adverse conditions. —L. G. Baker.

STOCKHOLDER'S MEETING.

The stockholder's meeting of the Christian Publishing Association will be held at the Christian Chapel Plymouth, Ind. Saturday, Nov. 7th, 1885, at 10:30 a. m.

Some pieces have been deferred to this number—others must go over to future numbers.

OUR Conference was held at Argos as appointed, and was well attended by brethren and sisters from abroad. Bro. Hook, Bro. and Sr. Woodward, and Bro. Chase did the public preaching; and their labors were well and forcibly, supplemented by earnest exhortations from our worthy President Bro. Dwiggins. In the social meetings our brethren and sisters generally participated. At this meeting we met Bro. Chase of Adrian, Mich., for the first time. Found him a firm lover and staunch defender of the faith once delivered to the saints, as well as an earnest advocate for practical piety and heart-consecration to God; and also one that cleaves heart and soul to that fundamental principle of redemption that Jesus is truly and properly the Son of God. We wish him God-speed in his labors for the cause. Bro. and Sr. Woodward remained after the Conference closed to hold some more meetings at Argos, and, probably, at other places. May God's blessing attend them wherever they may go. One sister was baptized Sunday afternoon by J. L. Wince. The Secretary will give fuller report.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

From a well-posted paper, and one careful and trustworthy in its statements we transcribe the following brief editorial on Oriental affairs. For more definite items to date consult our News Column. A dark cloud seems gathering over the Eastern world that may break out in a tempest of war and revolution. The days in which we live are ominous indeed. Let us watch and pray always that we may be accounted worthy to escape all that is coming on the earth, and stand before the Son of Man.

EASTERN EUROPE.

The condition of affairs in Eastern Europe is still threatening. The outcome of the difficulty cannot even be conjectured. A meeting of Ambassadors, to consider the Roumelian question, was held at Constantinople on Thursday of last week, but adjourned without transacting any important business. It is reported that Russia has decided to recognize the union of Bulgaria and Roumelia, and that Germany will offer no opposition to it. Austria will make compensation of Servia and Greece the condition of her assent. The claims of those two states have greatly complicated the situation. The smaller states in the united provinces are evidently distrustful of the union and jealous of the enlargement of the power of Bulgaria. The Servians are clamoring for extension of territory and demanding the annexation of Macedonia. Both Bulgaria and Servia have largely increased their forces on the frontier, and fighting between the troops of the representative Governments has been reported. Greece is also moving for an extension of her boundaries and making active preparations for war. The Porte is evidently much embarassed by all these movements and counter-movements and is undecided as to the proper course to pursue.

Interesting and Instructive Reading for the Young—This is the title of a beautiful volume of about 360 pages of original and selected matter exceedingly well adapted to please as well as instruct the rising generation. In this age of so much vile literature parents and guardians would do well to place this book in the hands of their children. Agents do well canvassing for this work. That it is brought out by so respectable a publisher as F. H. Revel is a good recommendation for the character of the book. We commend it as a Christmas present. Price single copy $1.00.—For terms to agents, etc. Address F. H. Revel, Chicago, Ill.

The Association for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge.—Report of Second Anaual Meeting at Brooklyn, N. Y.

It gives me much pleasure to inform your readers that we have had a feast of joy at our recent gathering. Much of the pleasure is due to the officers and congregation of the "Church of the Blessed Hope" who kindly granted the use of their cheerful edifice to us. There is one of the neatest and brightest places of worship in the great "city of churches," and what is better than this, the people who worship there, are warm-hearted and hospitable. Strangers who enter their church for the first time, even though they are not believers with us, are greeted with a warm shake of the hand, and made to feel they have fallen amongst friends, while to brethren their reception is a perfect ovation. To those who know the Pastor, Brother Geo. R. Kramer, it is needless to say, that very much of this spirit of cheerfulness is due to his genial countenance and winning way.

Our order of exercises was arranged for Friday, Saturday and Sunday, Sep. 25, 26 and 27. After the address of welcome by our President, Brother Geo. W. Young, on Friday eve., Brother H. V. Reed, of Chicago, gave a discourse on "The Dispensations." This was followed by the reading of a paper entitled, "Life from the Tomb", of which Brother W. Glen Moncrieff, of London, Ont., is the author. On Saturday Evening, Elder W. N. Pile, Editor of The Herald of Life, lectured, his subject being "Eternal Life in Christ alone." On Sunday morning Brother Geo. R. Kramer, Pastor of the church, delivered a sermon on "The Millennial Age," after which the Lord's Table was spread, and the memorials of our dear Redeemer's love, in giving his body to be broken, and his blood to be poured out for us, was partaken of. At this service the venerable Elder J. B. Cook presided. In the afternoon, Brother J. H. Pettingell, of Philadelphia, the well known author, gave an address, his topic being "The two ways"—"Life and Death," and in the evening, Brother H. V. Reed again came to the front and gave a stirring lecture on "The Gloom and Glory of Jerusalem in the light of History and Prophecy."

Besides these, at various times during our conference short addresses were offered by Brethren Jas. F. Gellatly of Baltimore, J. B. Keim of Philadelphia, N. J. Morgan of Winchester, Va., Brother Fuller of this city, Geo. W. Young, President of the Association, Samuel Wilson, Treasurer, and J. Donaldson, Secretary. The audiences at each of these services were very good, but more particularly so on the last evening, when the church was filled to the door, even chairs being placed in the aisles, to accomodate the people. As to the interest manifested in these services, it is but a poor description to say that there was most earnest attention given to all that the speakers said, and expressions were free on all sides of sincere appreciation. The "good seed" was wisely sown, and the purpose of God grandly pictured to the hundreds who were present. Altogether our Second annual meeting shall long be remembered by all who had the privilege of being at it. At the business meeting of the Association a large number of letters from brethren and churches were read—all wishing God speed to the work of spreading the light of the glorious gospel of Christ as undertaken by this united effort. Letters were also read from those who had for the first time seen the light through the tracts issued and distributed by this Association, and calling upon our Heavenly Father to bless it and emancipate others also. There were extracts read from letters sent by the following brethren and sisters: A. D. Eshelman, J. P. Weethee, Castle Churchill, Benj. Wilson, Jos. D. Brown, S. A. Chaplin, H. L. Hastings, Wm. J. Scofield, A. Graves, Henrietta Frankeberger, Horace and Polly Green, Henry Neale, Isaac McCurry, Wm. Glen Moncrieff, Wm. Brookman, L. Monteith, Cyrus E. Brooks, Mary A. Woodward, J. I. Calkins, Elizabeth Coffman, J. Z. Schuman, W. R. Way, B. Ackley, J. A. Wilson, John L. and Sarah R. Wince, H. D. and Libbie Palmer, F. A. Caswell, Jas. Bull, S. M. Shuler, John Teague, Wm. Rennie, L. C. Thomas, John Barber, and others, besides greetings from the churches at Chicago, Ill., and Winchester, Va.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: George W. Young, President; H. V. Reed, Vice President; John Donaldson, Secretary; J. O. Barnaby, Assistant Secretary, and Samuel Wilson, Treasurer. The Treasurer reported cash receipts for the past year, $581.77. Expenditures $433.28. Leaving balance on hand, $148.40. He also stated that the property of the Association consisting of publications on hand—electro plates, etc., was valued at cost price, $310.48.

The Secretary reported the work of the Association for the past year substantially as follows:—In regard to missionary effort, the Association had not done as much as it would have desired, owing to the fact of other work demanding nearly all the funds at our disposal, nevertheless whatever has been done in this line was accomplished by volunteer evangelists, who have been paid nothing for their services. By this means however, upwards of fifty discourses have been delivered in various parts of Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York. This does not include such preaching as has been done in the various churches with which the teachers are connected, but only such as necessitated a journey from home. Over 4,000 miles have been travelled in this work, and the expenses to the Association, for railroad fare, hall rents, and advertising, has been less than $38.00. These expenses are so limited, owing to the special advantages in railroad travel enjoyed by Samuel Wilson, one of our more active volunteer evangelists. By means of this labor hundreds have heard the blessed word of God expounded, and it is to be hoped that we will receive sufficient support, that will enable us in the near future to keep regular evangelists in the field, who can gather in the fruit of their labor.

At Brooklyn, Md., where so much was accomplished last year, the friends there have determined upon building a chapel and deeding the same to this Association. During the past year we have published 38,200 pamphlets, tracts, etc., and distributed 33,677 copies, 1,339 of these last being publications of the Conditional Immortality Association of Great Britain. As to the mode of distributing this literature, it may be interesting to state that we advertised in THE RESTITUTION that we would furnish reading matter free to any who could not pay for it, and to all whom members of the Association or other believers could recommend as honest investigators. We also inserted notices in our Quarterly, to send us the names and addresses of such as might be in search of truth, especially such teachings of the Holy Scriptures as we advocate. Thousands of names have thus been furnished us, many of them being those of clergymen, professors in colleges, universities, etc., who are regularly having our paper sent them. And it is gratifying to state that some of these clergymen have sent personally for samples of all our tracts, etc., while at least one of them, a man of considerable influence, and holding an important position, has sent for a large quantity of our publications, which he is scattering along the path of his labors, at the same time advocating the truths we teach. He has also furnished us with the names of other clergymen who are doubting their creeds, all of whom have been furnished with our literature. For prudential reasons we withhold names. Two hundred and thirty-five Campbellite Elders have had sent to them a copy each of "Human Immortality", a sixteen page pamphlet, one well calculated to teach the truth of life only through Christ. Other means of distributing might be mentioned, but let this suffice to show how we are sowing the seed, remembering that we leave the nurturing and increase to our Heavenly Father. Our earnest desire is to "work while it is called to-day—for the night cometh when no man can work." We furthermore desire the assistance of all who believe in the Lord's soon coming and kingdom, to unite with us in this work. All may readily perceive how true "In union there is strength," for by the many, each giving his or her little contribution, the good work goes on, whereas without such organized effort as ours, we are as if each had a little toy hammer trying to break the flinty rock, but by having all our little hammers welded into one, we have a weapon to make a breach in the walls of the enemy. The officers do all their work without one cent of pay, but on the contrary, devote their time and pay largely into the treasury to carry on the work. Come, Brethren everywhere, join our band, send in your little contributions. Twenty-five cents paid every three months will constitute you a member, or one dollar per year. Every one entitled to draw tracts, etc., to the full value of their subscriptions. Let those who can give more, do so; and rest assured your money shall be well spent. Our Association is now incorporated according to the laws of the State of New York, and a report of all receipts and expenditures have to be made every year to the officials appointed by the law, and our books must constantly be open for the scrutiny of legal authorities. Surely this is guarantee sufficient. Our next issue of Words of Truth will contain an extended account of the addresses and reports as delivered at our Annual Meeting, and any one desiring a copy, will be furnished with one free, or for any further information, please address,

Iowa Conference Report.

The annual meeting of the Christian Association of Iowa, convened at Irving, Iowa, on the evening of Sept. 24th, 1885 according to the previous notice. The time until three o'clock Friday was occupied by preaching and social exercises, at which time a short business session was called, minutes of last meeting read, and arranged for business meeting at nine o'clock tomorrow, at which meeting it appeared that many Brethren were here from abroad, but mostly without credentials as delegates. A motion was then made that so much of section five of the constitution as relates to the membership of this association, be stricken out, and the following substituted therefor. This conference shall be composed of all members of the household of faith in the state of Iowa, that choose to identify themselves with it, and will work for its interests. The motion was unanimously adopted. The report of Secretary and Treasurer received and adopted, shows eight dollars on hand of last year's funds, and ropes and tent material sold to the amount of four dollars and ninety-five cents, making twelve dollars and ninety-five cents on hand, and most all of the tent unsold. A resolution was then passed changing the name of this association to the Conference of the Church of God, for the State of Iowa, and instructing the Secretary to insert the same in the constitution. Adjourned until 3 o'clock, at which time a motion to locate the Annual Conference at Irving, was over-ruled by the chair, as being in violation of the constitution, which puts that business in the hands of the board. The election of officers for the ensuing year was as follows: G. R. Chown, of Irving, President, H. D. Palmer, of Alden, Vice President, L. H. Lincoln, of Blairsburg, Sec. A. Hipshir, of Irving Treas. The additional members of the board are R. J. Hill, of Floyd, J. W. Bishop, of DesMoines, and Joseph Fish, of Zearing. Minutes read and approved and meeting adjourned.

There was present at this meeting of those who labor in word and doctrine, Brethren Hill, Whitesitt, Eyohanet, and Myers. The preaching was all of a practical nature, not given too much to theory, and the social exercises show that those present are alive to the work and to the signs of the times in which we live. In short the meeting was fraternally enjoyed and will not be soon forgotten by those present; a letter was receive too late to be acted on by the conference from Elder C. W. Pitzer who has formerly labored with the "Advent Denomination" stating that he has become thoroughly convinced of the truths of the Restitution as taught and held by us, and desires to unite with our conference. Should this report come to his notice he will see by the amendment to the constitution that if he believes and is laboring for the spread of these glorious truths, he will find a place of welcome with us. We hope that a zeal may be awakened at these meetings that will tend to a general awakening of the drooping interest of the cause throughout the state.

Editor Restitution:

Dear Bro. I send you an article which I cut from the Household Department of the Toledo Blade, written on a subject which I have long desired to see in the columns of THE RESTITUTION and if you think it worthy of a place in your valuable paper would be glad to have it reprinted, and if not would be thankful to have it returned, as I wish to make other use of it. It corresponds exactly with my views on the subject. If there was less neglect among parents in performing their duty toward their offspring there would be less sorrow and trouble in after years. Verily that which we sow we shall also reap.

Truth and Honesty in Children.

For this week the series of papers on "Woman's Work" will be omitted, and a topic presented of much interest to parents, guardians, and all who have the care of children devolving upon them—"How can children be made truthful and honest?" The Household is in frequent receipt of letters similar to the one given below. Finding there was much seeking for light on this subject, the editor turned this note over to a mother who has four lively, boisterous boys of her own. The query and her answer are given below:

Will some one tell me what to do with a child 10 years old who tells stories, and also takes things that do not belong to it?—EDITH.

This little wail that comes up from one among the multitude of mothers of our land, brings to my mind the question that has often arisen within me, at seeing the unruly, disobedient offspring of parents whom one would suppose to be the ones to have ideally-behaved children. Do parents realize the wonderful responsibility which they have taken upon themselves in bringing children into the world? I am inclined to think not; or, if they do, then they fail utterly to accept that responsibility, and to recognize that the child will be whatever the parent makes it. Did parents realize this truth fully, and act up to it, appeals similar to the one above would not be heard so often. Hundreds of mothers—and fathers, too—all over the land have despairingly asked the self-same question.

There are some people who really believe that children are born thieves and liars—that the baby will grow up according to inborn characteristics, on the principle that "what is to be, will be." Therefore they look upon the development of all unlovely traits in their children, including a tendency to falsehood and theft, as something impossible to remedy, and let their little ones drift on, becoming each day more confirmed in their faults. I do not believe any such frightful doctrine. It is rubbish—an invention whereby a weak and neglectful parent strives to shift responsibility. Can any mother look into her new-born baby's face and believe that theory? No indeed. The truth is, our children are just what we make them. If a child lies or steals, it is not because he was born to do so, but because those charged with his training have neglected their duty.

The training of a child begins from the hour of its birth. What it becomes is the net result of its environment—of the influences thrown around it at home, at school, and among its associates. Of course, by far the greatest influence is wielded by the parents. Day by day the example of the parents is unconsciously, silently molding the character. Hence, if you want your children to be truthful and honest, teach them to rely implicitly upon every word, every action of your own. Make them feel—let them make it a boast, even—that papa never stories. Children are great imitators. Don't you see that if a boy is made to feel proud of his parents' truthfulness and honesty, it will powerfully influence him?

Every day we can see examples illustrating the power of parental example over children. For instance, I know a little four-year-old boy, who said to me recently, "When I get to be a big man, I am going to smoke cigars, like papa." It is just as easy to set a good example as a bad one—and how much more satisfactory! I have heard children relating to their somewhat incredulous friends some incident that happened, and verifying it by saying, "I know it is so, because papa said so!" They knew their authority to be reliable, and would not allow it to be questioned. Such faith in a parent can only be a result of absolute truthfulness on his part.

Children can be taught to be honest as well as truthful, and the two things really come under the same category. I believe that stealing comes, with most children, from a habit into which they are allowed to fall, of taking possession of things about the house that do not belong to them, they not realizing nor understanding that such an act as of the nature of stealing. The first time that a child does anything of the kind is the time to begin teaching him the wrong of appropriating that which does not belong to him. Let him understand clearly the rights of property about his home, and that he must take nothing that is not his own without express permission of the owner—be that the parent, brother or sister. This sort of teaching is practical religious instruction—too often forgotten, I fear, in the purely theoretical. Not only teach him to fear the wrath to come, but to respect himself. When a child learns to respect himself and to wish for the good opinions of others, there will not be much danger of breakers ahead. And in your teaching always keep in mind this one fact: That in order to be able to control and command the respect of your children, you will be obliged to keep yourself under perfect control.

What is to be done with a child of 10 years that has formed the habits of lying and stealing?

It will take time, and a large store of patience, to counteract years of gross neglect and carelessness on the part of parents. A boy of that age begins to think about what he will do when he gets to be a man. Question him, and find out the bent of his mind. Work upon that, and make him feel that he will never succeed unless he is honest and truthful. Bring both good and bad examples before him. Show him the advantages of honesty and truthfulness. Win his confidence, if you can; share his hopes and ambitions. Argue with him if he persists in his course. I have known the rod to argue beautifully some few times, but I think it advisable to use every other means first. Use that instead of the rod, and as there are but few boys in this world that are not tender-hearted, the appeal to their better natures will rarely fail.

Youth's Column.

Youth.

A manuscript poem by Robert Burns has been found among the poet's entire books which, it is believed, had never before appeared in print until recently published in London. It is entitled "Youth," and in style and sentiment is worthy of the Scottish bard:

"Youth is the vision of a morn
That dies the coming day;
It is the blossom on the thorn
Which wild winds sweep away;
It is the image of the sky
In glassy waters seen,
Which not a cloud appears to fly
Across the blue serene.
But, when the waves begin to roar
And lift their foaming head,
The morning stars appear no more
And all the heaven is fled.
'Tis fleeting as the passing rays
Of bright electric fire
That flash about with sudden blaze
And in that blaze expire.
It is the morning's gentle gale
That as it softly blows
Scarce seems to sigh across the vale
Or bend the blushing rose.
But soon the gathering tempests soar
And all the sky deform;
The gale becomes the whirlwind's roar,
The sigh an angry storm.
For Care and Sorrow's sordid gloom,
And heart-corroding Strife,
And Weakness, sinking to the tomb,
Await the Noon of Life."

A Touching Story.

We have read a touching incident about three little children, who, last autumn, late in the season, wandered alone in a dreary region of New Brunswick: the sun had already sunk in the west, and the gloom of evening was spreading itself over the surrounding country.

The night came on fast; and feeling sure that they could not get home before daybreak, the eldest (a girl of only six years) quietly placed the two little ones in a sheltered nook on the sea-beach; and fearing the cold chilly night for the younger children, Mary stripped off most of her own clothes to keep them warm.

She then started off to gather dry sea-weed, and whatever else she could find, to cover them with. Having tenderly in this way wrought for some time to make them a nest, she at last fell down exhausted with the cold, and half bare to the cold inclement night.

That evening the loving father and tender mother sat up wondering at their children's long absence; the hours dragged slowly past with anxious watching, and silent listening for the well-known pattering feet. In vain the fond parents' eyes pierced through the darkness. At length they roused the neighbors with their anxious inquiries after their lost ones. All that night was passed in searching and in tears, till, early in the morning, lying fast asleep, and somewhat numbed with cold, were found little Johnny and Lissie—but O! a touching spectacle lay near them; their young savior was stiff, cold and dead on the sea-weed which the poor little child heroine had not strength to drag into the nook where those she so deeply loved, and died to save, were sleeping. Thus this little New Brunswick girl died in her successful and self-sacrificing endeavor to save her brother and sister.

Does not this recall the love of the Lord Jesus Christ to you who read? Mary went to the full extent of human love in dying for her little brother and sister. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Yet the Lord Jesus laid down his life for his enemies, for "scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die; but God commendeth his love towards us," etc. He makes no mistake. Yet how many listen to this story with more emotion and interest than they do to the story of the cross, where the love of Jesus, the Son of God, is told in letters of blood!—Dawn of the Morning.

The Waldenses.

During four hundred years they are said to have undergone no fewer than thirty several persecutions, and there were times when the furnace was heated seven-fold. Such was the frightful persecution when Milton wrote his immortal ode—"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints;" and Cromwell threatened that, if the persecutions were not put a stop to, the guns of England would be heard thundering at the Castle of St. Angelo. Such, too, was the terrible persecution, when, after unheard-of atrocities, the whole surviving remnant of the people were driven from their valleys across the Alps in the depth of winter.

Among these was a family of the name of Bonnet, who lived in the lower part of the valley of Angrogna. The family consisted of a man, his wife, and three boys the eldest of whom was big enough to walk, and the youngest small enough to be carried, but the second was neither the one nor the other, and had therefore to be left behind. He was committed to the care of a neighboring family—Roman Catholics—whom the parents thought they might trust, and whom they charged not to bring him up a Roman Catholic, authorizing them to repay themselves the expense of his upbringing out of the family property, which, in quieter times, he might be allowed to possess. Two years afterwards the father returned, one of the noble band that fought their way back under the famous Henri Arnaud at the "Glorious Re-entry." The poor man had buried his wife in Switzerland, and the two children had likewise succumbed to the hardships of their lot. He became the more anxious to recover the boy whom he had left behind. But on going to the old neighbor's house, he was told the boy was not there, neither could they tell him where he was. He not was certain that they were imposing on him, and resolved to bring them to their senses. Gathering some half-a-dozen of his companions in arms, and providing them with faggots, he went one midnight to the house, knocked at the door, and again demanded his son. The same answer was given him. To this his reply was, that, if they did not produce him immediately, the house would be set on fire. Suiting the action to the word, he was proceeding to arrange the faggots, when the boy was brought to him dressed in the garb of a youth preparing for the priesthood. Carrying him off, they came to a stream, where they stripped him bit by bit of his Roman costume, flinging it into the water, then re-clothing him, one man giving him one garment and another another, till they got him home. The boy ultimately settled on the small property of his fathers, and from him the present pastor of Angrogna is descended.—Dr. Blaikie, in Sunday at Home.

LONDON, October 12.—The Standard's Berlin correspondent says: "Germany, with the approval of Austria, Russia and England, has proposed, in a plan for the settlement of the Bulgarian question, that the following principles be observed:

"1. That the Greek and Servian demands be rejected.

"2. That Turkey be advised to complete her military preparations so as to be ready to interfere in the event of Greece and Servia moving to enforce their demands.

"Lastly, that the union of Bulgaria and Roumelia under Prince Alexander, the latter avowing the sovereignty of the Sultan, be recognized."

BRUSSELS, October 12.—Mr. Gladstone has written to M. Emile Louis Victor Laveleye, the well-known writer on political economy, as follows: "I favor the Bulgarian union, but trust its present territory will not exceed its present limit, because I fear disastrous competitions between the great powers themselves, and also the Hellenic and Sclavonic races for an extension of territory. I express myself on the question with reserve, because my mind is perplexed by the many difficulties surrounding it. I see that Bulgarian union, excellent in itself, may produce innumerable evils."

OF A SISTER GONE.

She sleeps! a sleep we cannot break;
Tired day in night is sweetly blended,
Her voiceless lips mementary make,
For all is done; yes, all is ended.

All, all, until the pallid night
So long by gloomy clouds attended,
Becomes the broad, enduring light
Of day that never shall be ended.

Oh, then what bloom shall clothe her face!
What light entrance to from her eyes!
Of what "New Name" with Heavenly grace
Make known her sweet identity?

We cannot tell; we only know
God hath in store gifts strange and sweet;
More glorious far than tongue can show,
Or thought devise, or vision meet.

Then, ye that centuries have slept,
While ages long their ways have wended,
And soon's past have silent swept,
Awake, your sleep forever ended!

THE TRUTH CONCERNING RESURRECTION.—PART I.

"The dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

PRELIMINARY.

The doctrine of the resurrection is a cardinal one, and no one acquainted with the place it occupies in the Scriptures, and at the same time desiring to be loyal to Christ and the truth, will object to attention being now called to it. It is not our present intention to state in a systematic way all that is authoritatively revealed and written on the subject; we shall confine ourselves mainly to one phase of the subject, and endeavor to make plain what has hitherto been obscure to many, and to point out just where the late Dr. John Thomas went wrong, and where others since his day have gone wrong in an important particular.

As many of our readers are aware, Dr. Thomas propounded a view of resurrection which has all along been held to be unprovable from the translations of the New Testament; but seeing that he held that that view underlay the Greek words employed by the original writers, there has been a disposition on the part of many to accept the doctrine, and to rely upon the validity of the arguments by which he presented it. Dr. Thomas admitted by implication that the Authorised Version did not set forth the doctrine, but contended that the Greek was plain, and those who have confided in him in a general way have not particularly questioned the accuracy of his statements on this important subject. The special view to which we direct attention is to the effect that the saints who have fallen asleep, and those who are living at the time of Christ's appearing, will, while in a mortal state, be subjected to judgment, and upon the result of that judgment will depend their being accepted or rejected, their being made immortal or their being sentenced to the penalty of the second death. This view is called that of "the mortal emergence of the saints," as contrasted with another view known as that of "immortal emergence." Now we affirm at the outset that "mortal emergence" is a fiction, by which plain statement we mean that it is not a fact—not a fact of revelation. We say unhesitatingly that, if "mortal emergence" is the divine plan, then the statement of that plan in the New Testament is a great failure, for if one thing respecting the resurrection is made plainer than another, it is that, in the case of those who are to be "children of the resurrection," the form called man in a generic sense, is deposited in the ground mortal, but comes out of the ground immortal; though laid in the ground weak, because natural, it comes out of the ground at the call of him who is the Resurrection and the Life, powerful because spiritual: when put into the earth it is vile and dishonorable, using those terms in comparison with its destiny as having been the tabernacle of the spirit of holiness, but it emerges from it glorious, having been by Divine power conformed unto the body of Christ, who is the image of the Invisible God, and partaker of the nature of the Almighty. It was while engaged in an endeavor to support Dr. Thomas's view, which we had accepted so many others have done without critical and thorough examination, that we saw where he erred, and it was not long before we knew how he erred, and why he erred. These discoveries, we propose to briefly put before readers of the Truth. We do not undertake in one short paper to point out all Dr. Thomas's mistakes: nor do we promise to exhaustively set forth the Scriptural view of the subject. Let us but disabuse the minds of those who have judged from Anastasis that all translations of 1 Cor. xv. are sadly at fault, and we shall have done a good work. Let us but show that the inference drawn by the intelligent reader of the Revised Version is the inference that is also drawn by the instructed reader of the Greek text—and it need not be said that that inference is distinctly in favor of "immortal emergence" at the coming of Christ—and we shall be emphatically satisfied: for we make bold to say that it is impossible to make Dr. Thomas's view fit into any good translation of Paul's words, while to get his view from the original text requires such distortion and tinkering as no honest man knowing what he is about can perpetrate.

In opposition to the teaching of Anastasis and others of Dr. Thomas's later writings, we say that the New Testament teaches, immediately following upon the resurrection of the sleeping saints (not "sinners") to immortal life, the living saints (not "sinners") will be changed from a corruptible nature, and the whole will be caught up from the earth in clouds to meet the Lord as he is descending. The Scriptures are silent as to any such tribunal as Dr. Thomas wrote so much about, before which the "saints" (understood to include disobedient "saints," that is "sinners") of all ages must appear in mortal flesh to have it determined whether they are to be invested with immortality or not. There is much written in the Scriptures about judgment and judgments, but there is nothing said from which we can fairly conclude that God's children are to enter upon life after account given; although we are distinctly taught that their position in the Kingdom of God will be determined by a scrutiny of their works. One of Dr. Thomas's proofs for the statement that the saints will be judged was 1 Pet. iv. 17. See it quoted on pp. 32 and 34 of Anastasis. Has this anything to do with an arraignment of the saints before their Master? Is the teaching that the Head will judge the Members—the Justifier judge the Justified—taught here? Dr. Thomas slurred over the words "For the time is come." He overlooked the context too. This is the charitable view, anyhow. Peter was not writing of the saints having to undergo inquisition at the coming of Christ, but of their having to "suffer for Christ." No one of intelligence could mistake the meaning of the apostle. Yet to prove that "the judgment of the last day begins with the righteous," Dr. Thomas must cite this verse! See, Peter writes of the "fiery trial" that was "coming upon" those to whom he wrote, "to prove" them, so that they were to be "partakers of Christ's sufferings." He says, "If a man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God in this name. For the time is come for judgment to begin at the house of God: and if it begin first at us, what shall be the end of them that obey not the gospel of God?"—The saints are to suffer first, says Peter; by and by those who obey not the gospel will have to suffer. "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear?" The saints enter upon their reward through "great tribulation;" those who do not go through the tribulation, even the ungodly and the sinners, where will they be when "with flaming fire rendering punishment" the Lord shall appear for our salvation, and the vindication of his name? They will be destroyed from his glorious presence—will be as "the chaff which the wind driveth away." This passage in Peter's writings is not the only one Dr. Thomas misapplied to "prove" judgment of the saints.

SERIOUS MISTAKES MADE BY DR. THOMAS.

It would serve no purpose at present to point out all the glaring errors and inconsistencies in Anastasis, and serious misrepresentations in the pamphlet called Outwheels, wherein Dr. Thomas also deals with this subject. It is not within the scope of our present purpose to do more in this direction than to ask the reader to thoughtfully read those works and see how different meanings are given to different words according to the requirements of the argument, and how passages are cited to prove that which they were never written to support. The thoughtful reader, although ignorant of Greek, will not be slow to notice the weak points in the argument in Anastasis. No defensible translation of 1 Cor. xv. 42-44, 51-54, will do for Dr. Thomas. No honest translation of 1 Thess. iv. 17, will do for him. A correct translation of Rev. xx. 5, 6, will not do. Then again, to suit his view, 2 Cor. v. 10 must be misconstrued; and many other important passages must receive violent treatment. These are statements of truth and soberness. We make them deliberately and sorrowfully, for the enlightenment of readers of the Truth. We wish there was no reason for making such statements. If the reader asks: "May we then really follow the ordinary translations of the New Testament as to 1 Cor. xv." our reply is "Yes." The Revised Version is an excellent reflex of the original. Notwithstanding all Dr. Thomas wrote to the contrary, we do read of the body of the saint being, as a seed, sown in dishonor and raised in glory, sown a natural body and raised a spiritual body. In spite of all Dr. Thomas's references to Greek lexicons (to misunderstand or misuse them—and to prove) it is "raising" that is spoken of, and not "building up" as he puts it on one page, "rebuilding" as he puts it on another, or "causing to exist" as he puts it on another. Also, Paul actually did illustrate his subject by a reference to the "sowing" and "raising" of seed, notwithstanding all Dr. Thomas said about the word rendered "sow," which he gives as meaning "spring or be born." In a word, Dr. Thomas labored under serious misapprehensions, both as to the use of the verb εγειρω (egeiro) and as to the use of the verb σπειρω (speiro) in Paul's writings. He also mistook the use of the verb εκστασις (anistemi) and the substantive αναστασις (anastasis). It is not a matter of opinion that we are at present putting forward, but a matter of absolute fact. The verb εγειρω is not an architectural term, and does not mean "build" in 1 Cor. xv. The word σπειρω never means "spring" in the sense that word is used by Dr. Thomas. Our statement is undeniable. Now, these and other errors are the very foundation work of Dr. Thomas's view, and the passages he mistranslates are among the essential testimonies on the subject of resurrection.

PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION.

Now, no one will deny that the most explicit statements as to resurrection are made by Paul. It is true that in the Gospels we have mention of "the resurrection of the just," "the resurrection of life," and also of the "resurrection of judgment." These, however, are but discriminating references. Coming to Paul's writings we have more; we have explicit—that is unfolded—statements; we have new facts, or, to put it more exactly, additional facts. No one can deny that Paul has told us more than any one else of the detail of God's purpose as to the resurrection. And was it not fitting? Not until Christ had been raised from the dead, was it time to speak of "Christ the first fruits." Not until then, could we expect to read: "Then they that are Christ's, at his coming." And not until we have learned so much, are we ready to know that after then—after Christ's coming, and he shall have reigned and subjected all things—will come the completion of the resurrection work, when "the rest of the dead" will be raised, even after a thousand years, (Rev. xx. 5.) Not until Christ had been brought from the dead by the power of God, could we expect such passages as those wherein the Apostle who boasted that he had seen the Glorified Savior argued for the resurrection of the saints because of Christ having been raised, the "first-born from the dead," and pointed to the prospect of Christ's deathlessness being fellowshipped in due course by those who first fellowship his sufferings and death. Further, it will be readily admitted that it is in 1 Cor. xv. and 1 Thess. iv., that Paul unfolds the truth as to the resurrection to the greatest extent. Another important passage dealing with the theme in its relation to those who are to inherit the kingdom, is Rev. xx. Now we say that from these eminently explicit passages the truth must be got. It is not right or proper to go to less plain and less detailed statements to begin with. Get the sense of the fullest and most comprehensive passages, and all the allusions and references will fall into their proper places. We might by taking mere allusions arrive at all sorts of untenable conclusions; and thus, of course, in case of all false conclusions, many passages would have to be illtreated in order to be "harmonized." We are speaking considerately when we infer that Dr. Thomas's mistake in connection with this important doctrine arose from the fact that he formed his view on the basis of the allusions, and then did his best to make the explicit statements—those statements containing the greatest number of facts, and exhibiting the truth in its most fully developed form—fit and agree. Then, as was to be expected, he experienced difficulty, and to get out of the difficulty he had to resort to unjustifiable translations—or rather to mistranslations of a sadly misleading character—and, further, to adopt interpretations that will not bear a moment's examination. What enlightened man would, we ask, expect to arrive at the truth as to the Gospel of the Kingdom of God by wrenching from its context the statement "The Kingdom of God is within you?" Such an investigator would, inevitably, hold a false view of the Kingdom by the time he had forced all of the statements on the subject into "agreement." Again, what hope could anyone have of arriving at a proper view as to human nature by beginning with the words "Be not afraid of them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul?" By the time all passages had been "harmonized" with the notion growing out of this single allusion, Scripture truth would be quite beyond view. We must, to act reasonably, begin at the explicit and plain statements. Paul's writings on the subject of the resurrection of the saints and their gathering to Christ, are the most explicit in the Bible. Those writings contain veritable revelations. With them we must begin and not with any less explicit writings: and if we proceed properly we shall arrive at conclusions that will be supported by all the less detailed statements found in other parts of the Bible.

We have said that Paul adds to our knowledge on the subject. The grounds of this statement will at once occur to many readers. In the famous chapter in Corinthians, just before describing the resurrection to incorruptibility and the changing of the living to the same nature, he says: "Behold I tell you a mystery"—See, I communicate to you a secret! And certainly, however well acquainted we may be with all that precedes this very passage on this important subject, we have here a distinct revelation on points of absorbing interest. Then in the passage in Thessalonians, just before dealing with the same subject, the Apostle writes: "This we say unto you by the word of the Lord." And all the time Paul was acting on the desire expressed thus: "We would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning them that fell asleep." These passages have undoubtedly a supreme value. Let those who have begun at parables which they have misunderstood come to the "visions and revelations of the Lord," which are within our reach in the writings of Paul.—Jas. W. Thirtle, in Truth.

THE MEANING OF SHEOL IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.

In the Revised Version of Gen. xxxvii. 35, the words of Jacob to his sons and his daughters, after Joseph's coat dipped in blood had been shown to him, are rendered, "I will go down to the grave to my son mourning," Sheola being translated to the grave. The Common Version reads, "I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning."—the only change made by the Revisers consisting in a substitution of to for into and unto. But they have inserted in the margin the following explanation of the grave: "Heb. Sheol, the name of the abode of the dead, answering to the Greek Hades, Acts ii. 27." This explanation is correct and sufficient; but the necessity of making it, and of referring to it in subsequent passages, shows that the translation was not entirely wholly satisfactory.

It is not, therefore, surprising that the same word has received other translations, after the manner of the Common Version. For instance, in the account of the overthrow of Korah, Dathan and Abiram (See Num. xvi. 30, 33) it is translated the pit, probably because this expression was supposed to agree with the form which was given to the judgment of God, viz., "The earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up....and so they... went down alive into the pit." But while retaining this translation, the Revisers have admitted the need of some explanation by inserting Sheol in the margin, yet without referring, as they should have done, to the passage in Genesis where this Hebrew word is explained by them as "the name of the abode of the dead." For how can the word Sheol shed light on the English expression, unless its meaning is known to the reader? And if it could be assumed that the English reader would know the meaning of Sheol, why should not that word have been put in the text, instead of the margin? Without a reference to Gen. xxxvii. 35, the marginal Sheol is practically useless to an English reader.

Indeed, we find such a reference to Isa. v. 14, where the word is translated hell; for the margin accompanies this third rendering by the following note: "Or, the grave, Heb. Sheol. See Gen. xxxvii. 35." With this note the reader, provided he consults the margin, and then examines the explanation in Genesis to which he is referred, will obtain a tolerably correct view of the meaning.

Briefly, then, the treatment of Sheol in the Revised Version is as follows: It is translated the grave, fifteen times (Gen. xxxvii. 35; xlii. 38; xliv. 27, 35; 1 Sam. ii. 6; 1 Kings ii. 6, 9; Psa. lxxxviii. 3; Prov. xxx. 16; Eccl. ix. 10; Cant. viii. 6; Isa. xxxviii. 10, 18, Hos. xiii. 14); the pit, three times (Num. xvi. 30, 33; Deut. xxxii. 22; Psa. lv. 15; lxxxvi. 13); and hell, fifteen times (Isa. v. 14; xiv. 9, 11, 15; xxviii. 15, 18; lvii. 9; Ezek xxxi. 15, 16, 17; xxxii. 21, 27; Amos ix. 2; Jonah ii. 2; Hab. ii. 5). It is also Anglicised as Sheol in twenty-nine places (2 Sam. xxii. 6; Job. vii. 9; xi. 8; xiv. 13; xvii. 13, 16; xxi. 13; xxiv. 19; xxvi. 6; Psa. vi. 6; ix. 18; xvi. 10; xviii. 6; xxx. 4; xxxi. 18; xlix. 15, 16; lxxxix. 49; cxvi. 3; cxxxix. 8; Prov. i. 12; v. 5; vii. 27; ix. 18; xv. 11, 24; xxiii. 14; xxvii. 20). Thus it is translated in thirty-five places, and Anglicised in twenty-nine. And it is noticeable that all the passages in which it is Anglicised (including 2 Sam. xxii. 6—Psa. xviii. 5) are poetic. It is also noticeable that all the passages in which it is translated hell are in prophetic books (Isaiah, Ezekiel, Amos, Jonah, Habakkuk).

But is there any sufficient reason for this varied treatment of the word? We could answer this question in the affirmative, if there were evidence, 1. that in the Hebrew language Sheol had more than one meaning—e. g., a primitive meaning and a derivative, or 2. that in the progress of religious knowledge among the Jews it exchanged one signification for another, or 3. that it always had an indefinite, shadowy meaning, dependent on the context. Upon examination, however, we do not discover in the Old Testament use of the word evidence that it always had more than one signification, or that its later signification was different from its earlier. But there are indications that Sheol was used to denote a dim, obscure, unexplored region or state, and this circumstance seems to render the meaning of the word itself indefinite. Yet not in the sense of its being variable; the reality named was vague, obscure, but the name always meant that reality. This at least is the result of our present study of the passages cited above.

Why, then, have the Revisers retained three different renderings of the word, viz., the grave, the pit, and hell, while they have often treated the Hebrew noun as a proper name? Possibly because the word is used in certain passages (e. g., in connection with the death of good men) where it cannot fairly be supposed to suggest any evil beyond that of being dead. In these it is translated the grave, as implying a state of death and referring to the abode of the dead. Again, because it is used in a few passages where the idea of physical descent, or of great depth, is involved in death or the manner of death. In these it is translated the pit—a rendering which probably agrees with the radical meaning of the Hebrew word, as well as with the physical sense of the English term hell. And, lastly, it is frequently used in speaking of the condition or abode of bad men after death, and it is generally translated by the Revisers hell. But apart from the teaching of the New Testament, these passages cannot be said to point with any clearness to spiritual suffering. Sheol is represented in some of them as vast, cavernous, unfilled. In it the dead are spoken of as asleep, or inert, or as deprived of the honor and power which they had in life (Isa. xiv. 9, 11, 15; Ezek. xxxi. 14-18; Amos ix. 2; Jonah ii. 2; Hab. ii. 5.) We are unable to discover any valid reason for rendering the word hell, rather than pit, in these passages, or indeed any reason for translating it at all, which would not require its translation in any of the places where it is treated as a proper name.

The statement in the Preface to the Revised Version is as follows: "The Revisers, therefore, in the historical annotations have left the rendering 'the grave' or 'the pit' in the text, with a marginal note 'Heb. Sheol' to indicate that it does not signify 'the place of burial' while in the poetical writings they have put most commonly 'Sheol' in the text and 'the grave' in the margin. In Isa. xiv., however, where 'hell' is used in more of its original sense, and is less liable to be misunderstood, and where any change is so familiar a passage which was not distinctly an improvement would be a decided loss, the Revisers have contented themselves with leaving 'hell' in the text, and have connected it with other passages by putting 'Sheol' in the margin" (p. viii.) The reasons here assigned for leaving the translation 'hell' in the text do not seem to us very cogent, and the neglect to allude in any way to the twelve other places in which the same translation is retained is remarkable. Probably, however, it was thought that the explanation of their course with Isaiah xiv., would be considered, without remark, as applicable to the other cases. But it would have been better to have represented the Hebrew word everywhere by Sheol or by Hades, its Greek equivalent. And [illegible] there would have been some gain to the ordinary reader, if the single name Hades had been always used.

Notwithstanding the criticism which we have ventured to make on the treatment of Sheol in the Revised Version, we desire to say that, as far as we have been able to examine that Version, it is a great improvement on the one in common use. Though more changes, wisely made, would have been welcome to many scholars, it was certainly better to err on the side of caution than on the side of rashness. And in spite of all the just or unjust criticism upon it, the Revision is a work of high and reverent scholarship, contributing everywhere to a more correct view of the original text than could be obtained from the Common Version.—Noah Hovey, D. D., in Old Testament Student.

Our Earthly House or Tabernacle, and the House which is Eternal and in the Heavens. 2 Cor. v. 1-6.

In this text two houses are brought to view—the nature of both being defined, the one is earthly, and subject to dissolution. The other is eternal, hence not subject to dissolution. When we ask the question, What does Paul mean by the term, our earthly house? multitudes are ready to answer, The body. Man's earthly body! Then, in all conscience, what does he mean by the terms,—Building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, if not body—man's immortal body? But another question arises as follows: What heavens is this eternal house in? for in Gen. i. and ii., we have an account of creation. In ch. ii. 1, we have this statement—"Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them." But Peter tells us that the heavens which are now, are kept in store reserved unto fire. 2 Peter iii. 7. In verse 10 he tells us that the heavens shall pass away. If the heavens which are now, are doomed to pass away, and the eternal house is in them, what becomes of the house? But the Lord assures us that he will create new heavens and a new earth. Isa. lxv. 19. In ch. lxvi. 22, the assurance is given that the new heavens and the new earth (which I will make in the word) shall remain. Then we must look to the new heavens to find the eternal house—for the house as to nature and durability is eternal. The new heavens as to the order of succession take the place of the old or present heavens, for they pass away. But as the old heavens have, as yet, not passed away, then the new heavens, as yet, have not been created, and the eternal house, as yet, can not be in them. Now suppose that Paul and his brethren die before the old heavens pass away, and the new are ushered in, where would they go to? But some one may still claim and say—We have this eternal house. But Paul speaks of still being in the earthly house or tabernacle. We that are in this tabernacle do groan being burdened. If in the earthly house, they could not be in the eternal house—but they could be in the earthly house and have the sure promise of the eternal house, hence could say, we know if the earthly house be dissolved, we have a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. We who are in this earthly tabernacle do groan being burdened. But what is this burden that oppresses us, causing us to groan? Some one may say that it is because of affliction, disease, pains, etc., that we groan. But Paul expresses it in one word: "Mortality," that mortality may be absorbed of life. The burden which oppresses us, causing us to groan, is mortality, the relief which we desire, is life. It is the same "we" that is oppressed with mortality that desires life.

The desire is not to be unclothed, but to be clothed upon. The result of being clothed upon with our house, which is from heaven, is this: Mortality is swallowed up of life. It follows then that the eternal house is the clothing. Clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, is the desire expressed, the result being life, and as the house, the clothing desired, is eternal, and the result is life, it follows that the life is eternal, and as the house is the clothing, it follows that the house is the first case is the clothing; it being, as to nature, earthly and subject to dissolution, whilst in the second case it is, as to nature, eternal.

But let us consider Paul and his brethren, as they stand related to the new heavens, and the new earth, which the Lord has promised to create. John, as a prophet, looking ahead tells us that he saw a new heaven and a new earth, and that the first heaven and the first earth were passed away. Rev. xxi. 1. In this new creation he beheld a great white throne, and one seated upon this throne who says, "Behold I make all things new." See ch. xx. 11, and xxi. 5. Man being one of the all things of the first creation—the old heavens and earth, if all things are made new, it follows that man will be made new. Then this new creation, as it relates to man, so far as Paul and his brethren are concerned, may have been begun when he wrote. Now hear him. If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature—a new creature is a new creation. Again he uses those terms, created anew in Christ Jesus unto good works, then to what extent had this new creation affected them? answer, they had been renewed in the spirit of their mind, the mind—the inward man—was renewed. Day by day it was being renewed—made new, day by day, or daily—every day, but the outward man was in a perishing state. The new creation in their case had not as yet affected the body. Thus we see that the new creation, as it relates to man, begins in and with the mind, and in their case it had begun and was being consummated daily. To renew is to make new, and the work of renewing the mind, in their case, was begun and was being completed daily. But when will the new creation in their case affect the body, the outward man? Let him answer, We shall all be changed. But what is the nature of this change? answer, this mortal shall put on immortality. As this change takes place at the last trumpet, it follows that the new creation, as it relates to Paul and his brethren, is finished. Thus we see that in God's orders, as it relates to man, we find no place for that supposed thing called an immortal soul or spirit, we find no place for it in the first heavens and the first earth, nor will we find a place for it in the new heavens and the new earth, when we consider them in the divine order of creation.

In two more articles we will consider the new creation as it relates to the heavens and the earth, If this article is deemed worthy of a place in THE RESTITUTION. J. O. KIMBRY.

HAMILTON, Ont.

Editor Restitution:

We in Hamilton are still holding fast to that faith and hope that was once delivered to the saints. My husband is still a helpless invalid, and have not much chance of attending any meetings. The brethren do some times come and hold meeting with us as we cannot go out. For two long years he has not been able to leave the house, we truly find our Master's words true, that because he had chosen us out of the world, the world hates us, and he bids us be of good cheer for he had overcome the world, our trust is not in the world nor the things of the world. But in God, in the living God, who will make all things work together for good to them that love him, although the cup is bitter we try to take it from our Master's hand and say thy will, O God, be done.

Trusting and hoping that these troubles will soon end, and that we shall soon see the Lord's return to take to himself his Kingdom, when we shall be where sorrow nor sighing can never come is the sincere prayer of your humble sister in Christ.

A WORKER'S PRAYER.

"For I have received of the Lord that which also I delivered unto you."—1 Cor. xi. xxiii.

Lord, speak to me, that I may speak
In living echoes of the tone
Which Thou hast sought, so let me seek
Thy erring children, lost and lone.

O lead me, Lord, that I may lead
The wan'derers, and the weary feet,
Of such as stray, Lord, that I may feed
The hungering ones with manna sweet.

O strengthen me, that while I stand
Firm on the Rock, and strong in Thee,
I may stretch out a loving hand
To wrestlers in the troubled sea.

O teach me, Lord, that I may teach
The precious things Thou dost impart;
And wing my words, that they may reach
The hidden depths of many a heart.

O give Thine own sweet rest to me,
That I may speak with soothing power
A word in season, as from Thee,
To weary ones in needful hour.

O fill me with thy fullness, Lord,
Until my very heart o'erflow
In kindling thought and glowing word,
Thy love to tell, Thy praise to show.

O use me, Lord, use even me,
Just as Thou will, and when, and where;
Until Thy blessed face I see,
Thy rest, Thy joy, Thy glory share.

HUMAN DESTINY.

The following, from the September number of Words of Reconciliation, edited and published by L. C. Baker, is important as showing the reaction that is taking place in thoughtful and intelligent minds against that horrible and God-dishonoring dogma—the eternal torture of unnumbered beings whom he, as Creator, has brought into existence. The leading denominations of this nineteenth century will be compelled to re-investigate the important themes of Ontology, Soteriology, and Eschatology, and to conform their creeds and oral instructions more closely to the teachings of Holy Writ regardless of human formularies of faith.

The Presbyterian Confession.

In the May number of this magazine there was published a proposed overture to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, moved by the Editor in the Presbytery of West Jersey, of which he is a member, looking toward a revision of the Eschatology of the Westminster standards. As the matter will soon be considered by the Presbytery, we offer some remarks upon it in this issue of Words of Reconciliation.

The paper submitted was as follows:

"In view of the unformed and varying opinions prevalent in the Church concerning great questions in Eschatology, and in view also of the immense importance which attaches to the testimony of the Church upon matters of such vital interest, in its bearing upon both the good conscience of her ministers and the faith of their hearers, this Presbytery would respectfully petition the General Assembly to appoint a suitable committee, whose duty it shall be,

"1. To consider whether the doctrine of our Confession concerning the final results of God's dealings with mankind, as set forth in Chapter xxxiii. Questions 29, 33, Larger Catechism, and elsewhere, is a complete and final expression of the teaching of holy Scripture upon this subject.

"2. To propose any alterations or explanations in the statements of our Standards upon this subject which may seem to them advisable, and to report any such proposed changes to the succeeding General Assembly for its suitable action in the premises."

The principal statements from the Standards to which reference is made are the following:

Chap. xxxiii. Sec. 2. "The end of God's appointing this day is for the manifestation of the glory of His mercy in the salvation of the elect; and of his justice in the damnation of the reprobate, who are wicked and disobedient. For then shall the righteous go into everlasting life and receive that fullness of joy and refreshing which shall come from the presence of the Lord; but the wicked, who know not God, and obey not the Gospel of Jesus Christ, shall be cast into eternal torments, and be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power."

Question 29. Larger Catechism. Answer. "The punishments of sin in the world to come, are everlasting separation from the comfortable presence of God, and most grievous torments in soul and body, without intermission in hell-fire forever."

Question 33. Answer. "At the day of judgment, the wicked shall be set on Christ's left hand, and upon clear evidence, and full conviction of their own consciences, shall have the fearful but just sentence of condemnation pronounced against them; and thereupon shall be cast out from the favorable presence of God, and the glorious fellowship with Christ, his saints and all his holy angels, into hell, to be punished with unspeakable torments both of the body and soul, with the devil and his angels forever."

The doctrine of the church is thus defined to be that the wicked,

1. Shall be punished with most grievous and unspeakable torments in soul and body, without intermission in hell-fire forever.

2. This punishment shall be inflicted by the Sovereign Judge as a penalty for the sins of this life. It is assumed, of course, that the wicked will go on sinning forever, but these statements do not touch primarily that eternal punishment will be on account of eternal sin. The sentence to this condemnation is for the sins of this life. The teachings of the Confession also imply that all the heathen, children who have passed the period of moral accountability, and non-elect infants, dying in infancy, although beaten with fewer stripes, will incur this same condemnation.

These two features of the Westminster doctrine are sufficient of themselves to justify the language used in the preamble to the above overture. No one acquainted with the present state of opinion in the Presbyterian Church, or who sits under the preaching from its pulpits, will venture to deny that it no longer stands by those formulas. And in the drift away from them one finds all forms of varying opinions. In the first place there is a general acceptance of the doctrine of Universal Infant Salvation. This of itself, as Dr. Prentiss affirms in the leading Review of the Church, is "essentially a revolution in theological opinion." And he advises us, "when pressed by the awful problems of human sinfulness and eternal punishment, to turn to the 'Gospel of the little children,' if perhaps our Theology may be brought into fuller harmony with the truth as it is in Jesus and gain something in light and sweetness. It might learn, here as nowhere else, that the grace of God is not tied to even his own appointed means, still less to any more human schemes and formulas, and there is a wide realm of his providential system, both in Time and in Eternity, of which it has pleased him to give us almost no account; but which yet we know to be filled with special wonders of his creative and redeeming love." Here is a plain breaking loose from the trammels of the confession, and a suppressed outcry from a Professor in one of the leading Theological schools of the church for just such action as our proposed overture contemplates. Dr. Prentiss, if consistent, must from the heart desire its success. Dr. Philip Schaff, in the same Review, (Oct. 1883, pg 738), has recently told us that "sermons like that of Jonathan Edwards upon 'Sinners in the hands of an angry God' could not be preached nowadays without emptying our churches." Can any one doubt that Edwards was more fully in harmony with the above statements from the Confession than are our modern preachers?

It is almost a waste of time to attempt to prove, what everybody knows, that the Presbyterian church has practically abandoned the above formulas as a complete and final expression of her faith upon these momentous themes. What candidate for one of her prominent pulpits would dare to proclaim his fealty to them in his trial sermon? Nor will any one who has had the writer's opportunity of acquaintance with her ministry and membership doubt that "unformed and varying opinions" prevail among them. We find even such a man as Dr. Schaff saying, in a sermon published in the Pulpit Treasury (Oct. 1883), "Life is a glorious mystery with a heaven beyond, but a terrible mystery with annihilation or endless punishment in prospect." This distinguished teacher, then, cannot be sure but that annihilation is the final solution of this mystery, rather than endless punishment. We know, from personal conversation and from correspondence, that some of our foremost ministers have sought a refuge from the terrible dogma of endless torment in this view of the final destruction of the ungodly. Others, in high position in the church, have expressed to us sympathy with the idea of continued probation. We recall the case of one who spoke to us in piteous tones of the hinderance to his own spiritual life and to the fulfilment of his high ideal of the ministry, in that he felt, while speaking from God to men, that he had no right to give utterance to the highest and best thoughts which came to him upon this subject. The church would be surprised to know who among those high in her confidence have expressed to us, since we began writing upon the subject, the conviction that our church is very much adrift upon it, and that without doubt she ought to allow a larger liberty for its re-discussion.

We have no doubt that the action proposed above is proper and timely. It expresses the open or secret convictions of a large percentage of our best ministers and of our membership. As for the membership, very many of them have gone to dangerous extremes in the other direction. The idea of God's righteous retributions for sin, and that he is a consuming fire, even to his own people, has faded out too much from their minds. And the inevitable reaction from the severity of the old doctrine of endless torment, has driven many gospel hearers into deplorable carelessness and indifference to the wrath to come. But all this gives additional emphasis to the above statements, that opinion in our congregations upon these matters is adrift, and that, inasmuch as the church has ceased to proclaim future punishment in the terms of her confession, the times are ripe for, and imperatively demand of her, such re-statements of the doctrine as she can fearlessly proclaim, and, in the use of which she can commend herself to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

If there is any region of testimony in which the church is bound to be honest before God and man, it is here. It deteriorates the conscience and injures the spiritual life of her ministers to bind them by a subscription to formulas which no longer express her own complete convictions, and which they cannot fearlessly preach and defend. These are matters about which her ministers dare not be silent, and yet how often, instead of giving an open testimony, do we find them compelled to explain and apologize, or seeking to mitigate the impression made by these statements through one-sided and excessive presentations of the love of God to sinners. And what must be the impression made by a great church organization upon the world, in clinging to expressions in her standards upon those themes of awful import, toward which she must assume a hesitating and apologetic tone, which she fears to proclaim from the housetop! Some one might reply that these objectionable formulas are also literally transcribed from the Scriptures. But the question raised by the overture is, whether they gather up and set forth the complete Scripture doctrine upon this subject, whether there are not other aspects of it not brought to view, and whether the words of Scripture, in their connection, were designed to teach precisely what the standards affirm.

Nor will the objection hold that this matter is left so obscure and undefined in Scripture, that it is useless to look for light where so much is left in darkness, and that no formulas, equally faithful to Scripture, could probably be agreed upon as substitutes for those we now have. If our Confession were content to leave this matter without certain definition, and to point us merely to the words of Scripture, leaving us free to determine their meaning for ourselves, there would be indeed no cause for action. But it does not confine itself to Scripture words. It arranges them in new combinations. It puts upon them its own severe and rigid interpretation. It speaks with certainty where there is room for conscientious difference of opinion. It announces its doctrine as if it had comprehended and gauged the whole of Scripture that bears upon it. The plea, therefore, that no attempt to re-state these doctrines should be made because of their obscurity, cannot hold in face of the fact that they are now rigidly defined.

The facts and principles, then, justifying the proposed action are, 1. The unsettled state of opinion in the church.

2. Her virtual abandonment of these old formulas as no longer suited to her present conceptions of the truth.

3. They put a yoke upon her ministers and members which many of the most thoughtful and conscientious are not able to bear.

4. The church's duty upon matters of such tremendous moment to speak in no uncertain tones.

5. The dangerous reaction, within her pale, and among worldly men, toward indifference and blindness to the eternal principles of righteousness, and a careless ease about the judgment which must first begin at the house of God, and which must hold to a fearful reckoning them that obey not the gospel.

6. Still more important is the consideration that right views concerning human destiny are essential to right views of God. All religion is based upon the knowledge of God, to know Whom is eternal life. Men become like the God they love and worship. A defect here is therefore fundamental. The highest mission of the church is to represent God to men, to speak his truth concerning his character and ways. No other question is more vitally connected with the truth concerning him than this.

In regard to our own connection with the matter, some words of explanation are called for. The Presbyterian, in its issue of Aug. 1st, asserts that in this action, we are seeking to urge upon the church the adoption of our own views of the redemptive character of Resurrection, and to make a place in its creed for this "peculiar tenet." Its language is, "Furthermore he has added to his frequent republication of his peculiar tenet, a proposal that it shall be submitted to the investigation of the church, and if approved, enter into the body of truth which the church sets forth as its 'Confession of Faith.' He has already moved in his Presbytery that steps shall be taken to add to the Westminster Confession, as part of the creed of the church, what he thinks has been already asserted by his studies in Eschatology." We have no disposition to conceal our opinion that much light would come to the church upon this dark subject through the recognition of the above principle. We believe that in the doctrine of the Resurrection lies somewhere the key to this mystery. But we ask any candid man to judge whether there is anything in the above paper which justifies the Presbyterian's assertion. There is not the slightest allusion to our own "peculiar tenet," or to that of anybody else. The paper is expressly drawn so as to preclude any such personal opinions. It makes no attempt to decide between the various theories of human destiny now being discussed. It prejudges nothing, and commits the church to nothing but,

1. The confession that her present formulas are inadequately and unsatisfactory, and

2. To a careful investigation of the whole subject on the part of those whom she can best trust to make it. It does not even require the proposed committee to make any changes, only to inquire whether any should be made, and to submit them, if the case demands such, to the judgment of the church. We do not see how the proposition could have been made in any less personal or objectionable form.

It is of course to be expected that many who acknowledge the force of the above considerations, will deplore and resist the proposed action on the ground of expediency. We are well aware that no such questions can be started in such a body, and no such apertures be made in its long-approved doctrinal system, without disturbance. But the questions are not of our raising. They are already here. The invasions upon the creed are not now begun. They already exist. The fact is that, under the larger illuminations of the present, these divergencies have arisen? Are they inspired from above or beneath? The church is bound to consider and decide. And, in our judgment, motives of expediency should not weigh for an instant against the vast interests of the truth involved, and the solemn obligations of the church to her ministry and membership, and to all men to hold forth the word of life upon such a subject with all gravity and sincerity, with sound speech that cannot be condemned, commending herself to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

For ourselves, we have gone forward in the matter because some one must take the responsibility and incur the risk. As a minister of that church we have need of relief in this matter. And large numbers of our brethren share in this need. It is for their sake, as well as ours, that the step was taken. And we love this church. We desire to see her saved from a false position. We fear that if she quenches the liberty of investigation here, she will thereby quench the Spirit. Sure we are that she cannot fulfill her high mission to the world, and before God and man, if she refuses free inquiry into these important matters, while at the same time she insists upon holding on to doctrinal statements concerning them which her own pulpits almost uniformly suppress. We ask our brethren seriously to consider what must be the effect upon their own spiritual life, their intellectual honesty, what the impression made upon the world by such refusal. For our own part, we have yielded to what we believe to be a solemn obligation, as a minister of this church and of Christ, in making this endeavor to free our own conscience and to relieve the church.

That we have a constitutional right to make this effort no one will deny. The Confession does not claim to be the ultimate standard of truth. It affirms and reaffirms that the Holy Scriptures are the only standard. The church does not claim for it infallibility, for she has made a distinct provision for alterations or amendments. And if she is ever to arrive at any more satisfactory statements concerning these mysteries, it can only be through just such action as we have initiated. We have believed that the times are now ripe for the movement, that the best interests of our church and of the whole church imperatively demand it. And the matter has been as laid upon us by him whom we seek to serve that we could not evade the responsibility. We leave the results with him.

How Drunkards are Made.

At a meeting in Philadelphia, during the week of prayer, one of the speakers related this incident.

A lad was approached by one of those dispensers of that which deprives men of their property and destroys both body and soul, who solicited him to come into his place of destruction and take a glass of lemonade. The boy hesitated, but on being assured that he would get nothing but a glass of nice, sweet lemonade, he was induced to go in. Sure enough, he was offered and partook of what had been promised him, and nothing more. This was repeated several times, till at length, the trap having been set, it was now time to spring it. Accordingly, the rumseller began his work by dropping in the glass of lemonade one drop of strong liquor, increasing it so as thus imperceptibly to form in the lad a taste for it. As the boy never paid for his drinks one of the old customers of the place asked the landlord why he so favored the boy. He replied by pointing and saying, "Do you see that fine mansion upon the hill yonder? That belongs to the boy's father, and will probably soon belong to him, and then in turn it may belong to me."

Fiendish! Horrible! A long-headed, deep-laid scheme to ruin a family and rob them of their property; for certainly such a scheme; if successful could be looked upon as nothing less than downright robbery, and as much a penitentiary offence as any other kind of robbery. And if there is any one place of greater punishment in the devil's kingdom than another, is not such an one entitled to share it?

But are not all rumsellers alike in this respect? They do not care who is hurt, who comes to grief, who suffers the pangs of hunger and cold; who goes to a home of sorrow and wretchedness, whose children cry for bread or whose wife is abused, or beaten, or murdered, so they but fill their own coffers and live on the fat of the land through their ill-gotten gain.—Messiah's Herald.

SALVATION.

There is the great salvation. Being made equal to the angels of God, a class who neither marry or are given in marriage, a company that will never increase or decrease; they cannot die any more.

The church of the first born, the church that is to rule the world, not populate it, as some teach. There is a common salvation. We may call Noah, his family, and the animal creation, saved from drowning, but subject to death, and even to apostacy. One of the number was cursed after being saved. Their probation was continued under a new covenant and a new order of things, the Rainbow pledge. The Hebrews saved out of Egypt perhaps may be put in this class. A probation in bondage and ignorance after being saved, and put under the discipline of the supernatural subject to fail and perish under this new probation. There is a class saved as by fire, their works perish.

Another class committed to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. Will some be saved merely as spirits? Then the righteous who are scarcely saved, lost and his family an example. Then the class who add to their faith virtue, knowledge, etc., who will have an open (visible), an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

We may add perhaps that great class who are left behind to go through the (not a) great tribulation, washing their robes in the blood of the Lamb, being purified and perfected through suffering. Pray always that ye be counted worthy to escape all these things and stand before the Son of Man. CHAS. BOARDMAN.

Editor Restitution:

The Millerton conference is over. It commenced Friday evening, September 26. I am home again, it was only a flying trip for me, as I left home Friday morning, landed at Millerton Friday evening. Met quite a number of Brethren at the depot, whom I landed 2 miles from the place of conference. Amongst them was Bro. Barnhill, C. C. Ramsay, Chaplin, Ogilvy, on Bro. Barnhill's wagon, we went to the place of meeting.

Here we found a very good audience amongst them old Sister Moses and Bro. and Sister Moses better known by the name of Elizabeth Tinky. Well as to the good times we had I will leave that for Bro. Miller to give in his report of the meeting. But to say the least of our meeting it was a good one, the most of the Brethren and Sisters enjoyed themselves, and we had quite a soldier's reunion. Bro. T. K. Adams and Bro. and Sister Winters and Doctor Wilkins were all there, whom I have not seen for 7 or 8 years. Had a refreshing time, a meeting long to be remembered.

On Sunday we assisted 2 worthy ones to put on Christ by baptism. Sister Tinky's husband, Moses, was one of the two, and Bro. Hayworth, son of our old worthy Joel Hayworth, that has fallen asleep in Jesus. Sunday evening came and we still had a good time. Meeting closed with a song "shall we meet with Christ our Savior when he comes to claim his own." After meeting Doctor Wilkins and I went to Bro. John Fisk's at Millerton, and stayed all night. We took a refreshing night's rest. Monday morning Nahum's chariot came and on board of the train with Bro. Adams, Moyer, Wilkins and Anderson we went. At 6:45 we landed at Galesburgh 3 miles west of our home. Here I took walkers line, and soon arrived at my own home, with my companion and my youngest daughter Ida. Found all well. Shall we have another such a meeting in Mortality, or will our next one be in the Kingdom of God. Let that be as it will, let us so live that whether we live long or die soon, we may all meet in the Kingdom of God's dear Son, is my prayer for Christ's sake. Amen.

I will be at Millerton, if the Lord wills, on Saturday evening, before the fourth Sunday in November. Our meeting in November will be held in the school house in the town of Millerton. Any one coming will stop off at Millerton call on Hugh Barnhill, John Fisk, or Arthur Chaplin. Quite a number will take care of you there.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. In connection with this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; to be all effected only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

"Whom Having not Seen Ye Love." A Meditation.

"Whom having not seen ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."—1 Peter 1. 8.

A remarkable experience—loving one they had never seen! Those around whom our affections are entwined have commonly been our companions or friends, whose faces and voices are familiar to our eyes and ears, whose joys and sorrows we have shared. But to love one whose face we never saw—how seldom is the experience ours! There are, indeed, men and women whom we esteem, admire, venerate, for their works' sake; for their noble, generous, self-sacrificing deeds; or the pleasure, instruction, and moral sympathy we have received from their writings. But it is of loving an unseen one the apostle speaks. "Whom having not seen ye love." We all know better than we can describe, the quiet, tender, warm sensation—"love!" Even so did those whom the apostle addressed feel towards our Lord Jesus Christ. How the thought must have gladdened Peter's heart, he had seen the Lord; had seen him while the multitude hung on his lips and wondered at his gracious words; seen and beheld his majesty on the holy mount, seen him in the garden of Gethsemane, in Pilate's Judgment Hall, many times after his resurrection from the dead, and beheld him ascending in a cloud to the right hand of the Father. Peter loved the Lord. Once in response to the Lord's inquiry, he, out of a full and contrite heart, confessed: "Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love thee!" How, then, must it have gladdened the heart of Peter that his "dear and only Master" was beloved by those who had never seen his gracious face. The more so that he knew that their love was not a mere transitory sensation, ready to evaporate like the morning cloud, but a firm, deeply rooted love, which had lived in the midst of "manifold trials;" fierce persecutions, in which it was put to the proof, as gold in the refiner's furnace.

Whence this love of theirs for him whom they had never seen? Its sole origin was the belief of his love for them. "In whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice." If anyone had questioned them as to the cause of their loving Jesus, their answer would had been: "We love him because he first loved us." "Hereby perceive we his love, because he laid down his life for us." "Our sins are forgiven for his name's sake." It was his manifested love for them, in that "while they were yet sinners Christ died for them"—this love of his for them—believed in heartily and gratefully—that had enkindled that love of him in their hearts, as why should it not?

The apostle recounts not love only, but also joy, in the unseen Savior as the result of their "believing." "In whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice." Their love for him was a gladsome love. They rejoiced in him. Joy as well as love filled their hearts towards him, and he was not only the object of their love; he was its source as well. "In whom ye rejoice." Not in their own excellencies; not in their love, or faith, or service for him did they rejoice, but in Him. Or if we take the rendering of the Revised Version—"On whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice"—the case is substantially the same, for there he is regarded as the cause of their rejoicing, or the ground on which their joy rested.

This joy of theirs was of the intensest—most exultant character. "Ye rejoice with joy unspeakable." Not that it was silent—that it made no manifestation of itself in the way joy generally does. No, no. It was the quality, the intensity of it to which Peter referred in saying that it was "unspeakable." Human speech was inadequate to tell how great was that joy with which they rejoiced.

More than that: it was "full of glory." A joy beyond expressing; bright and radiant with hope of never-ending joys to come. Love had budded and brought forth gladness—joy exultant, warm, bright, and glorious as a summer day—a joy which only those who loved and trusted as they could feel.

But why so glad? His love for them in delivering them from destruction, by "bearing their sins in his own body on the tree," brought forth love. The salvation he had brought them was not limited, however, by the inestimable blessings of sin forgiven, and peace with God: through faith in his name they had been, when "children of wrath," adopted into the family of God, and made fellow-heirs with him of his own inheritance which the Father had given him. "According to the abundant mercy of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," they had been "begotten again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, unto an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for them, ready to be revealed in the last time;" when he shall appear in his glory, and they shall be glorified together with him, and be ever with him. They looked forward with sure hope to "seeing him as he is," and being "like him." These blessed hopes brought forth joy inexpressible and full of glory. And no wonder!

How is it with these? Could such a testimony be borne of these? Quietly think—how is it? Professing the same faith and hope as those early Christians, art thou conscious of loving him, and rejoicing so exultingly in him? Or, is thy love like a feeble flickering flame, ready to be extinguished by the noxious vapors of "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the vain glory of life?" Then, turn in hither, and rest a while. Meditate a little on his love for thee. Revert once more to the foot of the cross, and gaze on the scorn, shame, and suffering which he so patiently endured. Gaze till rivers of contrition run from thine eyes; and the warm fire of love kindles anew in thy bosom; and the bright visions of the eternal ages once more appear; and the soul exults in hope of conscious, eternal being, amid the perfection of all that is pure and good in the very presence of God and his Christ.

"He came with healing in His wings,
He washed us in His blood,
He made us priests; He made us kings,
He made us sons of God;
Let all creation join the song,
With hallelujahs loud and long."

—W. Luther in Messenger.

THE RISEN CHRIST.

I was asked by a friend just before I came here, what Life of Christ I would recommend as a help to Sabbath-school teachers, and I could not think of one, because, of the hundreds of lives that have been published, all fall short. They stop at the Ascension, and what they make the end is only the beginning of the wondrous life.

Have you ever noticed what Luke says in the 1st of Acts concerning the Life of Jesus, of the things he began to do and to teach. The Acts of the Apostles is but a continuation of that glorious life. The Epistles show us another phase of it, and so, on to the Apocalypse, which might be called the second Gospel according to John. All represent the life of one ascended Lord, till he comes in person.

In Matthew v., we have the seven beatitudes, the life before the Church; and in Revelation we have the precious blesseds, the seven beatitudes, pertaining to the life that is to come. Then we have the seven Epistles, some of them doubled, but written to the Church in seven localities, and the seven messages to the Church in Revelation.

In the 1st Gospel of John we read, that all that hear the voice of the Son of God shall live; and in the 3rd Gospel, "Blessed are they that have part in the first resurrection." A perfect outline of Christ's life shows us what our lives must be if we are one with him. Every disciple is another edition of the life of Christ—"Not I, but Christ living in me"—and that is our true attitude to-day, if we are united to our risen Lord. "As he was, so are we in this world." We are living out his life till he comes. We are very apt to end his life when he was received up and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high. Heb. i. 3, gives us the first glimpse we have of him in glory; perfect and complete atonement is the picture here. The High Priest never sat down because his work was never done; he had to offer sacrifice continually for the people. So, when our great High Priest sat down, it was to show us that his work of atonement was finished; henceforth, we see him in the new character—as mediator, intercessor, ever always open, hand always extended, able to save to the uttermost, because he ever liveth.

When the Passover was eaten, it was eaten standing—with loins girt and staff in hand—it was the outset of the journey. But when the Lord's Supper was instituted, they sat down.

"Rest my soul, the work is done, Perfected by God's dear Son."

This is the Day of Atonement. On that day the High Priest was not seen after he entered within the veil, and so, though our High Priest has gone into the Holiest, his life flows on in us and for us. Now remember that everything that is of Christ is for us. The first thought of the glorified Christ is perfect rest—and that is for us—the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

If you wanted to have an interview with a great man, you would not go to him in the busy hours of the day, when there were many waiting to see him, and every moment was occupied, but when the labors of the day were ended and he was seated in the midst of his family, the business of the day finished, and he was resting, you would think that the best time to obtain a hearing. So Jesus is now seated at perfect leisure, ready to hear and to help all who come to him. As he sat on the horns of Hattin, and taught the multitudes as he sat on the wall of Sychar, and talked with the woman of Samaria, he is now set down at the right hand of God. I once heard a child say, "Even if I get to heaven, Jesus will be so busy with the grown-up people and angels, he won't have time to speak to me; I would have to wait, oh! so many years." I do not think so; I believe he who said, "suffer little children," would say, "Stand aside" to the great ones, and would take the waiting child into his arms and lift it upon his bosom.

The next thought we get in his life is expectancy. He taught us to expect, and he is expecting. He said, "Watch, not because ye know, but because ye do not know." He is our example in this for he said of the hour, "No man knoweth, save my Father," and so we are doing just what he is doing

One day, in going from my country home to the city, I told my children I did not know when I would be back, perhaps that night, or to-morrow, or next day, or some day; I did not know exactly, I was detained until Saturday, but when I reached home I found they had been expecting me every day, and had insisted on having their best clothes on, so as to be ready. And I thought, that should be our attitude, waiting and watching, lamps trimmed and burning, robes white and clean. Jesus is waiting for the promise of the Father to be fulfilled.

The kingdoms of the world are to be given to his Christ. It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. What was the first temptation Jesus had to meet? The devil knew the promise and wanted Christ to take the shorter way to get it, avoiding the shame and humiliation of the cross. But Jesus said, "Get thee behind me, Satan." Peter had the same idea; his mind was full of the present. He had his eye on the temporal kingdom, and so, when Jesus spoke of his coming crucifixion, he said, "Far be it from thee, Lord." He too would take the short way, and Jesus met him with the same rebuke, recognising Satan again. And since that day, Satan is continually offering us the easy way. We can have our good things in this life, but—the Church under Constantine took the easy way, and it had all the kingdoms of this world, but without Christ; and it made Peter the head of that Church.

It had its good things, but God's hand is on it to-day, and judgment will surely be given, a righteous judgment. Let us get Satan behind us; or, rather, behind Christ. There is where we want to keep him.

Heb. xii. 2 gives us another picture of the resting Savior. After the toil and the suffering, and the shame of the cross, he has entered into rest, and we may have this same rest; it remaineth for the people of God. Jesus speaks of two rests. In Matthew he says: "Come unto me all ye that labor, and rest." Cease from labor to get rest. And in Hebrews it is, "labor to enter into rest." The first is the rest of grace, free to all who will come. The second is the rest of glory. Having obtained salvation then work for your reward, the rest that is given by the Master to those who have truly followed him, in patient, self-denying labor for the good of others, for the salvation of the lost, and the ushering in of the brighter day.

Many Christians will be saved by grace, but they will not have any reward. God saves us for nothing, but he does not reward us for nothing. I remember an old lady whom I visited once, saying, as I questioned her of her hope in Christ, "Ah! if I can only just squeeze into heaven, and get a seat way back by the door, I shall be satisfied," and that is the thought of many of God's children. They may be satisfied, but God will not be. Do you want to disappoint God? He has provided at great cost, an abundant salvation. Do not make light of it, nor be satisfied with anything less than all Jesus has for you.

Rev. iii. 21 is to me the most pathetic passage in all the Scriptures—"Even as I overcame." What a picture that gives us of what Jesus endured for us. I am minded here of a story I once heard of a judge who was called to preside at the trial of his own son. And day after day he sat listening to the testimony for and against with a perfectly unmoved countenance, not the slightest trace of more than ordinary interest, never in anywise gave the slightest intimation that the culprit was anything to him, and the young man was equally reserved. People wondered, and denounced him as unnatural, inhuman, etc., but when the jury came in with their verdict, "Not Guilty!" the judge was lost in the father, and reaching down from his seat of honor, he took the boy in his arms and drew him up beside him, and before the crowded court-room manifested a father's love, all the deeper for the trying ordeal both had passed through. Have you ever noticed that the only time Jesus spoke of God as God, was when he was on trial? It was Father, and My Beloved Son, all through the New Testament. In his last prayer for his disciples, it was Father, Father, again and again; even in the garden, My Father. But on the cross, where he was bearing the sin of the world, where the Son of God was made sin for you and me, he had no right to say Father. It was, My God; and the just Judge would not say, My Son; he must be silent till the debt was paid; till redemption was finished; till the grave was entered; till resurrection was accomplished; and then almost his first words, "My Father," and "Your Father," uniting us to him in a bond that can never be broken; and then he ascended and took his seat on his Father's throne. Jesus is not on his own throne yet, but we are promised that we shall sit down with him on his Father's throne, and by and by share his throne—when he comes to it.—Rev. xxii. You know that a king shares his throne with his wife, and the relation is two-fold, subject and co-ruler. That is the attitude of the Church, the Bride of Christ, to-day. If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him forever.

The most wonderful promise in the Word of God is that, "If ye confess me before men," etc. We are apt to think and act as if it were hard to confess Christ before men. Did you ever think how hard it is for him to confess us before his Father and the angels, who know all our shortcomings and failures? And yet, because of his promise, he does it. Even when the accuser, Satan himself, stands ready to jeer and deride when the inconsistencies of God's children are pointed out,—Satan says "Did you not say, If any man would come after me, let him deny himself? Look at that man rolling in wealth, heaping up riches and yet holding on to them with both hands, not giving one penny to your cause—what about him?" Jesus says, "He confessed me before men. I will confess him and in the days that are coming, if he will not hearken unto the voice of love, then I will deal with him." Again, Satan points out that lady with diamonds enough to send the gospel to thousands of the perishing heathen, dainty in lace and velvet, jewels flashing at every movement, "She is one of your disciples." And the Master says, sadly, "Yes she has confessed me. She is mine." Children of God, awake! Our patient Savior is waiting, oh! so patiently. This is the day of grace!

We are all familiar with Jesus in the character of intercessor, ever ready, ever watchful, never slumbering nor sleeping. Do you mind how many times Jesus is represented as sitting, only once as standing, and that was when Stephen was being offered up? I remember during the days of slavery, hearing an old colored man pray; and after recounting the wrongs of his people to a listening God, how they were beaten—and sold, children from their parents, wives from their husbands; he closed by saying, "When you see these things, O Lord, I wonder you do not get right off your throne to bring deliverance." And so I believe Jesus stood to deliver and receive Stephen.

Jesus is sitting now. All through this great Day of Atonement, he has been sitting, listening, confessing, intercedding, helping; but the evening is drawing nigh. The day is far spent, and when once the Master of the house has risen up and shut to the door, the acceptable year of the Lord will be over, and the day of vengeance will dawn. Do you mind when Jesus went into the synagogue to read he closed the book before the end of the paragraph, and said, "This day, this Scripture is fulfilled in your sight." The rest of the verses had not been fulfilled; but the day is coming, when the book closed so long will be reopened, the Master will raise up, and the day of vengeance will come. When once the Master of the house has risen up,—what a solemn thing for us! Oh, see to it that we are ready when the cry comes, "Go ye out to meet him." And so let us labor, and watch and pray, that we may have a part in the rest of glory that surely remaineth for the people of God.—Sermon delivered by A. J. Gordon, D. D., at the recent Northfield Conference.

WOMEN OF THE REFORMATION.

The Reformation has frequently been represented as the exclusive work of men in exalted station. Roman Catholic theologians have been fond of depicting it as a system rudely imposed by the nobility, envious of the wealth of the church, and ignorantly accepted by the people, almost without a single sympathetic emotion. The shallowness of such a view is shown by the enthusiasm and devotion of multitudes of women who, without taking a prominent part in public affairs, proved themselves ready to suffer and die for the cause of the gospel. In the early history of the Reformed church we read of the devotion of the women of Geneva, and the heroism of the women of Holland; and find that in the most trying times the greatest heroes of the faith were encouraged by the self-sacrificing devotion of the women of their household; but it is only in exceptional cases that we can become intimately familiar with the lives of those who by their silent ministrations did so much for the church. Fortunate circumstances have preserved the domestic life of Luther, but we know next to nothing concerning that of the other Reformers. Even such obscurity may, however, have its lessons, and we purpose, therefore, to say a few words concerning the wives of several of the men who were most prominent in the early history of the Reformed Church, and then to give a few examples of ladies of exalted station who chose the shame of Christ in preference to the glory of the world.

ANNA REINHARD.

The life of the consort of Zwingli included an unusual portion of affliction. Anna Reinhard had been a beautiful girl of humble station, who had at an early age married a young nobleman, John Meyer von Knonau. The proud family of the bridegroom was bitterly opposed to the union, and he was forced to seek military service in foreign lands. He died in 1515, leaving his widow, with three children, in straitened circumstances. One of the children was a beautiful boy named Gerold, who succeeded in attracting the attention and affection of his grandfather, who afterward made some provision for the support of the widow. When Zwingli met her she was no longer in the bloom of youth, but was dignified in manner and universally esteemed. It is said, it was admiration for the boy Gerold that first directed the attention of the great Reformer to the mother. We have no particulars concerning the courtship, but it is certain that the marriage was for some time kept secret. It was dangerous for a priest to marry, as no one could tell what would be the result of the great conflict, so that Anna showed no little courage in linking her fortunes to those of the bold champion of the Reformation. Everything indicates that she became a model wife. She appreciated the grandeur of the work, and therefore took charge of the household and saved her husband as much as possible from those daily cares which might have interfered with his literary labor. During the great controversy of Baden, when, it is said, Zwingli did not go to bed for six weeks, we may be sure Anna was not idle. She was ready at any hour to prepare refreshment for her husband, or for the couriers who generally arrived at midnight. The family life was earnest and solemn; sometimes Zwingli would play on the flute, to the great delight of his wife and children, and it is said that he often consulted with his wife concerning the proper training of the little ones. With all this, we can hardly suppose that Anna enjoyed much of what is generally known as domestic happiness. It was a period in which there was little time for the cultivation of the amenities of social life, and men and women were alike called to endure hardness for the cause of Christ. As the years rolled on the struggle increased in intensity, and at last came the dreadful catastrophe at Cappel, where, in a single battle, Anna lost her husband, her son Gerold, a son-in-law, a brother and many other relatives. Could any sorrow be greater than this? That her contemporaries appreciated her affection is evident from a mournful ballad, "Frau Zwingli's Lament," which is still extant. Anna lingered seven years after the death of her husband, watching over her children with maternal care, and comforted by seeing them growing up into worthy men and women. Humble and uncomplaining, she was, as really as her husband, a martyr in the cause of truth.

IDELETTE DE BURES.

The domestic life of John Calvin is very obscure. He was twenty-nine years old and almost at the zenith of his fame before he thought of marriage. Idelette de Bures, whom he chose to be his wife, was of lofty lineage and high culture, but of a modest and retiring disposition. She was the widow of an Anabaptist, whom Calvin had converted. The union was not the result of violent passion, for, as Calvin himself says, he was not "one of that kind." Audin, a Roman Catholic writer, says "he wanted a secretary, a nurse, a cook, a manager;" but there is plenty of evidence to show that Calvin fully appreciated the sanctity of marriage, and chose his wife for loftier qualities than these. His enemies have called him heartless because when she died he went on with his employments as before; but we may well believe his statement, that unless he had done so he would have been utterly crushed by sorrow. Seven years after her death he still speak of his great affliction, and he could never be induced to enter into a second matrimonial alliance. He speaks of his wife as an example of all that is beautiful in woman. Like an ancient portrait, almost effaced by time, we can hardly discern her features, but enough remains to assure us of the incomparable beauty of the original.—J. H. Dubbs, D. D., in Historic Manual of the Reformed Church.

JEWISH NOTES FROM THE OCCIDENT.

Thirty Turkish born Jewish families have bought land by the Jordan at Safed for purposes of cultivation.

GREECE.—In our latest esteemed exchange the Hamagid of Lyck Prussia, we read that the weekly Journal published at Athens, Greece, in the Greek language, entitled Zion is edited by a highly learned and respected Greek Catholic Priest, named Dyonesius Latas, who is known to be truthful, honest and a great friend of the Israelites. The correspondent relates that an anti-Semitic pamphlet was handed to him entitled Judaique, in which the blood accusation is the principal theme. The Priest Latas not only declared the pamphlet a tissue of falsehoods, but in a very erudite article disproved the existence or possibility of such a cabal. Nay more, he exposed its author as an unworthy anarchist and demagogue.

Among the numerous deputations who proceeded to Kremsier in order to pay homage to the Emperor of Austria were those delegated by several Jewish congregations. In reply to addresses presented by those bodies, the emperor said: "I rejoice to find that my Jewish subjects lose no opportunity of giving emphatic expression to their imperishable loyalty and attachment to myself, the throne, and the fatherland. I thank you, as the representatives of highly respected religious communities, for the attention you have shown me. Rest assured that I afford my imperial protection to the Jewish population throughout my entire dominions." On the arrival of the emperor at Pilsen, where he stayed several days, his Majesty was greeted, among others, by Rabbi Dr. Caro. The Emperor honored the rabbi by entering into conversation, and by making various inquiries respecting the affairs of the local Jewish congregation. Next evening a conspicuous position was assigned to Dr. Caro at the court dinner, and here again the sovereign singled him out for conversation. He showed how varied is his acquaintance with Jewish matters by remarking that he was aware that several Austrians and Hungarians studied at the celebrated Jewish Theological Seminary at Breslau, where also Dr. Caro was educated.

The Parable of the Prodigal Son.

Never certainly in human language was so much—such a world of love and wisdom and tenderness—compressed into such few immortal words. Every line, every touch of the picture is full of beautiful eternal significance. The poor boy's presumptuous claim for all that life could give him—the leaving of the old home—the journey to a far country—the brief spasm of "enjoyment" there—the mighty famine in that land—the premature exhaustion of all that could make life noble and endurable—the abysmal degradation and unutterable misery that followed—the coming to himself and recollection of all that he had left behind—the return in heart-broken penitence and deep humility—the father's far-off sight of him, and the gush of compassion and tenderness over this poor returning prodigal—the ringing joy of the whole household over him who had been lost and found, and had come home—the unjust jealousy and mean complaint of the elder brother, and then that close of the parable in a strain of music: "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; was lost, and is found." All this in indeed a divine epitome of the wanderings of man and the love of God such as no literature has ever equaled, such as no ear of man has ever heard elsewhere. Put in the one scale all that Confucius, or Sakya Mouni, or Zoroaster, or Socrates ever wrote or said—and they wrote and said many beautiful, and holy words—and put in the other the Parable of the Prodigal Son alone, with all that this single parable connotes and means, and can any candid spirit doubt which scales would outweigh the other in eternal precious ness—in divine adaptation to the wants of man?—Dr. Farrar's "Life of Christ."

BIBLE STUDIES. No. I.

Words Discriminated.

Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. Isa. i. 2

In our Common Version two distinct Hebrew words occurring in the above passage are translated as though the latter of the two was used to only a little more forcibly represent the sense of the former. The verb gadal —גדל—rendered "nourished," in its primary conjugation, signifies to become great, highly valued, magnified. In a derived conjugation giddel signifies to make great, to cause to grow, to bring up as children. The second verb room,—רום—rendered "brought up," in its primary conjugation signifies to lift up oneself, to rise, to be high. In the derivative conjugation roman signifies to exalt, to lift up, to place on high, as to power, wealth, and honor. Applied to children the first of these words would imply the continued parental care in providing for all wants till the infant became the adult—came to the stature of complete manhood. The second word would imply that the parent had placed this child, when arrived at manhood, in possession of wealth, honor, and preferment. So the first word means to raise the infant up to manhood's noble stature, and the second word means to dignify, exalt, and make the adult wealthy and honorable.

Now God claims he has done all this for Israel. He had increased the family of the pilgrim wanderer, Jacob, into a great people. He not only developed Jacob's family into a mighty nation, but he exalted it to a position of wealth, honor, and power as made it "a name and a praise among all the people of the earth." The prophet then teaches, that God not only raised up Israel from imbecile infancy to full manhood stature, as a nation, i. e., made it great, but, also exalted the adult nation to princely excellency in its wealth, power, and honors. Under the reign of Solomon this condition of greatness and superlative exaltation was realized. At this summit of its national greatness, and its royal magnificence the nation apostatized—dissolved its connection with that inexpressibly kind and indulgent Father, who had made it both great and honorable. The nation fell away from worshipping the living Jehovah and consecrated the summits of Palestine's holy hills to the abominations of heathen idolatry. How sententious, how pathetic the expression:—"Children have I raised up, also I have exalted— and these have broken away from me." All in the original is spoken with intense emphasis—very hard to represent in another language without circumlocution.

THE following note was received just as we go to press, and speaks for itself:

Bro. Underwood:

Our meetings closed here last evening, and we start to Mentone this morning, and begin meetings there tonight to last indefinitely. We have had good meetings here, and the interest is good yet. We would not leave only that we have the appointment ahead. The Elder baptized four last Sunday. Please find a little corner in THE RESTITUTION for this for the benefit of our Michigan brethren. We are well, and expect to meet with the brethren at Plymouth before we leave the State.

Take care of your character. Do not be too much concerned for your reputation. Keep the character right, and the reputation will give you no trouble. Character is everything, something that cannot be hid from God or man—that cannot be changed as we change a garment; but we carry it with us wherever we go, and by it we are known every day of our lives. A pure, earnest, honest, consistent, symmetrical character—what divine glory it reflects! what blessings it confers on the world!

TO THE CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST JESUS GREETING IN HIS NAME.

"Beloved, believe not every spirit but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world."—1 John iv. 1.

In this brief extract of John's address to the faithful, we must understand that when he uses the word "spirit and spirits", he refers to doctrines, believed and taught by teachers whom he calls prophets. He warns them to beware of the doctrines set forth by those teachers, and calls them "false prophets." Even then there were many of them who had "gone out into the world;" and were leading unto death, those who gave heed to their false teaching.

In some degree the same condition of society prevails today. False teachers are abroad in the world, and they cease not to pervert every phase of revealed truth given unto us, that thereby we may become "wise unto salvation." In the above text, we are warned not to believe every doctrine, but first to try, or test the doctrine presented, that we may know whether it be of God. From the exhortation of the apostle it is quite evident that there were false doctrines advocated by false teachers, who claimed to be taught of God, or to have knowledge of the truth on those subjects they presented as truth. All things in nature and art, in science and philosophy; in social, commercial, or political life; all are weighed, measured, or judged by some standard; and that standard emanates from, or is sanctioned by the one, or by the power, to whom, or to which, is conceded the authority to fix the standard. These standards of judgment may be regulated by mortal man in the exercise of his intelligence as they pertain only to his present abode, and to things temporal: reaching no farther than the present mortal state. But on matters of faith, that which looks above and beyond the present and into the eternal future, there is but one standard given, and it is established by the Most High; and made known to us in the revelation he has given unto us, through his holy prophets and servants of old. By this standard alone we must judge of the doctrines presented in this age, as in the past. If teachers abide not by the principles therein laid down we are exhorted not to accept or believe their teachings.

From a recent publication to which my attention has been especially called, I wish to give a brief extract from one article in it, under the caption, "Free Moral Agency."

"Free moral agency is simply a theological expression, man manufactured, for his own convenience, and it may be that it does not express the truth. Let us by all means fit our theology to the Bible, and not try as many do to conform the Bible to our theology. Now then to the question. Is man a free moral agent? I answer most emphatically no. Is he a machine then? Again I say no. What then is truth? An agent is an actor, one who is able to act; a free agent is one who can act as he pleases without any restraint; a free moral agent is one who is free to act on all moral questions (i. e.) all questions involving the qualities of right and wrong. Now we do not hesitate to say that man is not a free moral agent. One passage of Scripture would confirm this position if we had no other. "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee; the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain," Psalms lxxix. 10. If man is under restraint then he is not a free agent; and surely the illustrations we have given in the preceding article clearly show that God does restrain and control, and use man just as he pleases. And yet man is free; the Bible teaches it and I firmly believe it; but how free? Free as to his will, I answer: but not free as to his acts. He is a free moral chooser, but not a free moral actor. Man's will is free, he may choose what he pleases. His purposes, determinations, volitions are entirely under his own control and guidance. But his actions are controlled, directed and over ruled by God."

Believing that such a theory is dishonoring to the All Wise and subversive to the first principles of sound Christianity, I desire to point out the unscriptural and illogical conclusions aimed at from such a premise.

First then. The phrase "free moral agency" is not a Scriptural one neither is "free moral chooser," "nor free moral actor." Therefore lay them aside with all other theological man made theoretical phrases and pass on to consider the principle involved in the position taken. "An agent is an actor." The word embodies two leading thoughts and others growing out of them. First, there must be a power superior to the agent, as an agent is one appointed to execute some work or labor. And second, the agent or actor. There is also the thought of the work to be accomplished, and the rewards to be gained for the faithful performance of the work appointed.

To all intelligent minds it is a well known fact, that all agents whether in the social, commercial or political world, are endowed with certain powers or liberties which they are given full permission to exercise, in the discharge of their duties as agents. Without this liberty of action they could not justly be held accountable for anything as they would be but dumb machines. The power appointing an agent for any purpose prescribes for certain rules, and lays down certain measures to be observed in order to accomplish a desired end, but, the agent is left at liberty to observe all directions given, or to reject all rules measures and directions. It he follows instruction and accomplish the work to which he was appointed, the reward will assuredly be given. His salary will be paid, but if on the other hand he rejects all rules and directions, and slothfully passes his time with triflers and idlers, his reward will not be given, but on the contrary, dishonor will be his portion. He has been given full liberty and power to form an honorable character as an agent, but he has utterly failed through his own indolence and therefore he reaps only condemnation. This fact we see every day manifested in real life.

Thus it is with man in his moral agency. God has given to him certain moral faculties, and too, he has given perfect liberty to exercise those moral powers if he sees fit to do so. Life and death are set before him in the gospel. The Master himself sends out the invitation. "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." If they are not free to respond to the call it would be only mockery to extend the invitation.

Again. This writer says: "His purposes, determinations, volitions are entirely under his own control and guidance. But his actions are controlled, directed and over ruled by God."

These two propositions cannot be admitted or believed because they embody a self-evident contradiction, and too, they do as Job did not in his most severe trial. They "charge God foolishly." Every one possessed of intelligent judgment must admit that man's actions are the result of his purposes or determinations. Before he acts he determines or purposes to act, and for the act he is judged. For example, a man determines to commit a murder, but unless he follows out his determination by the act he can neither be judged nor condemned. Who will dare to say that the Almighty Ruler of the Universe controls the hand of the assassin to commit the dread deed, and then that he condemns man, for what he himself directed and overruled him to do? Preposterous. This is not of his wisdom. Justice and judgment are the habitation of this throne.

When man in his first estate went forth from the hands of his Creator, he was constituted a being of intelligence, he was endowed with voluntary powers and given perfect liberty to exercise those powers in his actions. Actions are but the result of volition; or determination. Intelligent action is always preceded by determination. To endeavor to make man responsible for his purposes or determinations and relieve him from responsibility for his actions is to introduce interminable confusion into the entire purposes of God toward his creatures.

In the first temptation, the purpose to take the forbidden fruit came into the mind; the action followed, as the result of the purpose. Man was punished for the act because when he took of the tree, etc., not for the purpose. God did not control his act, direct and over-rule him to take and eat the forbidden fruit; and then punish him for doing what he could not avoid. No, no! He was free to take or to leave. God permitted him to develop a character just as he pleased. He was free to act. He is free today and he will be judged by the deeds done in the body. O, "test us try the spirits," at least we be found fighting against God.

CARRIE WILLIAMS.

DEER CREEK, N. Y.,

Dear Brethren and Sisters in the Lord:

I want to tell you what the dear Lord has done for me. He forgave my sins fifty-five years ago, and I loved him then, and I love him yet, for the reason he first loved me. I know whom I have trusted, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto his care against that day. I know I am weak and frail and sinful and unworthy, but I do not despair. Christ has not got through with me yet. I am confident of this very thing, that he which has begun a good work in me will perform it until the day of the Lord Jesus. The trying of my faith shall yet be found unto praise, and honor, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ, and after I have suffered awhile he will stablish, strengthen and settle me. I am not my own. I am bought with a price. My life is hid with Christ in God. O, may I tread the path he trod. He is the truth, the life, the way that leads to everlasting day.

O, how often when trials overtake me unexpectedly, I feel as if Jesus had forsaken me, and darkness and clouds thicken around me. It is then I cry out in my distress. When the billows rolled mountain high, and Jesus said, It is I, be not afraid. My fear was all gone, and peace flowed like a river, and all was calm, and then I saw the Good Shepherd's face again, and he laid his hand upon me, and led me to the fountain of living water, that cleanseth from all sin. How gently the Good Shepherd laid me on his own shoulder and bore me back through deserts dark and wild, over torrents and through floods, soothing me and calming all my fears. I could say, how good the Lord is, he is not willing any should perish, but the all should come to the knowledge of the truth and be saved.

Praise the Lord, for his mercy endureth forever, and let all his saints say, Amen. MRS. L. WHITAKER.

TYPE AND ANTITYPE.

As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of Man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came, and destroyed them all. Likewise as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed. Luke xvii. 26-30.

The truth of divine revelation rests on a firm foundation—as immovable as the everlasting hills.

God's holy word, as recorded by the prophets, Christ, and his apostles, in every utterance as recorded in the Scriptures has had, and will have, a literal and exact fulfillment. The truth of the Scriptures is a fact so well established, that argument is not needed in proof—and facts are always stubborn things. God's ways are just and right, and pure and good. He says that "all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth," save Noah and his family—eight persons—a type of the true church of God that will be found upon the earth at the close of Gentile times. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Matt. vii. 21. Of the population then existing upon the earth only eight persons were found righteous. A sad picture indeed of a race of beings made in the image of the Creator. Noah was a preacher of righteousness. He warned the men of his generation of coming judgment. God said "all flesh had corrupted his ways upon the earth." So has Christ, the great teacher, said it shall at the close of the gospel age, and at the coming of the Son of Man—a poor prospect for the world's conversion. This was never intended, as it is nowhere promised in the Scriptures. God visits the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name. Acts xv. 14. How indeed of the men of this age become the true followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, when compared to the great masses that inhabit our world. How small the number of obedient believers of the gospel of God even in Protestant America, when compared with unbelievers of the outside world. But do you pretend to say that the age in which we live is thus corrupt? That is just what we do say. The evidences accumulate on every hand that we are in the last days of the Gentile times. Watch ye, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son cometh.

As it was in the days of Lot". Lot was a righteous man, for the record says his righteous soul was vexed from day to day with their filthy conversation. I seriously doubt if anything in Lot's day excelled in shameful baseness the revelations made and substantiated before the world in the very days in which we live.

Sodom might blush and hide her face in shame and horror at the statements made by the Pall Mall Gazette. If these revelations had been made of papal France, or of Papal Austria or Italy, or of any part of the heathen world, we should not have been so put to shame. But persisting as they do in Protestant London, that claims to be head and shoulders above the cities of other nations, we can exclaim, Alas for poor humanity. Read over carefully and ponder the words of our text; for as a snare shall the day of the Lord come on all them that dwell on the earth. So says the Great Teacher. Is not the church virtually saying "My Lord delayeth his coming? Are they not smiting their fellow servants? Are they not eating and drinking with the drunken? Beware, lest coming suddenly he find you thus engaged, or sleeping, and appoint you your portion with hypocrites and unbelievers. There will be weeping and gnashing of teeth. Unmask the hypocrite; lay bare his covetous schemes and plans for filthy lucre. O, keep thy people from the evil one. May their loins be girded with truth, that, having done all, they may be able to stand in this evil time.

NEWELL BOND.

It is a mistake to suppose that "this way" means "God's way." Says Prof. Bush: "All flesh had corrupted his way. All mankind; called "flesh" from their frailty, Isa. xl. 6-8; but more especially from the corruption and carnality of their unregenerate state. Gen. vi. 3. By their "way" is meant not only their religion or faith, 2 Pet. ii. 2; but also their manners, conduct, course of life. Thus the "way of Cain," Jude 11, is used for maliciousness, the "way of Balaam" for covetousness, 2 Pet. ii. 15, and so in other cases. In allusion probably to this language it is said in Job, xxii. 15, 16, "Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden? Which were cut down out of time, whose foundation was overflown with a flood? i.e. with the water of the general deluge. Compare Luke xvii. 27."

The limiting pronouns in both the Hebrew and Septuagint refer to "all flesh" as the antecedent word.—ED. RES.]

Conference Report.

The Annual Conference of the Church of God in Indiana convened, according to notice, at Argos, Ind., Friday, Oct. 9, 1885, and continued over Sunday following. Many of the friends from different parts of the State were in attendance, and the neat little chapel of our Argos brethren was well filled at all the gatherings. The public speakers present were B. W. Woodward, Mary A. Woodward, L. C. Chase and J. S. Hatch, of Michigan, R. S. Driggins, S. T. Hook, S. A. Chaplin and H. R. Carter, of Indiana. All the speakers were given good attention, the discourses being clear, practical gospel sermons. The social meeting Sunday morning was the best of the Conference, lack of time preventing many from taking any but the listener's part.

The friends in Indiana were made glad by meeting at this gathering Brother L. C. Chase and his two brothers, of Adrian, Mich., sons of our deceased Brother L. H. Chase. We find these brethren all strong in the faith once delivered to the saints. We hope to meet them again, and trust they will not let this their first visit to Indiana be the last. Sister Mary A. Woodward also visited this State for the first time to attend this meeting, and as the friends all like her, we hope she will come again; Brother Levi Fogle, of Michigan City, Ind., who has been in the faith for many years, but by circumstances has been prevented from attending meetings, encouraged the brethren by his cheering words and hearty hand-clasp. Come again Brother Fogle. Brother and Sister Woodward remained in Argos after the Conference and will hold meetings in Indiana for a few weeks.

R. S. Driggins was chosen chairman of the Conference for the next year, and A. R. Underwood was appointed Secretary. The next Quarterly Meeting will be held at Plymouth, in connection with the Publishing Association Meeting in November.

No. Some think they are caused by dust thrown up by the great Krakatoa eruption in 1883. Others that an unusual amount of moisture in the upper air may be the cause of them, and still others that they show the presence of an extraordinary quantity of meteoric dust entering the earth's atmosphere from outer space.

In Susiana, Persia, an emissary of the French Government, M. Dieulafoy has unearthed and forwarded to France capitals and bas-reliefs, ivory, glass and bronze articles, enameled bricks and pottery, on the site of the palace of Artaxerxes Mnemon. Some of the enameled work shows black warriors gorgeously dressed and ornamented with armlets and tiger skins. They carry the long stick peculiar to the ancient Kings of Susiana, and may settle a disputed point whether or not Persia was that other Ethiopia which appears to have left in Asia.

A Berlin journal has recently made an estimate of the size and cost of the armies of Europe. In the seventeen states of that continent, the armies, even on a peace footing, number 2,529,522 men. The total cost for these millions it estimates to be £196,514,852, or more than $950,000,000 per year. The total population of Europe is said to be a little more than 315,000,000. This would make the armies, in peace times, average three dollars per year to each person, young and old.

WHEAT FROM PUGET SOUND.

Mr. Olive Counter, who resides on the north-east quarter of section 32, township 21 north, range 4 east, about five miles from this city, brought in some samples of seven-headed wheat, raised this year on his creek bottom clay loam land. The stalks are the products of two kernels, and are six feet high from the root to the top head. The heads are very peculiar, resembling a pine cone, being thick and clumpy. One of the heads of average size was shelled out, and the grains counted from the one head were 161. According to this the one kernel of wheat yielded fifty plump, fat wheat grains, or nearly one thousand fold. The field per acre to Mr. Counter of this wheat was 35 bushels. On the same kind of soil he has raised rye top eleven this year six feet in height. Those who are acquainted with good milling wheat say that this will make a number one quality of flour. One of the heads, which was weighed, lipped the scales at over half an ounce.—From the Tacoma Morning News.

Colonel Ingersoll asks: "What, after all is the object of life? What is the highest possible aim?" It is almost too much to expect a fellow to answer such a question as that right off, but we make the guess that the object of life and the highest possible aim is to make sport of other people's highest aspirations at 50 cents a head.—Boston Transcript.

We are constantly obtaining important new light on the subject of evolution. Professor Cope, in the Popular Science Monthly for September, proves that man and the hoofed animals descended from a common ancestor, the Condylarthra. That is as far back as he is able to trace the genealogy, but thinks that the pedigree of the Condylarthra will hereafter be discovered. We do not wish to interrupt the professor in the midst of his lesson, but we are dying of curiosity to know how that part of the work was done which makes Professor Cope's knee bend forward, while the knee of his brother, the ass, bends backward. On which of the two animals was the leg twisted around? It must be said that it was uncommonly fortunate for the quadruped, or for the professor, that the operation was made complete. Just imagine how curious it would be if it had only been half done—and one of the professor's legs had bent out before and the other had bent out behind—Interior.

COCHRAN.—At Millerton, Kansas, Aug. 20, 1885, Olive J. Cochran, wife of John W. Cochran, aged 19 years and four months.

My dear sister was baptized in the One Faith, in 1882, by Brother H. R. Carter, at Eagle Creek, Indiana. She was a true Christian, ever faithful to the Savior and his cause. She was of a pleasant disposition, having a kind word and smile for all around her. She leaves a husband and two children, father and mother, two sisters and four brothers to mourn her. But we mourn not as those who have no hope, for we know, "She will sleep but not forever, there will be a glorious dawn, we shall meet to part no never, on the resurrection morn." Funeral services were held at the residence in Millerton, by Brother Fisk, then we followed her to the grave, and at the close of a most lovely summer day, she was laid in her peaceful resting place to awake no more until Jesus the Life Giver appears.

"Sister, then we hope to meet thee,
When we'll take thee by the hand,
Then we'll twine our arms around thee,
In that bright and happy land."

LYDIA CHAPLIN.

HUFF.—Of Logansport, Ind., Sep. 11, 1885, aged 46 years and three months.

Brother Huff was drowned while crossing the Arkansas river with three other men in a small boat, the river being swollen and rough, and the boat was in a leaky condition, filled with water and sank. One of the men clung to the boat until rescued, while Mr. Huff and the other two started to swim to shore. But Mr. Huff's strength gave out, and he sank out of sight. His body was recovered after three days' search, and arrived at Logansport on the 17th, and was interred in Mt. Hope Cemetery at 10 a. m.

There being no minister in town, of the "One Faith" the funeral services were conducted by Mr. Daniels, of the Methodist Church.

The deceased leaves a wife and seven children (three sons and four daughters) to mourn their loss. Pen cannot tell the terrible bereavement that cast its gloom over this household, when the sad intelligence was received, and so much the more because he was daily expected home. By his death, wife loses, a dear and affectionate husband, and children a kind and loving father.

May we all meet again, in that world that has no bitter partings is my prayer. M. E. HOYT.

Announcements.

The First Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana, will be held at Plymouth, Ind., commencing Friday, Nov. 13, 1885, and continue over the following Sunday. Brethren, this is your meeting. The friends in Plymouth can entertain all who will come, and are anxious to see a good number present. Let us have a representation from every church in the State, and let the brethren who are isolated come to this meeting and join in the feast of good things the Lord has provided us. If those who cannot attend would write a short letter, telling of the cause of Christ in their locality, of their faith and hope in the promises of God, it would encourage those fortunate enough to be able to attend. Take the matter in hand, brethren, and let us have one more good meeting. The Annual Meeting of the Publishing Association will be held in connection with this Conference.

Mark how the flower, whose drooping bell
Would hear
The lavish'd freshness of the nightly dews,
Open the frail chalice in the dust that flies,
Lifts it, and drinks the bounty of the skies.

ALLIANCE WITH THE WORLD-POWER, THE MAINSPRING OF THE CHURCH'S HOSTILITY TO PROPHETIC TRUTH.

The beautiful faith of Abram is held up in Holy Writ as a pattern to the Church. Whatever may be said as to the way in which she has treated the lesson placed before her, none can doubt that her history bears a strong analogy to that of Abram, and that in the antitype as well as in the type, the direst consequences to the people of God have followed from the grave error committed.

Abram had been promised that in his seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed. Year after year passed by, and there was no sign of the accomplishment of that promise. He went childless. The patriarch felt grievously disappointed; and he and his wife, Sarai, set about the adoption of means to bring about that fulfilment themselves. This false step resulted in Ishmael's entrance on the scene. Thenceforward the seed of the bond-woman was reserved to be the persecutor of Israel, both literal and spiritual. From Mecca, the pseudo holy city of the seed of Ishmael, we get the startling point of Mohammedanism, the scourge alike of Eastern Christendom and the land of Canaan for over twelve centuries. Even now Europe stands wistfully gazing on a Mohammedan revival in North-east Africa and part of Syria, of which the irreconcilable Arab is the very core and life-blood, his hand against every man's hand.

The Church followed Abram's type. The Lord Jesus had promised he would return and establish his kingdom on earth, making his saints the priestly rulers of it under him. But the labors of his apostles were impeded by the Prince of this world, and the Church, instead of pressing on to perfection, lapsed back into heathen customs and superstitions.

A period of tribulation followed, and this culminated in the Edict of the Emperor Diocletian, A.D. 303, for the persecution of all professing the faith of Jesus. Christians were hurled into the Roman Amphitheatre, there to be torn limb from limb by hungry beasts of prey, that they might feast the depraved vision of citizens so emasculated by vice and inured from infancy to wanton cruelty, that nothing less than the death-throes of poor humanity could satisfy their craving for excitement, or even stir their jaded pulses. The human form divine, writhing in torture and reeking in pools of blood, delighted the distended eye.

Such persecution and at the hands of such a murderous race, should have shown how impossible it was that the disciples of him who was led as a lamb to the slaughter, and opened not his mouth, should have aught in common with the ruling power in this dispensation. Their position of separateness was plainly indicated. They forgot, however, that their Master himself had rejected the world kingdoms at the hands of the Tempter, preferring, in his love for the Church, to endure the agony of Gethsemane and the terrors of the Cross. Such strength as the Church had gave way, and in the horrible compromise that was struck out, Satan's object was gained. That object was worship. The Potentates of the Principality of the Air were christened by the names of the blessed mother of Jesus, His apostles, and some of the saints now sleeping in the Lord, by which rose divine honors accorded to them from Christian as well as Pagan. The feast days continued as usual, and even the tonsured, surpliced crew, which had been the laughing stock of the Latin satirist and poet, Juvenal, filled in solemn procession to the Pantheon (which was called by the name of the Virgin Mary and all the Holy Angels), bearing aloft the filthy life emblem of Egypt, the Tau, that popular worship to this day, representing the same as the insigne of the Church of God. Isis and Horus, favorite objects of worship of the Egyptians for nearly ten centuries before Jesus came into the world, had lately become the fashion in Rome: Christians worshipped them under the names of the Virgin and Child, and that special idolatry is the quintessence of Romanism to this day. The Christians shouted victory at the very time when they should have lamented a bitter and irreparable defeat, the outcome of their want of faith and want of tenacity of truth in the inspired record. They thought, like Abram, that they had accomplished God's promise; they believed they had wrested out of the hands of Paganism the kingdoms of the world. They knew not the depths of Satan. But they did what Abram did not do; they employed a notoriously evil agent for their purposes. The acceptance of the emperor Constantine as deliverer of the Church was an offence to God. Listening to false accusations Constantius had ordered the execution of his eldest son and of his wife. It was said of him that he adopted Christianity as the only religion that could pardon sins of so heinous a nature. The opiate swallowed so greedily by the Church resulted in a slumber measured by centuries. From the commencement of the fourth century to the end of the twelfth, its light was scarcely that of a will-o'-the-wisp.

The first dawn of day arose among the followers of Waldo and the Albigenses; Wycliffe and the Lollards carried on the work, always amid much tribulation. The Hussites, too, presented an effectual witness; and finally that great social and religious earthquake, known as the Reformation, associated with the names of Luther, Calvin, and Melancthon burst upon the world. Persecution was rife, and the blood of millions of martyrs flowed at the stake. At what a cost the freedom of the Bible was purchased the agony of these true witnesses testified. Yet what did the Church-corporate do? Satan resorted to his old device; the temptation of the world-power, and again with success. A man yet worse than Constantine, the foulest blot upon the annals of English kings, was accepted by British Protestants as the head of Christ's Church in this realm. Like Constantine he could not obtain license for his sins from the head against which he revolted: like Constantine he was accepted by Christians as a deliverer. Because the Pope would not countenance his guilty love for Anne Boleyn and divorce him from Catherine of Arragon, he who had just previously accepted from the Pontificate the title of Defender of the Faith, through his defence of its lies and extortions (a title which he never renounced, in spite of its origin), became the head of the Church in England, and thus once more united what God had ordained to be kept separate.

The Eternal Bride of Christ again leant upon the doomed world-power, instead of trusting wholly and unreservedly to the Rock of her Salvation. The fight was no longer the testimony of the saints against the world. In the world, they became of the world. The battle was soon changed into "Sadducee versus Pharisee." Separatedness, and the witness were lost, and with but slight exception the Church, once more drugged, was lulled into a false sense of security for a couple of centuries. God does not place men like Constantine and Henry VIII. at the head of his people, and if those people accept the leadership of Satan's emissaries, it must be to their own irretrievable loss.

Few Christians are aware of the vast consequences entailed upon the Church by ignorance of dispensational truth, as taught in God's word. The origin of any system is not to be found in the flower or the fruit, but in the seed from which the plant sprang.

What is the origin of the world-power? God's earthly people, Israel, knew that his only kingdom on earth must be established in Jerusalem. Of the heavenly calling of the Church they knew nothing. In spite of continued acts of disobedience they refused to believe they could be cast out. They may well have argued that they would never be superseded by the Gentile. God, however, gave them over to the Gentile supremacy, promising, nevertheless, (for he was long-suffering, slow to anger, and of great goodness), to destroy the Gentile power and remember his covenant with Abraham; and sooner should his celestial ordinances depart from before him than that promise be forgotten! Yet, what God would not forget, the Church did not trouble to remember. It has clung for over fifteen centuries to the fourth of the wild beasts of Daniel's vision, one which was to combine the characteristics of the three preceding ones (compare Rev. xiii. 1-3), and "be great and terrible exceedingly." The thought is simply frightful. The man of God who beheld this fearful thing even but in vision was "much troubled." What an awful thing it is to count God "slack concerning his promises," to say "my Lord delayeth his coming!" The Church is ever prone to rest on sight and not on faith. Like Peter, when the storm arose, she tried to walk on the waters by looking down instead of steadfastly keeping her eyes fixed on the Author and Finisher of her faith. There never has been till now a people prepared for his possession. The Church in apostolic times but numbered some few thousands, and they were full of grave heresies brought with them from Paganism. Yet Jesus waits. His patience is inexhaustible. The effect of the Church's policy in clinging to the world-power has been stupendous indeed! She has fastened herself on to what is doomed to destruction.

She has been like a piece of moss clinging to a loose boulder which the roaring torent shall presently hurl down into the abyss beneath, shivering it into a thousand atoms, when she should have clung to the rock from which the relentless waters will loosen nothing. How Satan has striven to deprive the Lord of "His peculiar people!" He died for the Church, and the powers of the air, unable to destroy the Lord of Glory, aimed primarily at the destruction, and, secondarily, at the alienation of the love of those he suffered in order to redeem.

The Christian hope of the Lord's descent into the air for his people was stifled by the god of this age, from the days the apostles slept, down to the present century! Nay, so far from there being "hope," there were actual pangs at the thought he was coming!

What a sad perversion of the Scriptures. And all owing to the Church having withdrawn her gaze from the personality of the King! Thus at the end of the sixth century, when an opposition Pope had been proclaimed at Constantinople, he was pointed at as the Antichrist, and there having been great disasters throughout Christendom, affecting more particularly the property of the Church, a belief arose that the end of the world was at hand. On that occasion Pope Gregory the Great thus expressed himself: "We know from the word of Almighty God that the end of the present world is now at hand, and that the reign of the saints is about to commence. And now that the end of the world is approaching, many things will take place which have not happened before. For there will be atmospheric changes, terrors from heaven, deranged seasons, wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places." There is not a word about the personality of the Lord Jesus in that speech, and even by "saints" he meant a very different thing from what we do.

At the end of the tenth century there was a worse panic. Then it was not the commencement of the reign of the saints that was spoken about, but the end of it.

The thousand years were reckoned from the date of the Nativity, and Christ and his saints had been reigning through the apostles, the Fathers, and the church of Rome. Well, if men could believe that they could believe anything! But it was, nevertheless, the logical result of the Church's attempt to assume that the Christian hope had been realised, and account for the anomalous position they had been taking up—ruling when they should have been witnessing against the world-power.

The present position of the Church with regard to this thing is very serious, much more so than Christians are wont to imagine. There is not panic; but skepticism and indifference as to "the hope" pervades even the true Church. It is not contended that souls are not being saved, but that a full gospel is not found acceptable by the majority of those who have been saved. The average evangelist is satisfied if he brings the proselyte into the outer court, instead of conducting him into the sanctuary. We are told we must leave the principles of the doctrine of Christ, and go on unto perfection: (Heb. vi. 1-2). There should be full consecration to God, and the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, "coming behind in no good gift, waiting for the coming of the Lord;" if we do not so wait, we are obviously waiting in our good gift, at least. Those who are privileged to hold a position of responsibility in the ministry are not taking to heart, as they should, the analogy between their position and that of Titus, who was exhorted to speak especially to God's children regarding the necessity for sanctification, bearing in mind the hope of the Lord's coming, itself a purifying thing (1 John iii. 2-3,) and to prepare a peculiar people, zealous of good works. (Titus ii. 12-15). The Lord says, "Be ye ready!" and there must be a people to be ready for him when he comes. It is certain that they ought all to be preparing people for the Lord's return, and it is equally certain that but few are doing so. It stands to reason that a system having its origin in evil cannot be blessed of God. The inheritance of Henry VIII. cannot be more valuable than that of Constantine. The methods of the Church in ancient times are, moreover, still in vogue under another guise. The Church is not satisfied with praying to God and petitioning the legislature for its requirements, but it is constantly threatening the fate of the administrations with the exercise of a coming vote between parties. Thus "coercion" is still the watchword. Under such a principle Christians become partakers of the deeds of what Christ is coming to destroy.

This coercion is a thing hateful to God. Peter was told to put up his sword. The same admonition then given to Peter is repeated in Rev. xiii. 10, to the saints in the latter days: "He that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword—here is the patience and the faith of the saints." The use of the sword is the worst form of coercion, perhaps, but the use of the sufferance, which is more suitable in the present day, implies the same principle. But if we want to have a clear understanding of the failures of the Church Corporate, and the principle underlying them, we must examine the Epistles to the Churches in Revelation, chaps. ii. and iii., which give in symbol the prophetic history of Christendom, from apostolic times down to the Lord's coming. In the earlier period, the church was commended for hating the deeds of the Nicolaitanes (Rev. ii. 6,) which the Lord also hates. But when the church in the time of Constantine began to ride upon the world-power, she is charged with having within her "them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes," and as if the more strongly to emphasize his condemnation of that doctrine, he repeats the words "which thing I hate." Who or what the Nicolaitanes were is a matter of opinion. But the meaning of the word is clear enough. It is derived from nikao to conquer, and people, and it would thus appear that those who hold this doctrine advocated "the subjugation of the peoples," i.e., a general coercion of political adversaries. Verily were the people bent to the will of the Church Corporate! The word "Laodicea," on the other hand, means "the people's rights," being derived from laos "people," and dike "right, law." Thus the last stage becomes worse than the first, and the Lord declines to own such a body, altogether, casting it from him in utter disgust (Rev. iii. 16). Here the people are not coerced by the church, as in the Nicolaitan stage, but they are coercing the church, and the church itself is perfectly satisfied with such coercion, even to the extent of giving its own voice to that of the people. The outcome of all this is given in Rev. xvii., where "mystery Babylon" is found seated on the beast with ten horns (i.e.) uncrowned), and whence she is hurled to her ruin by those same "ten horns."

It may be asserted that the Babylonian system is only found among Papists and Ritualists. That is, however, quite incorrect. Its symbols are found in nearly all ecclesiastical systems, and the sermons would seem to be leavened throughout, if people would only take the trouble to see where. It must be thoroughly shaken off if we are to be "without blemish" among the 144,000 not contaminated with spiritual adultery (Rev. xiv. 4-5) as "not defiled with women" is generally held to mean.

It is feared the above view will be very unpopular, but is it not the teaching of the word of God? Satan is constantly introducing leaven wherever he can. He has done the same in our very subject of prophecy. Christ and the Scriptures are the be-all and end-all of this study. False systems are therefore introduced, and can always be traced to some wrong apprehension of this grand principle.

Let us rest on Christ and keep clear of the World-Power, and let our hope in Christ be fixed by the Spirit working through the Word, as he taught us. Let us abjure absolutely the principle of coercion in an age of grace, and let our watchword be ever "Christ and the Scriptures."—G. Warrand Houghton Esq., Author of "The Expected Rapture of the Church," in Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

Other Things Added.

With whatever consequences, at whatever cost, the Christian is called upon to set his affections on the things above. "This is what Christ's decisive language in the Sermon on the Mount is intended to convey to our minds. He means that we should say, without reserve, 'Perish whatever stands in the way of our devotion to spiritual interests, to duty, love, self-sacrifice, to the will of God and the true welfare of our brethren. Let earthly industry, earthly accumulation, take its chance after these. The claim of heaven is absolute; the claim of earth is relative and subordinate.' What sort of doctrine is this? Is it extreme, visionary, impracticable? What ever it may seem to you, do not allow yourselves to doubt that it is the teaching of the Lord and Master, and that he addresses it in all its stringency to every one of us. It is no matter that we have our wants, our businesses, our tastes, our fears, our burdens. None of these must interfere with the imperious claims of the spiritual divine order upon the human soul. It is the very idea of a Christian that he acknowledges this order, and consents to be taken into it. This is the really important part of Christ's teaching, because it has to deal with the rooted tendencies in our flesh, which are so hard to get under; because we all have such strenuous desires to get rich, to be pleased, to be comfortable, to be safe, to be in a good position. But we need not leave out of our consideration those other words of Christ, "If ye seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, all these other things shall be added unto you." "Your Heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things." I said that we must let earthly industry take its chance after the things above. But we may safely do so. The industry which produces and earns is in no danger of being destroyed by the predominance of heavenly interests, rightly understood. A second place is quite good enough for the prudence, the providence, that puts by earthly treasure, that stores up the grain in barns, and invests capital in industrial enterprises. But it holds that place securely when the spiritual divine order has the first place. I know that men may be tempted into idleness by the notion that they are caring for spiritual interests. Some of the Christians who had been taught by St. Paul were not proof against this temptation. He was obliged to warn those who were idly waiting for the appearing of the kingdom, that steady industry was an ordinance of God, that if a man wanted to eat he must work, that to neglect to provide for a man's household was to be worse than an infidel. In all ages there have been Christians who have failed to see the sacredness and heavenly authority of the laws which form families, societies, and nations, and have fancied that God was to be served by a renunciation of social and domestic ties. But Christ's teaching is not to be credited with errors like these. The impulses of duty and love which he would foster are the best correctives of the idle and careless instincts. You cannot suppose that a spiritual temper would make a man lazy and self-indulgent, or thoughtless to the welfare of his parents or his children. No; whatever paradox there may be in the statement, 'the voice which insists with authority, "Lay not up treasures on earth, but treasures in heaven," is' that which best promotes industrious and provident habits in a community. Those who care for the well-being of any community are obliged to contend earnestly against improvidence, and to do their best to encourage people to lay by. But they see plainly enough that what they are thus led to contend against are the fleshly instincts, and by no means the heavenly aims of God's children. A man is improvident because he likes taking his ease better than working, the indulgence of his appetites better than self denial. The most effectual way of checking improvidence is to awaken the sense of duty, the care for higher things, the feelings and habits of one who thinks of human beings as the redeemed of Christ, and God's children. Providence, I say again, may take its chance, can be trusted to take care of itself, in a society of which the members are bent on realising the kingdom of God and his righteousness.—J. Llewelyn Davies.

At one of the stations on the Chicago and Northwestern railroad recently, an anxious inquirer came up to the door of the baggage car and said, "Is there anything for me?" After some searching among boxes and trunks, the baggage-master rolled out a keg of whisky. "Anything more?" asked the wet grocer. "Yes," said the baggage-man, "there's a gravestone that goes with that liquor." The consequences of the whisky man assumed a worthy but thoughtful appearance, the door was shut with a slam and the train moved on.—Union Signal.

The first Napoleon somewhat rashly predicted, says the Academy, that before the close of the century Europe would be either a Cossack or a Commonwealth. It would be safer to say that, humanly speaking, before many generations the destinies of the world will be controlled either by Anglo-Saxon or Muscovite influences, that is, by the spirit of freedom or a grinding military despotism. The tendency of the age, so far as we may judge at the present, is all in the direction of Anglo-Saxon domination.

Good Advice.

"Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long." Prov. xxiii. 17.

When you think, when you speak, when you read, when you write,
When you sing, when you walk, when you seek for delight:
To be kept from all wrong when at home or abroad,
Live always as under the eye of the Lord.

Whatever you read though the page may allure,
Read nothing of which you are perfectly sure
Consecration at once would be seen in your look,
If God should say solemnly, "Show me that book."

Whatever you think, never think what you feel
You would blush in the presence of God to reveal;
Whatever you say in a whisper or clear,
Say nothing you would not like Jesus to hear.

Whatever you write, though in haste or in heed,
Write nothing you would not want Jesus to read;
Whatever you sing to the midst of your glee,
Sing nothing that his listening ear could displease.

Wherever you go, matter no where you be,
Lest the great God to you ask you, "How camest thou here?"
Turn away from each pleasure you'd shrink from pursuing,
If God should down and say, "What art thou doing?"

Mary and Willie, aged respectively six and four years, were sitting together in one large rocking-chair near a window during a heavy thunder storm.

As the lightning grew more vivid and the thunder more terrific, Mary, who sat nearest the open window, began to be greatly frightened, but her little brother very promptly said, "Let me sit on the thunder-side, sister."

Honoring the Parent.

A lady was walking along a road near a large town, when she overtook three ragged children. The eldest a boy of about ten years, carried a little infant wrapped in a piece of old carpet. It was not the tattered garments, shoeless feet, and pale countenances which attracted her attention, but the pleasant manner in which they talked together as they walked before her.

The lady walked slowly, in order to keep behind them and listen to their pleasant voices, for their words were words of love. No angry reply or sullen voice did she hear. At length, coming near a cake shop, she called them in. She bought each of them a bun, and gave them a penny apiece. They thanked her with looks of delight. She watched them, expecting and hoping to see them eat their buns; but to her surprise, after a little talk among themselves, they put them into an old basket, and walked off. She overtook them, and asked,—

"Are you not hungry, my children? Why do you not eat your buns?"

The pure joy of benevolence lighted up their pale faces as they replied: "O yes, we are hungry, but we are keeping the buns for father. Poor father has been ill and lost his teeth, and he can't eat the hard bread."

These children lived in a cellar in a large town. Their father was a street-sweeper, and, though very poor, he had what many lack,—the love of his children. It was a little act, but we may believe that the poor father was rich, for his children loved him. The lady visited the cellar where the poor children lived, and though lacking almost every comfort, it was a home where love dwelt; and she could add that she believed that cellar-home was not destitute of the love of God.

Far happier were these children, whose love to their father so filled their hearts as to make them willing to lay aside the tempting bun, than are those whose only thought is to gratify their own desires.

Quiet Workers.

Christ's lowly, quiet workers, unconsciously bless the world. They come out every morning from the presence of God, and go to their business or their household work. And all day long they toil, they drop gentle words from their lips, and scatter little seeds of kindness about them, and to-morrow flowers of God spring up in the dusty streets of the earth, and along the hard path of toil on which their feet tread. More than once, in the Scriptures, the lives of God's people in the world are compared in their influence to the dew. There may be other points of analogy, but especially note-worthy is the quiet manner in which dew performs its ministry. It falls silently and imperceptibly. It makes no noise; no one hears it dropping. It chooses the darkness of night, when man is sleeping, and when no one can witness its beautiful work. It covers the leaves with clusters of pearls; it steals into the bosom of flowers, and leaves a new cupful of sweetness there. It pours itself down among the grasses and tender herbs and plants, and in the morning there is fresh beauty everywhere. The fields look greener, and the flowers are more fragrant; all life glows and sparkles with new splendor. And is there no lesson here, as to the manner in which we should do good in this world? Should we not scatter blessings so silently, so sweetly, yet secretly that no one should know what hand dropped them? God help us for his dear Son's sake.—M. A. Getchell, in Gospel Banner.

Well Said.

The following excellent thoughts on the resurrection of the dead are from George F. Pentecost, D. D. Pass them along. M. G.

"IF A MAN DIE, SHALL HE LIVE AGAIN?"

My friends that is a question that profoundly interests me. I want to know if that dark hole out in Greenwood contains the last of my mother. I want to know if it contains the last of my children. Oh, how I do hate the grave with a perfect hatred. It is a most awful thing for me to look down into the grave; and if I could not get my eyes up from the grave, and put the telescope of God's promise to my eye, and look away up to heaven, I would be the most miserable man on this footstool. I have got too many precious bodies there. My father lies there, who loved me with a love that was only second to the love of God; my mother lies there, whose hand has been laid upon my head in benediction when I was a wild wayward boy; that mother, who loved me, and prayed for me, and hoped for me when no one else hoped for me,—who rejoiced over my conversion, and was glad when she saw that God had called me into his service—she lies there. My sisters lie there; my brother lies there, whom God gave me to love, and whom I have lost awhile. Every day, almost, in the week, I bend over the coffin of some friend or acquaintance that must be laid there; and before I speak to you another time I may be—God knows—I may be laid there. I am profoundly interested in the question of death, and in the after-question: "If a man die, shall he live again?" Who can answer it? Not the philosopher. Not the scientist. Not the culturist. Who can answer it?

I affirm that there is but one book under the broad expanse of heaven that can answer that question, and it is this Book, that sets before us a life so beautiful, so transcendent, that nineteen centuries has bowed at his feet, that even his enemies take off their shoes when they come to speak of him. This Jesus whom we preach unto you, whom God sent forth into this world to tell us of himself, to blot out our sins and regenerate our characters, and bring us back from our broken obligations unto newness of life in him; this Jesus, whom the Jews murdered upon the tree, and whom you unbelievers are rejecting to-day, even though he bore your sins; this Jesus, whom they laid away in Joseph's tomb, but who rose again from the dead, and showed himself alive by many infallible proofs, and in a human body, with hands which have been pierced with cruel nails, and feet which had been broken by the crushing spikes, whose side was riven by a Roman spear, whose head was crowned and pierced and torn by the wreath of thorns; this Jesus, who after his body, in which he bore your sins and mine, he tasted death, stood before his disciples, ate with them, challenged them to put the fingers right in there, and the hand right in there;—this same Jesus, in a cloud of glory, before the astonished vision of men (who have laid their lives down in attestations of the truth of the sight) ascended into heaven, leaving this word, that he had gone to prepare a place for us, that he should come again and receive us to himself; and though ages might roll by, not one loved one that has been laid away in the grave, having fallen asleep in Jesus, should be lost, "for the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain"—what a blessed experience it would be!—"shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air." You ask how? The Bible says, "According to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself"—according to the ability of him who builds the earth upon solid pillars of nothing, and holds it up by the word of his power.—Reprint from World's Crisis.

THE END OF THE SKEIN.

The hands that wound
The well-spun thread a moment's rest have found,
And busy thought dis-labeth not to ask
The lesson hidden in the homely task.

And as while fall
Fast gathering shades of twilight that forestall
More solemn night, the grandame weaves in chain
Of simple musing from the finished skein.

Short as this life!
Wond'ring, she thinks, why do men plot and plan,
And vex the night with schemes, the day with strife—
Our threescore years and ten are but a span.

A tangled skein
That we must first unravel to produce
Ought that may higher destiny obtain,
Or evermore hold the Master's use.

Endurance wanes:
In haste does perplexing knot we closer draw,
And see to late the Blemish that remains,
Where wiser patience had not left a flaw.

Yes; looking back,
How many a time a twisted thread is found
In this strange web of life ere, growing slack,
It warns us that the skein is nearly wound.

Then, safely dyed
In that most precious stream by mercy planned,
Which flowed on Calvary from the Crucified,
Our life ones more awaits a fashioning hand.

And who shall say
In what fair project it may woven be?
Enough that through eternity's long day
It will be spent, my God, in serving Thee.

THE TRUTH CONCERNING RESURRECTION.—PART II.

It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. The dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.—Paul to the Corinthians.

Let us look at some of Dr. Thomas's statements. On p. 33 he renders 1 Cor. xv. 52, "The dead ones shall be rebuilt incorruptible," and points out that we have the verb anastesai but the passive voice of egeiro, which he endeavors to show can only describe something to be experienced by the righteous after they have come forth from the grave. He says, "Both the just and the unjust will stand up, but they will not stand up incorruptible; it will only be those of them who so stand up that will be incorruptible, when their rebuilding is completed in their putting on incorruptibility and life." Taking this with other statements in Anastasis, we are justified in inferring that Dr. Thomas regarded the idea underlying egeiro as expressing something to which only the just who will be immortalized will be subject. Now what is the truth of the matter? It is that egeiro and anistemi are synonyms. The latter was good enough for Christ when he said, "I will raise him up at the last day" (John vi. 40), and for Paul when, in 1 Thess. iv. 16, he wrote, "The dead in Christ shall rise first." This is equivalent to the words in 1 Cor. xv. "This dead shall be raised incorruptible." The context of the two sentences make this clear. In 1 Thess. iv., we have an intransitive verb; in 1 Cor. xv., we have a passive verb. There are two phases of one thing. The saints "raise," the saints "are raised." The act recorded is one and only one, but in the words "are raised" there is recognition of the One who raises the dead; in "raise" there is nothing expressed beyond the act of rising. It is in "being raised" (the idea conveyed by the passive of egeiro that the dead "rise" (the idea conveyed by the middle of anistemi,) and the latter expresses the experience of the righteous as well as does the former. To speak of the dead as "raising" does not exclude the "being raised," in view of the fact that the dead will not come from the dust of the earth of their own accord, but in consequence of the exercise of divine power. Dr. Thomas's remark that we do not read that the dead "stand up incorruptible" hardly needs noticing. Suffice it to say that the immortal standing-up is referred to in 1 Thess. iv. 16, and there we have anistemi. It would have surprised us to find such an expression as "stand up incorruptible," or "rise incorruptible," and we feel almost disposed now to ask what such words would mean. While it is intelligible to read that the dead "are raised incorruptible," if the intransitive verb "rise" is to be employed, we should have to express ourselves "shall rise in an incorruptible nature," or "shall rise to immortal life." We may well not find such nonsense as is suggested, in the New Testament. Verily, the expression Dr. Thomas says Paul does not use, is not in keeping with Paul's Greek. The word egeiro in the active voice, expresses the fact that God "raises" the dead; and in the passive voice, the fact that the dead "are raised"; while the word anistemi in the active voice, expresses the fact that God or Christ will "raise up" the dead; in the middle voice, the fact that the dead will "rise" or "arise."

The words were used to convey cognate ideas. In Matt. xvi. 21, we read, "the third day be shall be raised up" (the passive of egeiro); in the parallel passage in Mark viii. 31, "after three days he shall rise again" (the middle of anistemi). See also Matt. xvii. 9: "Son of man be risen from the dead" (anastee) v. 23, "shall be raised up" (egerthe); Matt. xii. 41, "shall stand up" (anastesontai), v. 42, "shall rise up" (egerthesetai); Mark xii. 18, 23, resurrection (anastasei), 25, "they shall rise" (anastosin), 26, "they are raised" (egeiresthai); Luke xxiv. 6, "he is risen" (egerthe), 7, "the third day rise again (anastenai). It were needless to multiply proofs of these words being used interchangably to indicate from different stand-points the coming to life of the dead. When Dr. Thomas makes it appear as if anastasei covers only the coming out of the ground, the putting on of immortality being expressed by egeiro, he contends without reason and in the face of indisputable facts. The idea of the verb is in the noun, and we have in this very chapter of Paul's epistle to the Corinthians proof of the "raising" expressed by egeiro, being the very thing indicated by the word anastasis rendered "resurrection." See verse 12: "If Christ be preached that he hath been raised from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" If the idea underlying the word rendered "hath been raised," is different from that underlying the word "resurrection," where is the point of Paul's question? The synonymous character of the terms is clear from what follows: "If there is no resurrection of the dead, neither hath Christ been raised; and if Christ hath not been raised, then is our preaching vain, your faith also is vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God; because we witnessed of God that he raised up Christ: whom he raised not up, if so be that the dead are not raised. For if the dead are not raised, neither hath Christ been raised; and if Christ hath not been raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ have perished." Here we have several times the verb egeiro in the passive voice, and it is made abundantly manifest that if there has been no "raising" of Christ there will be no "raising" of the dead—that if the "resurrection" of Christ is not a fact, there will be no "resurrection" of those who have fallen asleep in him. If the "raising" is not implied to the "resurrection," what is? Again, "Now hath Christ been raised from the dead, the first-fruits of them that are asleep. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." Are not the terms "been raised from the dead" and "resurrection from the dead" intimately related here? People who know what they read, would laugh at any but an affirmative answer. Yet what has Dr. Thomas written, and what is being by implication held by those who write themselves down as shut up to "the truth as finally brought to light by Dr. Thomas?" He alleged that the verb egeiro has the signification build in this chapter, and applied that meaning in the exposition of verses 42, 43, 44, 52. If he had tried it all round, he would have found out what a grievous mistake he was making. The word has no private meaning here in Paul's epistle. Its meaning is the same as in the many other places in which it appears in the New Testament. And that meaning is, as we have said, not an architectural one. Instead of rendering the word by its primary English equivalent, Dr. Thomas arbitrarily adopted a secondary signification, which proclaims its own worthlessness. Who ever heard of building wheat from seed? Who ever heard of a fair man being built up? Supposing a foreigner should ask for a definition of the English word raise, should we tell him it meant build? Decidedly not; the word does not mean build. Some one, however, may say: "I read in a newspaper of a dozen houses having recently been raised in a suburb of a certain town." Our reply is that the word raise, in such a case accommodated to a meaning secondary to its proper one; speaking of buildings, raise will convey the idea of build; but in speaking of other things—say a person lying on the ground helpless from having sustained an injury—the word has a well known simple meaning. The same with the Greek word egeiro. It means in the active voice to wake, rouse; then, to cause to rise; in the middle voice to awake or rouse up; and in the passive voice to be raised. It is used of persons waking from sleep, and being raised from death: like our word raise, it also lent itself to employment in the sense of erect or build. It was not a technical term, it does not convey that idea when [illegible] part of the subject. On one occasion, we know, Christ did: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" he made use of egeiro then, because it would serve two purposes: the Jews thought he used it as a boast of what he could do in rebuilding the temple if they would destroy it, while all the time he was properly expressing himself with reference to the temple of this body. He did not mean that he would build his body: rising from the dead and being raised from the dead do not represent or amount to a building operation, but will be effected in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, on the sounding of that trumpet that shall wake the dead. When, as we know, the Jews undertook to recite Christ's memorable words, which they implicitly applied to the temple the misrepresented Christ by employing the technical term for build: see Mark xiv. 58, in three days I will build another. Christ never said that. The word egeiro which undisputably means raise and be raised was, as we have pointed out, by Dr. Thomas said to mean build and rebuild. The thing cannot be justified. But the truth must be faced, that the proper rendering is fatal to his view of resurrection. That is no affair of ours. We are for Paul's teaching, which the ordinary translations of the New Testament set forth with abundant clearness.

Dr. Thomas also, as we have said, gave a wrong meaning to egeiro. He says, p. 36 of Anastasis: "In the active voice egeiro signifies to scatter, as when seed is cast upon the earth; but in the passive voice, it signifies to spring or be born." We assure the reader that this altogether defective statement of the facts as to this word leads to quite a false conclusion. We are willing to believe that Dr. Thomas misread his books, and so was misled. His view too might lead him to put the matter in a wrong light. He says that the verb egeiro is in vs. 42, and 43 used in the sense of spring, or be born, and that we should read: The resurrection-body springs, is sprouted, or born, in corruption: it is built, reared up, or raised, in corruption: it is sprouted in dishonor; it is reared up in glory: it is sprouted in weakness; it is built up in power: it is born (of the earth) a natural body; it is reared up (or transformed by Spirit into) a spiritual body. We have already shown that the Apostle spoke or raising and being raised, not of building or rearing up. Now, what about the sowing and being sown? Was Dr. Thomas right in saying what he did about egeiro when found in the passive mood? No; he was quite wrong. It is undeniable that when used in agricultural speech, when used respecting grain, this word means sow. It matters not whether the idea is expressed by the active or passive voice of the verb being employed; sow is the primary meaning, and only sow, and nothing but sow—the operation of putting seed into the ground. It is from this meaning that secondary significations come, but these do not include spring in the sense of sprout, or being born in the sense of springing into existence. If Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon is referred to to establish Dr. Thomas's statement, then the reference is fatal. It could only be recommended by those who cannot use that well-known treasury of Greek knowledge. That Lexicon (seventh and definitive edition; unabridged) gives the meaning as to sow (seed), and supplies classical illustrations of the use of the word in speaking of grain, the sowing being illustrated as opposed to reaping. One of the secondary senses in which the word is found is in connection with human procreation. The lexicographers set forth the word in this sense as meaning to sow (children), to engender, to beget them; and when in this sense the word is found in the passive voice the meaning is to spring; (or) be born. The spring is used in the sense of descend from, and the be born in the sense of having origin in a certain family. There is no such idea as sprouting. To say a man springs from a certain stock was expressed by the Greeks in words meaning literally that he was sown from there; and as for be born, it is the passive of beat, as begotten is the passive of beget. But the word anistemi never meant spring, or be born, when used was the subject under consideration. If it did, how is it that nothing but be sown makes sense in all other places in the New Testament where the word occurs. Let us come to the point. Anyone can decide it. Look at Matthew xiii. 17-23. Must we read spring, or be born instead of hath been sown, and was sown (four times) in this passage in which Christ explained to his disciples the parable of the sower? Again, look at Mark iv. 16-19. Must we read spring, or be born instead of is sown, hath been sown, are sown (twice), and were sown? Decidedly not. Dr. Thomas made a fatal mistake. He went wrong because he arbitrarily selected a definition of a word as set forth in a lexicon. He did not understand the book he was consulting. He erred through want of caution as well as imperfect knowledge. Then a false idea of Bible teaching on resurrection pointed the false steps. Clearly the fact that sowing of seed is referred to in the chapters quoted from Matthew and Mark excludes any secondary use of egeiro being entertained there; and if that makes our path straight in the Gospels, so it also does in chapter xv. of the first Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians. For look at verses 36, 37, and 38. What is the subject? The subject is the sowing of seed—"whoat or some other kind of grain." In another word required on this point? Now observe, in verses 42, 43, and 44, the Apostle proceeds to apply his allusion to seed-sowing, and leaves us in no doubt that the seed sown is that from which the thing produced comes, so the body that comes out of the ground at the resurrection of the saints is not the one that was put into it. Replying to the sceptical question: "How are the dead raised?" and the curious inquiry, "in what body do they come?" Paul says: "Thou foolish one, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die: and that which thou sowest, not the body that shall be, but a bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other kind; but God giveth it a body even as it pleased him, and to each seed a body of its own." He says in effect: "Where you sow seed, you do not sow that which comes out of the ground, but simply a grain; and according as the grain may be wheat or millet God gives it its proper form when it comes up. But it is first needful for the seed to die or go to corruption: unless this takes place it is not quickened or made alive in its new form. How are the dead raised? Why, they come to life through corruption. In what sort of body or nature do they come? Why, in a more glorious nature, just as the wheat in the field is more goodly than the seed put into the ground." Thus, having in verses 39, 40, and 41, shown that as all flesh is not the same flesh, and that celestial and terrestrial undowments greatly differ, while there are degrees of glory even in celestial bodies, the Apostle recurring to the subject of the sowing of seed, says: "So also is the resurrection of the dead." So, what? Why, the resurrection of the dead is like the raising of grain: "thou sowest not that body which shall be"—the body put into the ground is not the body that is raised when God shall make the dead to live. That this is what is meant is made perfectly plain by what follows; "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body." The Apostle says that, like a seed, the natural body is sown in corruption, dishonor, and weakness, but it is raised a spiritual body, incorruptible, glorious, and powerful. How are the dead brought to life, and what form will they assume? Paul has answered these questions amply. As a bare grain of corn put into the ground, through the process of corruption becomes the basis of something that was not sown but which God gives, and to each seed its proper fruition; so the lowly human form, committed to the earth undergoes corruption, and is the basis on which divine energy works to bring forth a glorious creature, each spiritual body raised being familiar to the natural body that was put in the ground; as star differs from star in glory, so also the immortal saints will not be of uniform splendor. The lowly mortal, after Adam, earthly, is "naked grain;" the glorious immortal, after Christ, heavenly, is the body which God is pleased to give. Paul takes no account of "sprouting," about which Dr. Thomas says so much. Dr. Thomas held that the emergent body would be of the same mortal and weak nature as that committed to the ground. What does Paul say? A proper understanding of the Apostle's words effectually discredit all Dr. Thomas's unfortunate arguments, built upon serious mistakes, and supported by manifold misapprehensions. Dr. Thomas's view that the saints must be judged to see whether life or death shall be awarded them doubtless necessitated his unfair treatment of 1 Cor. xv. But the New Testament takes no account of any such doctrine as the judgment of the saints at Christ's coming. With New Testament truth we are safe, and under no necessity to wrest or mangle the Scriptures.

Many have been misled by Dr. Thomas's treatment of verses 51 to 54. Both in Anastasis and Catechesis it is declared that when Paul speaks of "this mortal" putting on immortality, he says something making needful the creation again of the mortal body from the dust prior to the putting on of immortality. Is it necessary to point out that in this passage, as in many others, Paul was speaking as if the Corinthians and himself would be alive and waiting at the coming of Christ? Surely, this is obvious. Read verse 51: "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." Again, verse 52: "The dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." The Apostle distinguishes "the dead" who will rise, from "we" who are to be changed. See also 1 Thess. iv. 15, 16, 17; "We that are alive, that are left unto the coming of the Lord, shall in no wise precede them that are fallen asleep. . . The dead in Christ shall rise first: then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds," etc. As it was in Paul's day, so it is now: there are living saints and sleeping saints, and we should, in hopeful speech or writing use similar language. We may, like Paul, fall asleep. Then we shall be raised incorruptible. If we do not fall asleep, we shall be changed into incorruptible nature directly after the sleepers have been awakened. Paul says so; and we believe it. When, moreover, Dr. Thomas says "the mortal" cannot refer to dust and ashes in the grave, he perpetrates what we are compelled to term a despicable quibble. "This mortal must put on immortality," whether it be by being raised incorruptible from the grave—here it enters upon corruption, as Paul allows—or being conformed in a moment to the glorious body of Christ. Let it be observed that the class of people Paul takes account of in this chapter is "they that are Christ's at his coming" (v. 23), whether living or dead. The mystery he discloses in vv. 51-54 is: "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." It is not "in the period symbolized by the seventh trumpet." What did the Corinthians, or what did Paul know about that? Suddenly, at a given signal, and in a moment, the dead will rise to deathlessness and the living will be changed from a mortal to an immortal nature. We are for Paul and the Scriptures in preference to Dr. Thomas and Anastasis.—Jas. W. Thirtle in Truth.

Mounds in Manitoba.

A Winnepeg correspondent of the Montreal Gazette writes:

Along the banks of the Red river, between Selkirk and St. Andrews, about eighteen miles north of here, are located a number of mounds supposed to have been built by the strange race of people living in this county prior to its occupation by the modern Indians. Lately a fever struck the local archæologists, scientists and others actuated by curiosity, to burrow and uproot these sepultures of the pre-historic dead. The reward is well worth the labor. Hundreds of relics, in the shape of fish, deer, buffalo and human bones, earthenware, baked clay, stone tubes, pipes and hatchets, arrowheads of flint, quarts and granite, and sea shells, are to be found after but little search. I had the pleasure of being one of an excursion party to St. Andrews, under the auspices of the Historical Society, a few days ago, for the purpose of opening one of these celebrated mounds. Owing to a rain-storm coming on, the examination, beyond a preliminary investigation, had to be postponed until next Sunday. The result of our first search brought to light about twenty human skeletons, generally very much decayed. These were buried in all manner of positions—some kneeling, and others horizontally, with the face upward. Among the relics recovered were river clam shells, stone tubes used by medicine men pottery, buffalo and deer horns and charred remains of bones and wood. The age of this mound dates back probably to the first period of man's geological history. All the indications of the deposits belonging to the "stone age" are present—the arrow-heads, pestles, flint chips, bored teeth, earthenware graven with grotesque figures and designs, and bones broken to get the marrow out for food. As some indication of it age, we found the roots of oak trees, penetrating six feet down, lapping around the bones and skulls. These strange people, who lived in so primitive a fashion, shaping their rude instruments of war and peace from flint and bone, following simple customs of home life and religion, and burying their dead in peculiar positions, no doubt settled on the Red river on account of the excellent fishing afforded there at that time. A few days ago Mr. C. N. Bell, of this city, discovered the site of what was probably once a sort of a factory where mound-builders made their stone implements and pottery. He scoured nearly two hundred flint and other hard stone points for arrows, and lances, stone hammers and hatchets, shell beads and thirty-seven specimens of earthen vessels, peculiarly indented and marked in fantastic designs. The supposition is that there were artisans among these strange people, who used to devote their time specially to the fashioning of these implements for the purpose of exchange with those who fished and hunted. The investigations made in other parts of America tend to indorse this supposition, and there is every reason to believe that certain members of this community followed the trade of manufacturing articles in stone.

Respectable Sins.

Beware of respectable sins! Not that any sin, however garishly arrayed or socially dignified, is in itself respectable; but that some sins are so countenanced by certain classes that they are held to be respectable. Mrs Browning spoke truly when, with epigrammatic force, she said: "The devil is most devilish when respectable," because he is then most dangerous. His seeming respectability throws unwary souls off their guard and beguiles them by begetting the thought that their objection to certain profitable or delightful courses of conduct is based, not on reason or on Scripture rationally interpreted, but on a squeamish or morbid conscientiousness. Hence, for example, when young men see social honors paid to richer financiers whose overflowing coffers were filled by means of transactions which involved lying, deception, and speculative trickery, they are disposed to think such dishonest practices are not so bad as they have been taught to believe. So when members of churches drink wine, play cards, visit skating rinks, or indulge in any other ungodly practices, they throw the cloak of their respectability over deeds which are in themselves injurious both to the moral and spiritual life. Thus they enable the devil to do his most devilish work of luring young and feeble souls into the pit of destruction. How needful, then, is the caution—Beware of respectable sins! for beneath the masks they wear, is the grinning head of death, yea, of that "second death," from which no resurrection unto life is possible. Beware, therefore, of respectable sins!—Zion's Herald.

Practical Religion.

A good lady employed a deacon of one of our Baptist churches to do some carpenter's work which amounted to quite a large sum of money; and she said, when speaking of the job, "I would just as soon hear Deacon——pray now as I would have before he did that piece of work for me." That's it! We want deacons and all other members of the churches to do in all business relations just that which is right. We believe in a practical religion. Spurgeon asked a young girl, who served as a domestic in one of his families, when she presented herself for membership in his church, what evidence she could give of having become a Christian, and she meekly answered, "I now sweep under the mats." And the renowned preacher said it was good evidence, and we agree with him. Real religion leads one to do work thoroughly.—The Presbyterian.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:
THE RESTITUTION addresses [scriptural] "restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the eternal destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Job's Hope of a Resurrection.

The subject of my remarks is suggested by the rendering of Job. xix. 25-27, which is given in the Revised Version of the Bible.

There are many people interested in the Revised Version of the Scriptures, but from very different motives. You will find a great many whose interest goes no further than this:—they like to see in what way certain words have been rendered; it is merely a grammatical interest they have in the new rendering. This, in its way, is not without importance, as the Bible occupies a very important position in respect to the English language; it is the standard of pure English. Again, there are others who look at the new translation in order to pick faults, and they are like a skeptical friend who was once corresponding with me. He was writing to me about the supposed infallible Bible, and he wrote—"One day I was passing a bookstall, and I happened to pick up a copy of a Bible there, and I saw on the title-page, 'Holy Bible, with 20,000 amendations: this is your infallible Bible." But an objection of this sort is very little weight to any one who knows anything about the matter. The Scriptures were not written in English; they are a translation, and I need scarcely remind you, what is no doubt known to most, that suppose you give a work to half-a-dozen men to translate, although they might all have a perfect knowledge of the original language, they would not produce the same translation. In fact, if I sat down to translate a work to-day, and returning a week after, translated it again, there would very likely be variations between my first and second renderings. So that any objection urged against the authenticity of the Bible on the ground of these amendations can have no foundation whatever.

There are many ways of attacking the Bible besides impugning its authenticity. One of these is to put on an appearance of learning and to urge critical objections to what is in the Book itself. Now, I wish to refer to one, somewhat of this kind, which I noticed in the Scotsman in connection with Job. xix., and in the famous verses in which occurs the expression of Job's hope:—"I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another, though my reins be consumed within me." The Revised Version reads as follows, viz.:—"But I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand up at the last upon the earth; and after my skin hath been thus destroyed, yet from my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another. My reins are consumed within me."

Now, the criticism which appeared in the Scotsman regarding this was as follows:—"It is true that they have altered considerably the important passage in Job xix. 26, which has long been a monument of absurd, immature, and conjectural amendment of our forefathers, which now reads, 'I know my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand up at the last upon the earth; and after my skin hath been thus destroyed, yet from my flesh shall I see God.' Here the reference to the last day has departed; the interpolated 'worms' disappear, and its reference to the resurrection is gone, and it makes the passage only point to Job's vindication by the Goel or Avenger, after his bodily troubles have ceased. But why is the word 'Redeemer' retained, and why is the better though imperfect alternative, 'Vindicator', placed in the margin?"

You see there is a very serious implication here, that the passage we have all along taken as referring to Job's hope of a future life has been misapplied. It is said that its reference to the resurrection is gone. Now, you know there are only two classes of people that are infallible—those are the newspaper critics and the Pope; but if you look at them closely you will see they are ordinary mortals after all, and just as we doubt the assumptions of the Pope, so may we call in question the dictum of a newspaper critic. Let us, however, judge this on its merits; it may be that we have look[ed] at this passage in a false light, and its true meaning may not coincide with the opinions we have had; but, if this does not refer to the resurrection, then by all means let us not apply it to that event any longer.

Let us take up the ground that is indicated. The word "worms" does not appear in the Revised Version at all, but it is evident that nothing essential is thereby affected. The critic says that the word "Redeemer" ought not to be in the text, but rather the word we find in the margin—the word "Vindicator." As was read in the passage from the Scotsman, the Hebrew word is "Goel" or Avenger: but this word is translated both "Avenger" and "Redeemer." Well, what was the Avenger or Vindicator which this man contends for? If you look at the second last chapter of Numbers, you will see what the office of the Avenger was, it is the same Hebrew word, Goel. This chapter (the 35th) is entirely taken up with laws regarding murders, and the punishment of murderers, and the privileges extended to those who may have committed murder unintentionally. Read from the 18th verse—"If he smite him with a hand weapon of wood, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death. The avenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer: when he meeteth him, he shall slay him." The "Avenger of blood" is the same word as you read in Job, the "Redeemer." You will find the term the "Avenger of blood" occurs several times in this chapter. It was the office of the nearest relation to avenge the blood of the slain, and now, says our critic, that is the idea which ought to be applied to the passage in Job. Apply it, and see what it does. Is there anything in the history of Job to justify it? Did any Vindicator stand up for Job? The history does not indicate that anything of that sort happened; why then supply the idea? If the passage does not apply to the resurrection, we are compelled to refer it to some event in Job's life, and the Scripture narrative does not supply the blank. Tested in this way—and I think it a most reasonable test—the plea which this man puts forward falls to the ground.

The word "Redeemer" which is retained in this revised version is objected to as not being so suitable to the sense of the passage as the word "Vindicator." Let us see. To redeem is to buy back; that is the primary meaning of the word. It also has a further sense, of rescuing, restoring, delivering. If you wish to see what the primary idea attached to redeeming is, you will find it in Leviticus xxv., where it is applied to the redemption of a field (vs. 25 and 26). Now, his kinsman here is his "Goel"—his redeemer. It was the duty of the nearest relative to buy back the property which was alienated through poverty or otherwise. That was the original idea of redeeming: but it is applied in a much wider and secondary sense in other passages of Scripture. For example, in connection with the exodus from Egypt we read in Exodus vi. 6—"Wherefore say unto the children of Israel, I am the Lord, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem you with a stretched out arm, and with great judgment." This again is the idea, the secondary meaning, of rescuing, delivering: "I will deliver you from Egypt." And this is also used times without number in the prophets. For example, in Isaiah xliv. 22, speaking, I believe, regarding the yet future return of Israel and the mercy which shall be shown to that house, we read:—"Thus saith the Lord, thy Redeemer, and he that formed thee from the womb, I am the Lord that maketh all things." He calls himself further (in Isa. liv. 5 and 8), "thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel."

Now, is there anything unnatural in our applying this sense of the word "Redeemer" in the passage referred to in Job? I think not. Nay, we are compelled by circumstances in Job's life to apply it in that way, because although God restored to him prosperity, although he became increased with cattle and flocks at a later time, and his latter prosperity was greater than the first, it was not because any human relative bought back his possessions, but simply because God prospered him: as he looked for some one to stand up on earth, however, the reference is to a time that is yet to come, when Job shall have his reward.

It is true that the word "worms" does not occur in the Revised Version; but as I have said, it is not absolutely essential to the idea we have had of the passage, supposing it does refer to that great event, the resurrection. Job saw no Redeemer such as his words imply—what was then his expectation? I think that, after all, our ideas in regard to this passage are more natural than those which are sought to be imported into it by the critic I have referred to.

Job was not in the dark regarding the future. We are accustomed to think that the patriarchs did not know very much, and perhaps we carry this a little too far. In Hebrews xi., we have a list of men and women of whom the world was not worthy, who endured much that they might obtain "a better resurrection." Was Job ignorant of these things? I think not. He looked forward to the realisation of that great hope; we do not know what he may have known of the promises to Israel, but he looked for the restoring from the dead. He knew and acknowledged that the affliction that had come upon him was because the hand of God had come upon him, as we read—"have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends; for the hand of God hath touched me," (xix. 21). He recognized that it was from him that those things came, and he looked forward to the morning when weeping will be ended. "Weeping may endure for the night, but joy cometh in the morning." "The triumph of the wicked is short, and the joy of the ungodly is but for a moment." He was like Socrates the heathen philosopher who, when conscious that he was on his deathbed, said—"I have a hope that there is something remaining for the dead; that it will then be better for good than for bad men." Even a heathen philosopher was able to say that, having spelt out a dim hope, by the aid of his consciousness and reason. But Job approached more to what is really the Scriptural hope—he looked for the second coming of the Christ; his salvation and hope were bound up in him. It was a personal Redeemer he looked for.

In this connection I think there is one feature worthy of consideration. It was the duty of the kinsman to become the redeemer, the nearest relative was the redeemer. You remember in the case of Ruth, as instructed by Naomi, she applied to Boaz as her nearest kinsman. But he said, "there is a nearer relative than I am, it is his duty;" but he refused, and so Boaz did it himself. Now it is worthy of being borne in mind that Christ became one of us in order that he might become our Redeemer; he is our elder brother; he became flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone in order that he might "redeem" us, and so we read in Eph. i. 13-14, that we are sealed with the Spirit of promise until the "redemption" of the purchased possession.

He is not only our Redeemer individually, from sin and the power of death, but he also has redeemed the world to Himself by his blood. Job, I believe, looked forward to that great fact, that the valley of the tomb is now lightened by hope; that although we go down to the tomb, yet it is not an end to our existence, but that we shall come forth at the call of Him, who is the Life, radiant with beauty and clothed with immortality. It is, I believe, the same truth which was beautifully depicted by Victor Hugo the other day before his death, when he said; "The tomb is not a blind alley, it is a thoroughfare; it closes with the twilight, to open with the dawn:"—a beautiful thought, and a deep truth. It will open in the glorious morning which shall broaden out into that perfect and eternal day whose brightness shall never be dimmed by the advent of night. We hear the voice of the Lord saying to us,—"Because I live, ye shall live also." I rejoice to think that Job's Redeemer is our Redeemer, and that we have the same hope before us. God knows those that are his, and it is comforting to know that not one of them shall be forgotten in that day when the call goes forth to the grave to give up its dead. Then will Job see his Redeemer and rejoice in his salvation; and then may we also stand before him, victors over the tomb.

"Jesus lives! no longer now
Can thy terrors, death, appal us:
Jesus lives! by this we know,
Thou, O grave, canst not enthral us."

THE TRUTH CONCERNING RESURRECTION.—PART III.

First the dead in Christ shall rise: then we that are alive shall, together with them, be caught up into the air in clouds, to meet the Lord.—Paul to the Thessalonians.

In the well known passage 1 Thess. iv. 13-17, we have not only information as to the resurrection of the sleeping saints and the changing of the living into the divine nature, but also as to the gathering of the saints unto Christ at his coming (2 Thess. ii. 1). For the comfort and consolation of those to whom he wrote, the Apostle disclosed, "by command of the Lord," the programme as to the appearing of Christ and the great things to take place thereupon, so far as those things relate to the saints. As the unrighteous are not brought from the grave at Christ's coming, Paul takes no account of them: he confines himself to the case of those who shall be "ever with the Lord." Paul regarded it as not proper that the Thessalonians to whom he was writing should sorrow concerning the dead, as others did, people without hope. He proceeds to show why they should not grieve, introducing his remarks by the "For"—of reason (ver. 14). If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so we believe that through Jesus God will, with him, bring from the dead those who sleep, even the dead in Christ. Those who suffer with Christ and die with him, shall rise with him and live with him. The "with" implies likeness of doing or suffering, as in Rom. vi. 5, 7, 8, 9; 2 Cor. iv. 14; xiii. 4; Galatians iii. 9; Col. ii. 13, 20. In continuing, Paul begins ver. 15 by another "For," assigning reason, and in effect he says that those saints who are living at the time of Christ's coming—his "presence"—will not have any advantage of those that have fallen asleep. These are the facts Paul had to communicate: from them we might infer that the dead would raise before the living could be introduced to the presence of Christ. "The sleepers will be awakened and so be on an equal footing with them living when Christ come." But going on to give details, Paul begins verse 16 with ore (because). In effect he says, "Now this is what will happen; and how it will be done. The Lord himself—with a shout, with archangel's voice, with God's trumpet—will descend from heaven, and the dead in Christ will rise before anything else takes place. Then we the living, they that are left over, together with them, shall be caught up into the air in clouds, to meet the Lord." Paul winds up by observing that that meeting having been brought about, the permanent companionship of Christ will be enjoyed by the saints. The language of these verses is obviously literal. If these verses are not literal, then where are there any that are? There is no doubt about the meaning of the words employed. As in ancient times God made clouds serve for chariots, so he will again. And as to the air, we know what is meant by being snatched away into the air. Dr. Thomas was in great straits with this verse, and regarded it as one of those things of Paul's writings "hard to be understood." In Eureka i. p. 145, he wrote: "Instead of 'caught up in the clouds' we read 'hurried off in the clouds:' so that clouds of saints, by almighty power, will be removed from the east, west, north, and south, where they have been resurrected, 'for a meeting of the Lord' in the territory of his kingdom, the Holy Land." On p. 63 of the same volume we find "exalted to the aerial," and elsewhere we have "political aerial," whatever those expressions may signify. Paul wrote no such nonsense. "Caught up in clouds to meet the Lord in the air" is plain, and it well represents the Apostle's very words. As for the word ἀέριος, it means actual clouds, and must not be confused with αἰών, which is found in Hebrews xii. 1. Dr. Thomas did so confuse it, unfortunately. This passage and 1 Cor. xv. are in perfect harmony. In the latter, at the time of Christ's coming, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, the dead shall be raised incorruptible," and the living saints "will be changed" to the same nature. Here, at the time of Christ's descent from heaven, there is "a shout, an archangel's call, and a divine trumpet summons," whereupon the "dead rise, and together with the living are caught up" to the retinue of the returning Christ. The changing is a conforming of the weak and mortal body to a likeness with the glorious and immortal body of Christ (Phil. iii. 20, 21.

Blessed and Holy is he that hath part in the First Resurrection.—John, in the Apocalypse.

As to Rev. xx. 6, we may in just a few words say that that treatment which, after giving sundry definitions of the word μέρος (part), says the unjust rise at the coming of Christ but have no "portion," is a fallacious one, for the scheme involved really requires that we should read "have part" at the time of, or out of, or after, "the first resurrection." What does John write? He tells us he saw thrones, which were occupied by persons exercising judicial functions. Among the occupants he espied those who had been beheaded through bearing testimony to Jesus and keeping God's commandments, and who had not worshipped the beast nor his image, nor received his mark on the forehead or the hand: they had come to life, and they reigned with Christ a thousand years. John goes on to say that the rest of the dead—those who did not come to life and reign with Christ a thousand years—were not raised until after the expiry of the thousand years. With reference to those who lived and reigned, he says: "This is the first resurrection." The first—that interpretation which would obliterate the word "first" by rendering "chief" is a false one—resurrection implies a second, and John tells us of the second, and those who rise then are referred to as "the rest of the dead." The "first resurrection" is made up of "those that are Christ's at his coming," "the dead in Christ," who rise as Christ approaches the earth. This is, in the words of Christ, "the resurrection of the just," the "coming forth into a resurrection of life." "The rest of the dead" are judged every man according to his works." There is not a word about those that "lived and reigned" having been judged. There will never, if revelation is to be trusted, be such an inquisition as Dr. Thomas conceived, and therefore John saw no such thing in his vision. Of those who live and reign, John writes: "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: over these the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God, and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." Is not this plain? All sharers in the first resurrection are blessed. There is no mention of any coming in for a "portion" or "share" at the time of the resurrection, but we just read that all participators in that resurrection are blessed and holy. They live and reign: to do that they must be holy and they certainly are blessed. Let no words be put in Rev. xx. 5, 6, to nullify what is clear. Take chap. xxi. 6, and explain the expression "have part in" is appearing there, in the same way as the expression is explained away in Twelve Lectures and Christendom Astray!

A MISTRANSLATION PERSISTENTLY REPEATED: 2 Cor. v. 10.

Dr. Thomas was compelled to mistranslate 2 Cor. v. 10. On p. 31 of Anastasis it is represented that Paul wrote that everyone shall "receive the things through the body, according to what he hath done," etc. Need it be pointed out that what Paul wrote was that everyone will receive according to "the things done through the body." This verse is persistently misquoted in Twelve Lectures and Christendom Astray as "receive in body." Paul said nothing about "such works, such a body," or "a body according to, or in keeping with, the character of your works." Christ's own friends, when immortalized, will receive reward from him according as they have done while in the body—while on probation—every man according to his work, according to how he has labored or built on the good foundation, whether wood, hay, or stubble, or gold, silver, and precious stones. A serviceable knowledge of Greek grammar would have prevented the perpetration of this false rendering, even although an unscriptural view of the resurrection might have suggested it on a superficial examination of the passage as appearing with italics in the Authorized Version. There is nothing said of "receiving through the body," but we read of receiving in respect of things "done through the body"—while in the body.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

In conclusion, we warn the reader of these hurriedly-written pages to be on his guard, and see that those who contend for "mortal emergence" do not with words rather than Scripture testimonies enlist his sympathies with a manifestly false doctrine. It is because that doctrine seems to outrage no sense of what men regard as right that it has been received and held by thousands; but the fact that it distinctly outrages Scripture teaching ought to be enough to decide us against it. No judgment stands between the saints and life, any more than judgment stood between their Captain and life. As was the case with Christ, so it will be with them; if they are to be children of the resurrection, their resurrection will be to life, not to a mortal state in order to preliminary judgment. It may as well be added that those who decide against the view set forth in these pages—against the view of the New Testament, as cannot be denied—will so decide simply because Dr. Thomas held the opposite view, and will by implication endorse all his mistakes. Their work is then cut out. Let them show that the Scriptures teach what they hold. If the English New Testament does not, then we will take them on the original, considering the attainment of the truth as the first and foremost thing. Meanwhile, we say that the sense of the original on this subject is well before us in the common translations, and hast is the Revised Version. Readers are also warned against arguments founded on parables, from which more is extracted than they were intended to teach. Then again, a beginning at Matt. xxv. 31-46, will not do. That brings before us a judgment of the nations at the coming of Christ, and the standard by which they are judged is how they have treated his "brethren." Nothing about resurrection; nothing about the duties of the saints. It is an ἀσσὲ that will sit when Christ comes. Matt. xxv. 1-13, is a parable concerning the saints, and its moral is "watch." There is amply sufficient "motive" there. "Be ready continually," so that you may be "taken" and not "left." That is as effective as any fear of judgment. "Motive," arising from error as to resurrection and judgment, is no more required than motive from "fear of hell," as that fear is expounded by orthodox horrifiers. See the Revised Version on 2 Tim. iv. 1, which is often misquoted, and be assured that when Dr. Thomas expounded John xx. 17, as recording an "ascent to the Divine nature," he was misrepresenting John. An actual ascent to the Father is referred to, and putting several testimonies together, we have grounds for inferring that Christ did ascend to and receive a commission direct from the Father before meeting with his disciples that very evening. "If exaltation to a superior nature" were intended, it would have been expressed. Christ had already risen to immortality. Then bear in mind that those who crucify the Son of God afresh, those who do not abide in the Vine, are no longer "in Christ," and will not be raised at Christ's coming. They will not be raised until "the rest of the dead" come forth. Finally, we assure the reader—and now we can do no more—that the view here set forth and defended finds all Scripture statements on, and references to resurrection, in harmony with it. We may have opportunity of justifying our assurance. As for "mortal emergence," the New Testament must be re-written with a view to exhibiting it, before it will be possible to find it there.—Jas. W. Thirtle in Truth.

A Moment Tells on Eternity.

Rehoboam's decision, taken in a moment (1 Kings xii. 13), produced results which lasted for centuries. When, in his secret heart, he said "Yes" to the advice of the young men, the deed was done and the seed sown. All the rest of his life he was reaping. How many are the illustrations of this all around us. Take the physical world, and see how it stands. You fall on the ice, and in one instant you are crippled for life. One overdose of camphor, and you are a confirmed and tormented dyspeptic. One heavy cold, and rheumatism never lets you go again. One blow in the eye, and the sight is forever extinguished. So, too, other departments of life. The one mistake in business never ceases to hamper the foolish man. Or, the one Sunday excursion proves but the entering wedge, which soon splits open all the man's reverence for the Sabbath, for the Bible, for prayer, for all religion: The seed sown grows and grows and grows, and this tree of evil overshadows the whole life. Men ask, "Does eternity depend on time?" We answer emphatically, "Yes, it does." One choice, with its consequent train of choices, does divide every man's eternity. Is not this cruel? No! Because one good choice with its consequent train of choices may bring eternal joy. And every man has his choice. "Well, how about the heathen?" says the scholar. My friend, never mind about the heathen. I have had men, born heathen, in my Sunday school, who were in the kingdom before many in the school, born in a Christian land. God will care for the heathen; for the Judge of all the earth will do right. You care for yourself, and see to it that, while you waste time debating the question of the heathen, your own soul is not lost. Remember that, while time is short, eternity is long, and that our use of time decides our fate in eternity.—A. F. Schauffler, in S. S. Times.

I am here on a visit to my daughter, Mrs. W. Williams, once more. Find herein one dollar to renew her subscription. I was surprised to see the notice of Bro. Magruder's death. I did not know he had been so long in feeble health. He was about one year younger than I am. I met him at the Conference in Baltimore in 1876, and could not but be impressed that he was one of the excellent of earth. We shall miss him as an able witness for the truth. He rests in peace, and we need not sorrow as those without hope. I feel old and infirm, and may fall under the power of death soon, but I have no fears, because our beloved Master has triumphed over death, and lives to die no more, and has promised to raise up his children at the last day, when he comes. Blessed day, may it soon come. LEONARD ADAMS.

Announcements.

The First Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana, will be held at Plymouth, Ind., commencing Friday, Nov. 13, 1885, and continue over the following Sunday. Brethren, this is your meeting. The friends in Plymouth can entertain all who will come, and are anxious to see a good number present. Let us have a representation from every church in the State, and let the brethren who are isolated come to this meeting and join in the feast of good things the Lord has provided us. If those who cannot attend would write a short letter, telling of the cause of Christ in their locality, of their faith and hope in the promises of God, it would encourage those fortunate enough to be able to attend. Take the matter in hand, brethren, and let us have one more good meeting. The Annual Meeting of the Publishing Association will be held in connection with this Conference.

THROUGH indisposition from a cold we give little editorial matter this week.

BROTHER E. Hoyt, of Grand Rapids, Mich., states that on account of sickness there will be no Conference at Raisin Center, Mich., this fall.

BROTHER and Sister Woodward were at Mentone, Kosciusko Co., conducting meetings last week. From what we could learn there was a good attendance in numbers, and the prospects flattering to still continue their efforts.

WHILE warlike preparations are being made by the different European Powers—both large and small—for contingencies, there has, as yet, been no clash of arms. It seems the first appeal will be made to diplomacy to bring about some kind of an adjustment. The Chicago Journal makes the following comments on the present situation:—

Neither England nor France is just now prepared to take an active part in European affairs. France has just emerged from an election that shook the Republican Government to its foundations, and England is in the midst of the most exciting election campaign that it has witnessed in generations, with something like an alarming degree of uncertainty as to the outcome. A country that has just escaped a revolution, and a country on the verge of one are not in a situation to look after the affairs of their neighbors. This will leave the whole responsibility of managing Europe on the shoulders of the three Emperors, and they are not at all unwilling to assume it.

FROM H. L. Hastings we have received Nos. 16 and 17 of "The Anti-Infidel Library." The title of the first is "Israel's Messiah," and of the second, "Israel's Greatest Prophet." Both these are instructive pamphlets, issued in neat style, at five cents each.

FROM the Messrs Harper we received a copy of their Journal for Young People, which is wholly of a literary character well adapted to entertain and instruct the class of readers for which it is designed. A large weekly at $2.00 a year.

While a large body of workmen were engaged in taking out stone the quarries suddenly caved in, destroying a village situated on the ground above the stone pits, and killing a large number of persons. Many are buried in the ruins, and it is doubtful if any can be rescued in time to save their lives. Troops were sent to the scene of disaster to engage in the work of relief.

The Russians have made Jericho a delightful winter resort, and the injunction to go thither is no longer disrespectful. The beautiful spot, around which cluster some of the most sacred associations of the Christian world, will probably become a fashionable watering place if access to it is facilitated by the opening of the proposed railway route between England and India, through Northern Africa from Tangier to Cairo, and thence along the Euphrates valley and the shore of the Persian Gulf, quick trains covering the distance between London and Bombay in nine days.—*Paterson (N. The last step in making both sides of Niagara Falls free to the public will soon be taken. The commissioners appointed, under the act of the Ontario Legislature, to make arrangements for opening a park on the Canada side of the Falls have decided to buy 118 acres of land for the purpose extending about two and a half miles along the western bank of the river, reaching to the head of the rapids. Several islands will be included in the park. An appraisal of the land is to be made at once and the work of making the park will soon begin.

THE RABINOWITZ MOVEMENT.

The Jewish-Christian movement in Southern Russia, under the leadership of Joseph Rabinowitz, continues to make progress. The material condition of the Jews in Russia, according to the original thirteen theses of the society, cannot be improved unless it is preceded by an improvement of the moral and spiritual status of the people. "In order to bring to rights the moral condition there is need," they say, "of deep-seated renewing of a spiritual regeneration. We must throw away our idols, the love of money as such, and in its place must make at home in our hearts the love of truth as such and the fear of evil as such." Another of the theses says it is vain to seek a refuge by emigration to the land of Israel. Jesus of Nazareth is proclaimed in the document to be the only helper and physician capable of effecting the regeneration that is needed.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JUBILEE.

The Queen of England will, if spared, enter her year of jubilee in June next. Lord Brayo suggests that for celebrating such an event long preparations should be made throughout the empire. He says that when George III. entered the fiftieth year of his reign debtors were freed from prison, processions, attended by the king in person, were made to St. Paul's, and the celebration was renewed with extraordinary splendor in India the following year. He adds, "Next year will be the 300th anniversary of the condemnation to death of Queen Mary Stuart by the last of our English Sovereigns—Elizabeth. Since Elizabeth no monarch of purely English blood has occupied the English throne; while, on the other hand, the line of Mary Stuart has never ceased to be sovereign until it has become most precious to us in the person of that great woman and great ruler, our present Queen."

BALLOONING.

Alfred E. Moore, of Winsted, Conn., made a forty-six mile journey in thirty-five minutes in a balloon, the 24th of September. The trip was made at an average of 6,000 feet above the earth, and from this altitude, he could see the cities of Hartford, New London, New York, New Haven, and Bridgeport, like mere dots, through the glass. In speaking of his experience, he said: "Balloons in descending, frighten the crows and poultry terribly. Going over farm-houses, I never heard such a racket in my life. When you are far up and above the clouds, the awful silence is terrible. You can hear the watch tick in your pocket, and the snapping of a straw hat will make you start. The rushing of blood through your whole body is an experience you wouldn't care to have lost. There is no sensation of moving along, when, perhaps, you are going at the rate of a mile a minute, and everything is as still as death."

NIAGARA FALLS RECEDING.

The new surveys of Niagara Falls have led to a revision of Sir Charles Lyell's estimate that they had been thirty-five thousand years in cutting the gorge back to the point at which they now fall over the face of the cliff. It appears that the Canadian Falls cut back about 4½ feet per annum, while the American Falls, with a smaller volume of water, carry on the erosion at a rate of less than one foot per annum. Estimating from this data ten thousand years seem sufficient to account for the erosion, and it is not improbable that the wearing away was done more quickly in earlier times than at present. The present rate of erosion is definitely known from surveys made in 1842, 1875 and 1883, but the difficulty is to tell what conditions existed thousands of years ago that may have modified the rate of erosion.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A CHILD CARRIED OFF BY AN EAGLE.

A dispatch from Toronto says that on Saturday evening, while the wife of Jean Baptiste Romilly was feeding her fowls, near the village of St. Vincent de Paul, a large eagle swooped down and bore off her two year-old child in its talons. The neighbors turned out with shot-guns, but the eagle got to the top of a barn a mile distant, and was seen to strike the child's head several times with its beak. By this time the bird was frightened away, and the child's body recovered. Life was extinct, a hole having been made in its skull and a portion of the brain devoured.

BEAU NASH AND JOHN WESLEY.

Beau Nash ruled as king and master of ceremonies. Established rules were not permitted to be broken by royalty, and his authority extended to buildings, charities, streets, and town at large, as well as to the baths. The immense assembly-room was filled nightly with the votaries of mirth. Fun and frolic held high revel. The Bathonian King lived in splendor. When he appeared in public it was in a chariot drawn by six grey horses, accompanied by a retinue of attendants on foot and on horse, bearing French horns and other instruments of music. The vain Nash was arrayed in lace and costly apparel. One recalls the itinerant Wesley, amid his world-parish wanderings, eternity written on his brow, this world no place for trifling, coming to riotous Bath complaining how hard it is to make the gospel simple enough for the rich and great. Meeting the lordly Nash on the narrow street, the King of Bath, disdainfully says: "I never give the wall to a fool," Mr. Wesley blandly saying, "I always do," as he turned aside. Beau Nash died in 1761. A bust and portrait preserve his memory and his mien. He died in old age, forsaken and derided.

Those Clever Greeks.

If a tapering monument, like that on Bunker Hill or like the obelisk in Central Park, were made with perfectly straight sides it would look to us—for, you see, we really cannot trust our own eyes—as if it were hollowed in a little, or, as we should say in a more scientific language, its sides would appear concave. Those clever Greeks, who did so many marvellous things in art, thought all this out, and made their architecture upon principles so subtle and so comprehensive that we have never been able to improve on them since. They found that their beautiful Doric columns, if made with straight sides, had the concave effect of which I have spoken; and so, with the most delicate art in the world, they made the pillar swell a little at the middle, and then it appeared exactly right. This swelling of the column at its middle was called entasis. Of course it had to be calculated with the greatest nicety, and was naturally so very slight that it can only be detected by delicate measurements; but it added greatly to the beauty of the columns and to their effectiveness. Then the lines which were to look horizontal had to receive attention. If you look at a long perfectly level line, as the edge of a roof, for instance, it has the appearance of sagging towards the middle. The Greek architect corrected this fault by making his lines rise a little. The front of the Parthenon, at Athens, is 101 feet 8½ inches long, and in this the rise from the horizontal is about 2½ inches. In other words, there is a curvature upward that makes it a little more than two inches higher in the center than at the ends, and the effect of this swelling upward is to make the lines appear perfectly level. Indeed, this same Parthenon—the most beautiful building in the world—when delicately and carefully measured was found to be everywhere made a little incorrect, so that it may appear right, which is certainly what may be called an architectural paradox. The graceful columns, which seem to stand so straight, are made to lean inward a little, since if they were perfectly true and plumb they would have the effect of leaning outward. The pillars at the corners slant inward more than the others, and everywhere the corners are made to look square by being in truth a little broader angled, and the lines are curved in order that they shall appear straight to the eye.—St. Nicholas.

Value of Religion.

The worst kind of religion is no religion at all; and those men, living in ease and luxury, indulging themselves in the "amusement of going without religion," may be thankful that they live in lands where the gospel they neglect has tamed the beastliness and ferocity of the men who but for Christianity might long ago have eaten their carcasses like the South Sea Islanders, or cut off their heads and tanned their hides like the monsters of the French revolution. When the microscopic search of scepticism, which had hunted the heavens and sounded the seas to disprove the existence of a Creator, has turned its attention to human society, and has found a place on this planet ten miles square where a decent man can live in decency, comfort and security, supporting and educating his children unspoiled and unpolluted; a place where age is reverenced, infancy respected, manhood respected, womanhood honored, and human life held in due regard; when sceptics can find such a place ten miles square on this globe, where the gospel of Christ has not gone and cleared the way and laid the foundations and made decency and security possible, it will then be in order for the sceptical literati to move hither and then ventilate their views. But so long as these men are dependent upon the religion which they discard for every privilege they enjoy, they may well hesitate a little before they seek to rob the Christian of his hope and humanity of its faith in that Savior who alone has given to man that hope of life eternal which makes life tolerable and society possible, and robs death of its terrors and the grave of its gloom.—James Russell Lowell.

BAGDAD.

A city of over one hundred thousand inhabitants, with no place of public resort, where every house resembles a fortress or a prison, the ponderous doors opening upon narrow, gloomy lanes winding between grim, bare walls, and creaking heavily on their hinges, to reveal the low, dark, vaulted entrance that leads to the courtyard inside, sometimes picturesque enough with pillared verandas and arabesque lattices, but always rambling, uncomfortable, inconvenient, uncared for, to English ideas of what a man's home should be—a city where the luxury of a wheeled conveyance is unknown; for who could drive anything that goes on wheels in lanes six feet wide that twist round every house corner, and where the mud lies ankle-deep in winter and dust darkens the air in summer? A city through the midst of which flows a mighty river, on which the traffic is carried against wind and stream by men harnessed like beasts, on which the only native boats for pleasure or profit are on the same model and no better in construction than the coracle of the ancient Briton, on which foreign enterprise has placed steamers which have to contend against every device and delay known to the crafty Ottoman. A city unrivalled for position and fertility of soil, environed by desert which might be made to blossom as the rose, the centre of trade for a whole continent, yet sunk in decay and poverty where 80,000 Jews contend in a struggle for existence, with twice as many others. Orientals not less supple, wily, patient, and persevering than themselves, in a city where poverty and oppression have sharpened every man's wits. A city that might sit enthroned as a queen upon the waters, heir and daughter of mighty Babylon and the later splendors of Madain, Seleucia, and Ctesiphon, now grovelling in the dust amid the ruins of a long forgotten former glory. Such is Bagdad of to-day, the city of Haroun-al-Rashid, the familiar home of Sinbad the Sailor and the other worthies of the "Arabian Nights."—Saturday Review.

Egypt and Babylon.

The ultimate fates of Egypt and Babylon, as represented to us in the Scriptures, offer a remarkable contrast. Babylon is to become heaps' (Jer. l, 37); to be 'wholly desolate' (Jb. l. 13); 'not to be inhabited' (Isa. xiii. 20). Egypt is to be 'a base kingdom' (Ezekiel xxix. 14); 'the basest of the kingdoms' (Ib. verse 15); but still to remain a kingdom. It is not 'to exalt itself any more above the nations;' it is to be 'diminished;' it is no more to have any rule over the nations, (Ib.), or to be 'the confidence of the house of Israel.' But it is to maintain a certain position among the powers of the earth, a certain separateness, a certain low consideration. Now this is exactly what has been the general position of Egypt from her conquest by Cambyses until the present day. . . . A veil hangs over the future; but so far as human sagacity can forecast, there seems to be little likelihood of any vital change in her condition. With peculiar characteristics and an isolated position, she must almost of necessity maintain her separate and distinct individuality, even though she becomes a dependency on a European power. On the other hand, she has exhibited under recent circumstances no elements of greatness, and remains emphatically 'a base kingdom'—if not even 'the basest of the kingdoms.' There seem to be no elements out of which her revival and reconstitution as a great kingdom could be possible.—Rawlinson.

The Feverish Hand.

It was Monday morning, and a rainy one at that. "Mother" was busy from the moment she sprang out of bed, at the first sound of the rising bell. Others besides children get out of bed "on the wrong side," as this mother can testify. She began by thinking over all what lay before her. It made her "feel like flying." Bridget would be cross, as it was rainy; there was a chance of company for lunch, so the parlor must be tidied, as well as dining-room swept, dishes washed, lamps trimmed, beds made, and children started for school. Her hands grew hot as she buttered bread for luncheons, waited on those who had to start early, and tried to pacify the little ones and Bridget.

"My dear, you're feverish," said her husband, as he held her hand a moment; "let the work go, and rest yourself; you'll find it pays."

"Just like a man!" thought the mother. "Why, I have'n time for my prayers!" But the little woman had resolved that she would read a few verses before ten o'clock each day; so, standing by her bureau, she opened to the eighth chapter of Matthew, and read these words: "And he touched her hand, and the fever left her: and she arose and ministered unto them."

It seemed to that busy wife as if Jesus himself stood ready to heal her—to take the fever out of her hands, that she might minister wisely to her dear ones. The beds could wait until later in the day—the parlor might be a little disordered—she must feel his touch! She knelt, and he whispered; "My strength [not yours child,] is sufficient. . . . As thy day so shall thy strength be. . . . My yoke is easy [this you have been galled by is the world's yoke, the yoke of public opinion or housewifely ambition] take my yoke upon you and learn of me. . . . Ye shall find rest."

The day was no brighter, the work had still to be done, but the fever had left her, and all the day she sang, "This God is our God, my Lord and my God."

It is true, that when the friends came to lunch, there had not been time to arrange the parlor, and no fancy dishes had been prepared for the table, but the hostess heart was filled for them as members, with her, of Christ, and they went away hungering for such a realization of him as they saw she had.

"Ah," said her husband, when he held her hands once more, "I see you took my advice, dear; the fever is quite gone."

The wife hesitated—could she tell her secret? Was it not almost too sacred? Yet—it was the secret of the Lord (not hers) and would glorify him. Later on, when the two sat together, she told who had cured her fever, and said, quietly, "I see that there is a more important ministry than the housekeeping, though I don't mean to neglect that."

"Let us ask the Lord to keep hold of our hands," said her husband. "Mine grow feverish in eager money-making, as yours in too eager housekeeping."

This is no fancy sketch. Dear mothers, busy, anxious housekeepers, let us go again and again to him, that he may touch our hands lest they be feverish and so we cannot minister, in the highest sense, to those about us.—Christian at Work.

Canon Farrar on the Doctrine of the Atonement.

NEW HAVEN, Ct., October 21.—At the Episcopal Church Congress last evening Canon Farrar spoke clearly and forcibly. "The doctrine of the atonement," he said, "is the key to the Christian faith. Its truths declared the reconciliation of man to God. Errors have arisen from theological subtleties, and sometimes the name has been given to some systematic theory of an atonement, but the belief set forth in the Scriptures is the real doctrine of the atonement. I say at once, and without fear of contradiction, that no theory of the atonement, no scholastic explanation of the atonement, has ever been accepted by all creeds, or can put forth claims to catholicity." Canon Farrar closed by saying that nothing but failure has ever or can ever come of the effort to fathom God's nature by man's measure; but the infinitely blessed results of the atonement we know. They are the joys of our thanksgivings and of our life.

Have Faith in God.

Without faith it is impossible to please God. What is it to have faith in God. Merely to believe he is able to perform whatsoever we ask, or to believe that there is an all-wise, all-powerful, all-merciful Creator? The devils believed and trembled. We are required to believe more than this. Christ says, Let not that man think he shall receive anything who asketh doubting; whatsoever ye ask in my name believing, ye shall receive; and again, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye might say unto this sycamore tree, be thou plucked up by the roots and be thou planted in the sea, and it should obey you. Some say they believe the Lord will answer prayer in regard to salvation—saving of souls, but as to our bread and butter, or in regard to our everyday matters, he does not trouble himself. Why then did he when teaching his disciples how to pray tell them to say, Give us this day our daily bread, and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from all evil? Are not these everyday affairs? as a brother once said, he believed our prayers would be answered when the Lord came, not until then. Are we to wait until then for our daily bread? James says, Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. I for one feel to say, Blessed be the Lord, and bless his holy name, for his goodness and mercy to all those that trust him. I had been a great sufferer, for many years with a complication of old chronic diseases, had spent a great deal with doctors and for medicine, but could get no relief, but was gradually growing weaker in mind and body, and in my agony I prayed to be healed, but my prayer was not a prayer of faith. I tried to exercise faith and thought I did. I said to the Lord, Why wilt thou not heal me (overlooking the love of God, and his willingness to heal.) Lord I believe thou art able to do all things, but in my heart I was doubting that he would do it, for I was still taking medicine, still trusting to the arm of flesh, and it came to me in the still hours of the night, Faith without works is dead. I made up my mind that I would show my faith by my works, and that I would ask believing. Whatsoever ye ask, if ye believe ye shall receive it, ye shall have it. I got up the next morning, dressed and took all my medicines, put them away, and gave all up to God, and from that day began to amend rapidly. Blest and soreness all left my side, and strength came rapidly back to me, and some serious symptoms pertaining to the heart, that threatened immediate death were, from that day relieved. And again Jesus says, If ye shall ask any thing in my name I will do it. If ye abide in me and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you. O, brothers and sisters, is it not worth our time and attention to strive to live a Christian life, even for the present help, say nothing of the future blessings that shall follow when this short uncertain life is over, and our Savior comes to make up his jewels. If we could only realize and appreciate the innumerable blessings daily showered down on our unworthy heads by a kind and loving Father, who is far more willing to give good gifts to those that love and serve him, than we earthly parents are to give good gifts to our children, would we be so ungrateful as to live in open rebellion to his laws, and wishes, as many of us do? Even some of us that profess to love and serve him, would we do it if we could realise what he is doing for us hourly? I think not. Oh, let us strive to do his will, and the blessing will be ours. He that endureth unto the end the same shall be saved. Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

IN MEMORIAM.

We are under the painful necessity of recording the death, on the 17th inst., of our much esteemed and beloved Brother Herbert S. Miller, at the age of 25 years. His disease was typhoid fever. He was a young man of unusually bright promise, and universally respected by all who knew him. He was intelligent in the Scriptures, and a strong believer in the gospel of the kingdom of God and eternal salvation at the second appearing of Jesus, having been baptised into Christ for the remission of sins, at our Conference at Woodland, several years ago. He was active in every good work, being a leader in the cause of temperance, Bible class, and Church of "the waiting ones," in Mendon,—taking the place of his lamented father, Brother E. Miller.

After several years of faithful and efficient service as clerk of our Conference, he was unanimously re-elected at our annual meeting last June. We regard his loss to us all as irreparable. He was the "only son of his mother who is a widow," on whom she depended in her declining years. But she sorrows not as those who have no hope. But as God brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ—the Great Shepherd—so he will bring, by the first resurrection, her beloved parents, brothers, husband and darling son from their deep sleep in Jesus, when there shall be a glorious reunion in the kingdom of God, after "death is swallowed up in victory." Brother L. O. Chase preached a very appropriate discourse from Job xvii. 15, "Where now is my hope?"

WOODLAND, Mich. Oct. 18, 1885.

This morning we learned the sad news of the death of Brother Herbert Miller. And in our sadness our minds are carried back a few years when we saw him buried with Christ in baptism, gave him the right hand of fellowship, and listened to a touching exhortation given him by his father. Since that he has been with us from time to time, and by his faithfulness, zeal, and noble traits of character, we have learned to love and honor him. And in his death the church suffers great loss. We as a church, extend our heartfelt sympathy to the friends so sadly bereaved, and especially to the widowed mother, who was hoping from him a strong and willing arm to lean on in her declining years. But let us be comforted. The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his. He over whom death hath triumphed, will, when Jesus comes, triumph over death and come forth from his grave glorious and immortal.

Sententious.

The godly never outlive their usefulness; therefore let the aged take heart.

The best time to show respect and affection for good men is when they are alive and can be cheered by tokens of such regard.

Learn from nature not to divide your energies unduly. Her compromises frequently look like failures. The land is good for men to live on; the sea is good for fishes to live in; but a sea-marsh is good for neither, being too wet for men, and too dry for fishes.

In the still air the music lies unheard,
In the rough marble beauty lies unseen,
To make the music and the beauty needs
The Master's touch, the sculptor's chisel keen.

Great Master! touch us with thy skilful hand,
Let not the music that is in us die;
Great Sculptor! hew and polish us, nor let,
Hidden and lost, thy form within us lie!

Make no question what can God do, for he can do anything but to deny himself, and cease to be Infinite; these he cannot do. Remember always that God's glory is the chiefest good man's life—yea, man's salvation is to be set behind it, which made Moses to wish rather to have his name blotted out of God's book, than that God should be dishonored.—Henry Scudder.

"A bruised reed he will not break." The shepherd's pipe that somebody has trod upon, cannot be made to sound; you cannot bring a note from it. But the Great Master can give it into his hands and let him make melody with it. Your poor, feeble frame, how gently he will use it, and, in spite of all its weakness, make it sing to his praise.—E. W. Moore.

Bless God for what you have, and trust God for what you want.—Mason.

IN THE SECRET OF HIS PRESENCE.

In the secret of His presence
How my soul delights to hide!
O how precious are the lessons
Which I learn at Jesus' side!
Earthly cares can never vex me,
Neither trials lay me low;
For when Satan comes to tempt me
To the secret place I go.

When my soul is faint and thirsty,
'Neath the shadow of his wing
There is cool and pleasant shelter,
And a fresh and crystal spring;
And my Savior rests beside me,
As we hold communion sweet;
If I tried I could not utter
What he says when thus we meet.

Only this I know: I rest Him
All my doubts, and fears, and fears;
O how patiently he listens!
And my drooping soul he cheers!
Do you think he never whispers
What a false Friend he would be,
If he never, never told me
Of the sins which he must see.

Would you like to know the sweetness
Of the secret of the Lord?
Go and hide beneath his shadow;
This shall then be your reward.
And whene'er you leave the silence
Of that happy meeting-place,
You must mind and bear the image
Of the Master in your face.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CONFESSION.

From the October number of Words of Reconciliation we learn what resulted from the overture proposed to the Presbytery of West Jersey by L. C. Baker, the Editor of the above named paper, in respect to a revision of its Standard Creeds on certain doctrinal teachings regarding the doom of the finally impenitent. As we conclude that our readers would like to learn what action was taken upon the matters submitted, we give the Editor's own account of the proceedings.

OVERTURE REFUSED.

The Presbytery of West Jersey, at its recent session, refused to adopt the overture we had proposed, by which the General Assembly was requested to take action looking toward a revision of the Eschatology of the Westminster Standards. The matter however, was calmly and temperately discussed. A motion to indefinitely postpone, which at first was about to prevail, was overruled, and the brethren wisely and kindly gave it a patient hearing. Three ministers spoke warmly and earnestly in its favor. Several were heard against it. And yet, in our judgment, an important advance was made toward the end in view.

For first it is something to be noted and to be grateful for that so serious a proposal, (by some regarded as revolutionary), to induce the Presbyterian Church in these United States to revise its Confession, was not at once thrown out of court, but that it was discussed in a calm and kindly spirit. There was no bitterness nor denunciation. There was the recognition that the call for such action based itself upon too strong grounds to be denied a hearing. Indeed, to our mind, the arguments used against it were virtual admissions of its necessity. These arguments were mainly:

1. The obscurity of the object involved, and the difficulties which would arise in opening it up of attaining accurate definitions. There seemed to be a repugnance to all attempts to state these doctrines in any terms more precise than those in which they are presented in the Scriptures. But those who used this argument seemed to strangely forget that these doctrines in our Confession are now most severely and rigidly defined. The very question raised by the Overture was as to whether those hard and rigid formulas, framed two centuries and more ago, are to be always adhered to as containing all the light which God has granted to his church in these last days, and as to whether, if men's consciences are to be bound as they are now, by subscription to creed-statements, these are the ones which should continue to bind us.

2. But, it was argued, a large liberty of private interpretation is already allowed in the church. Brethren maintained that, by the fusion of the Old School branches, the ipsissima verba theory of subscription was discarded; that we were now permitted to accept the standards in the spirit and not the letter, and for substance of doctrine, without accepting necessarily all their verbal statements. Under this head, we were both pleased and grieved by what was said. We were glad to hear several speakers declare their right and purpose to go directly to the Word of God for the matter of their preaching, to which they were directed by the Standards themselves. We were pained, however, at the assumption which this involved, that we, as a church, are thereby relieved from strict responsibility to bring our public and authorized testimony upon these great points into the closest harmony with the teachings of the Bible, and to make them express the fullest measure of light which God may grant to his church from time to time. Better that the church should not speak at all upon these tremendous problems of man's destiny, but point her ministers and people to the Word of God alone for light, than that she should speak in the discarded language of a past age, and terms which her official teachers can no longer comply without hesitation and apology.

3. But the chief objection urged to the Overture was that the discussions provoked by the attempt would be unprofitable, and would tend to divert the minds of our ministers and people from the church's great business of saving men. We cannot fathom, it was claimed, these mysteries of the future. We do know that men all around us are in dire need of a saving knowledge of Christ, and that a dreadful doom awaits them in the life to come if they reject him. But this argument, with all its apparent strength and plausibility, rests upon the wrong assumption that it is the church's first business to gather sinners into her fold. A careful reading of the New Testament will show that her first business is to perfect herself. If she were, in doctrine and life, a perfect witness for God, her power to draw men to him would be seen apparent. Still further, the argument overlooks the fact that we are responsible to hold up before men, not merely Christ, but the true Christ. Who and what is the God to whom we invite them? We are bound to see that we do not distort his Image, pervert his truth and misrepresent his character and ways. It is by the knowledge of him that men live, that souls are born again and sanctified and furnished unto all good works. Men become like the God they love and worship. If they think of him as unjust or harsh and cruel in his ways, they cannot themselves become upright and humane and forgiving. We much regret therefore that, where there was so much tacit admission of the justice of this proposition and so little to urge against it, the Presbytery did not act upon it more worthily. We were grieved that it did not take a higher view of the church's responsibility, as God's appointed witness to men, to be perfectly truthful and honest in their testimony. If in any department she is bound to speak with all gravity and sincerity, with sound speech that cannot be condemned, she is surely bound to speak so here. No considerations of expediency, or of temporary ease and prosperity, ought to weigh a moment against the vast interests of the truth involved. Nor ought God's ministers be compelled to cramp the larger views which he has been giving them in these last days within the narrow confines of traditional barriers which served well in a former age, but which many of them have learned to see beyond. Still less ought they to be found seeking to put meanings into those old words which they were never meant to express.

And yet, as we have said, there was much that was gratifying in this attempt and in the discussion it called forth. It revealed a growing spirit of tolerance in the church, and an increasing willingness to entertain the idea of change. Even a few votes, given under the adverse pressure of such a position, means something. And this spirit will grow in the church because it is of God. Men in whom his Spirit dwells, if their position is a false one, will sooner or later discover it and speak out against the policy that would compell them to remain there. Men of intellectual honesty, and who desire to preserve a conscience void of offence before God and man, will not be always content with a bed so short that their honest opinions cannot stretch themselves upon it. Men of large-heartedness, as we know the brethren of that Presbytery to be, and there are many like them throughout the church, who believe, for example, as several of them on the floor confessed, in the salvability of exceptionally devout heathen, will come to see, with Dr. Prentiss, that there are wider operations of God's grace than are provided for in any of our "more human schemes and formulas," and that if these formulas stand in any way between us and the full light of Heaven, they must needs be changed.

We cannot close without expressing our thanks to the brethren of that Presbytery and to the God of all grace from whom all good comes, for the courtesy and brotherly kindness we received at their hands through this discussion, and for their charitable forbearance with our conscientious differences. This feeling expressed itself in the unanimous adoption of a resolution that "While Presbytery is constrained to reject the Overture offered by the Rev. Mr. Baker, it nevertheless would express its entire confidence in the integrity of his convictions and the honesty of his purpose."

CURRENT HISTORY.

PERSIA'S RULERS.

The Government of Persia is an absolute monarchy. There is no Council or Assembly. The reigning Shah is Hasirid Deen, the support of religion, meaning the Mohammedan religion. He is the supreme ruler of the land. He ascended the throne on the death of his father, Oct. 20, 1848. He has therefore reigned, on the 20th of this month, just thirty-seven years.

He is the best Mohammedan king that Persia has ever had to rule over her people. He has introduced more improvements in the country than any other prince, and is best disposed both toward his own people and to foreigners. He began to reign in his eighteenth year; he is therefore fifty-three years of age. He is a person of medium stature, full form, shaven face and prepossessing appearance.

He is the author of several books of travel, and encourages learning and literary men. Has established a successful postal service, many lines of telegraph, a flourishing college at Teheran, and is prevented from constructing railroads by the prejudices of the priesthood in part, but especially by European diplomacy. England is opposed to any railway in that country which would be run in the interest of Russia, and therefore discourages capitalists from investing in that country. On the other hand Russia is opposed to the construction of any road which will benefit anybody but Russia.

The sons of the Shah who appear in public life are the Zillah Sultan or shadow of the king. He is not the heir to the throne, not being the son of a covenanted wife and princess. He has great power, however, being governor of the greater part of southern Persia.

The second son, called Valeakht, or heir to the throne, resides by custom in Tabriz until he shall ascend the throne. He has the government of Azarbijan.

The third son is Nathe Sultan, or agent of the king. He is now in command of army and police, and is a courteous and kindly disposed young man of rather progressive tendencies.

The government of the country is by governors of provinces, appointed by the Shah and removed at his pleasure. For the most part these are intelligent men and kindly disposed to foreigners and to missionaries, and desirous of seeing their country improved; but they are under the power of a corrupt religious system and in fear of the religious superstitions of the people and the prejudices of the Mullahs.

As there are no treaties between Persia and other nations touching religious affairs, the rights of missionaries are not defined; and though somewhat may be claimed on general principles, yet under God they are practically dependent upon the good-will of the king and governors. By ill-will the king and governors can put many obstacles in the way of the work.

It is now clearly settled by repeated trials and orders that the people of all the different sects and races in Persia are entitled to fullest religious liberty and may change their faith and worship according to their own convictions, except Mohammedans and the children of Mohammedans; for them there is no admitted right of private judgment or change of religious worship. By the law of the koran and the common law of the land a Mohammedan who abandons the faith of his father must suffer death; but the death-penalty has not been inflicted, other expedients being thought sufficient. Yet many Mohammedans attend regularly Christian religious worship, and some have become Christians. Pray that the heart of king and governors may be turned to the Lord, and that all who seek the truth may enjoy protection.—James Bassett, in New York Observer.

THE ANNEXATION OF BURMAH.

There is a strong probability that England will at once proceed to enlarge her possessions in the East by the annexation of Burmah. This step seems necessary on account of the frequent troubles between Burmah and the Indian government and the disturbances caused by Burmese intrigues in surrounding States. Several districts formerly belonging to Burmah have been seized at different times by the British. A strip of territory along the Bengal coast was taken in 1826, and another, including the delta of the Irrawaddy River, in 1852, thus completely cutting off the unacquired portion of Burmah from the sea.

Independent Burmah is an absolute despotism, and Theebaw, its present ruler, is a fair type of a monarch of barbarous instincts and unrestrained authority. The people are regarded as the property of the king, and may be called to any service which he requires at any time. None may leave the country without the royal permission. The laws are arbitrary and severe, and the treatment of criminals is barbarous. For serious crimes the punishments are beheading, crucifixion and breaking the limbs. For lesser offences, whipping, imprisonments and fines. Torture is used in trials, and jailors also practice it to extort money from prisoners.

The social and religious condition of the people is at the lowest ebb; the schools are nearly all in Buddhist monasteries and the teachers are priests. The country has a population of about four millions, nearly all Buddhists. Owing to the jealous, if not hostile, character of the government, Christian missions in Burmah proper have not been very successful. The China Inland Mission established a station at Bhamo, in the northwest, about nine years ago and has met with some success. It was before any part of the country came into the possession of England that the Apostle of Burmah, Dr. Judson, began at Rangoon the glorious work for Christ which, in that part of the country, has gone on with little interruption to the present day. The history of the Baptist missions on this peninsula is one of the most wonderful in the record of gospel work in foreign lands. The Baptists entered the country in 1813, and for more than forty-five years were the only Protestants in the field. For over sixty-five years they had but one colleague. Up to the present time there are but three Protestant missionary agencies, besides the Baptists, which work for Burmah or its people. The American Baptist Missionary Union is the only society, besides the China Inland Mission, which is now at work in independent Burmah.

All that the country needs for its prosperous growth and development would seem to be an infusion of Christianity and a better and more enlightened government. Burmah has abundant natural resources and unequalled facilities for internal as well as foreign commerce. The country is rich in minerals, having gold, silver and lead in great abundance, besides rubies, emeralds and sapphires. It has immense forests of teak and stores of marble and petroleum. France is the only foreign power having territory in the neighborhood and the only government that would be likely to offer any serious objection to the extension of English rule in this direction.—*N. ## The Love of God.

Like a cradle, rocking, rocking,
Silent, peaceful, to and fro,
Like a mother's sweet look dropping
On the little face below,
Hangs the green earth, swinging, turning,
Jarless, noiseless, safe and slow;
Falls the light of God's face bending
Down, and watching us below.

And as feeble babes that gather,
Tears and cry, and will not rest,
Are the ones the tender mother
Holds the closest, loves the best,
So when we are weak and wretched,
By our sins weighed down, distressed,
Then it is that God's great patience
Holds us closest, loves us best.

Oh, great heart of God! whose loving
Cannot hindered be, nor crossed!
Will not weary, will not even
In our death itself be lost!
Love divine of such great power,
Only mother's know the core—
Cost of love, which all love passing,
Gave a Son to save the lost.

"I Will Give Nothing."

"There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." Prov. xi. 24.

A minister soliciting aid toward his house of worship, waited upon an individual distinguished for wealth and benevolence. Approving the case, he presented to his minister a handsome donation, and turning to his three sons, who had witnessed the transaction, he advised them to imitate the example. "My dear boys," said he, "you have heard the case; now what will you give?"

One said, "I will give all my pocket will furnish."

Another observed, "I will give half of that I have in my purse."

The third sternly remarked, "I will give nothing."

Some years after, the minister had occasion to visit the same place, and recollecting the family he had called upon, he inquired into the actual position of the parties. He was informed that the generous father was dead; the youth who had so cheerfully given all his store was living in affluence; the son who had divided his pocket-money was in comfortable circumstances; but the third, who had indignantly refused to assist and haughtily declared he would give "nothing," was so reduced as to be supported by the two brothers.

The incident furnishes a most suggestive comment upon the text which stands at the head of this article. And there are plenty of parallel texts and facts.

A Big Family.

The sun is the head of a wonderful family, which he rules absolutely and beneficiently. This family is composed of the planets and their moons, the planetoids or little planets, the comets and the meteorites or shooting stars. Rushing through space at the rate of probably over a thousand miles a day, the sun carries all the members of his family with him, or, rather, keeps them circling round him with intense velocity. At the same time, the sun revolves or spins round on his own axis once in about twenty-five days. The planets revolve in a similar manner each round its own axis, while they are whirling round the sun, and with the sun probably whirling round some distant but unknown center of gravity, and all the time the moons are circling round the sun. What a wonderful complexity of motion, yet all is kept in harmony so perfect that astronomers are able to calculate to a minute, not only the time when the sun appears to rise or set, but even the time at which an eclipse of the sun will be caused by the moon coming between us and it. The planets differ from each other very much in size and rapidity of motion, and in their distance from the sun. Jupiter, for instance, is about 1,500 times as large as the earth, and four times as far from the sun; yet Jupiter, big as he is, turns round in ten hours, so that his day is only five hours long. The farthest planet, Neptune, is about 3,000,000,000 of miles from the sun.

The sun is about 91,500,000 miles distant from the earth, on an average (he is 3,000,000 of miles nearer us in winter than in summer). It would take a limited express "airline" train, going sixty miles an hour without stopping, one hundred and seventy-three years to reach the sun. Yet, even at this immense distance, the sun is able to exert a power over our globe which keeps us swinging round him like a stone in a sling. This is done by the force of gravitation, and indicates the enormous weight of the sun in proportion to that of the earth.

A COMPARISON.

The sun's diameter is over one hundred times as great as the diameter of the earth. Suppose the earth reduced to the size of a large pea, say a quarter of an inch in diameter, the sun, to be in proportion, would be represented by a large pumpkin, twenty-five inches through, or six feet three inches in circumference. The large planet, Jupiter, would, on the same scale, be the size of a large orange, two and three-quarter inches in diameter, while our moon would be scarcely larger than the head of a pin. Even these figures do not, however, give a just appreciation of the size of the sun. Perhaps we can form a better idea by remembering that though the earth is twenty-four thousand miles in circumference, it would take twelve hundred such bodies rolled into one to make a globe the size of the sun.

Our young readers should try to remember these remarkable results of study by astronomers.—N. Y. Witness.

Dear Children:

Let us tarry a little longer in the beautiful garden, which the Lord planted, for directly in the midst of it, there grew two trees, the eating of which, developed the destiny of all the human family, and was called the tree of life. The other, the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. All trees have an intestine motion, or circulation, growing out of the earth by means of warmth, and water, being a symbol, or representation of life commencing in germ form, and unfolding by degrees. These two trees seemed to have gained their vigor in the same natural way, perhaps the appearance of the fruit of the tree of life was not so inviting to the eye as that of the other, as the gardener's wife said the tree of the knowledge of good and evil was pleasant to the eye, but around this tree God had encircled a law. "Thou shalt not eat of it, lest ye die." The Lord God made the happy gardener and his wife, free will agents, to do what their willing minds prompted them to do, and as they were created to live by eating, the Lord wanted them to develop character in this act, they could have formed no character, without God had given them a divine law, and this was to be their instructor to teach them how to live in the blessed favor of God. Therefore this tree was necessary in unfolding their reason, and instructive qualities revealing to them the exquisite organization God had given to them above the animal creation. While they were obedient in not touching, or tasting the fruit of this tree, they experienced no care, sorrow, pain, or death but rejoiced in the excellent things God had so richly provided for them, glowing with energy while feeding on the delicious clusters which hung from the tree of life. But the helpmeet, or lovely companion of the gardener, perhaps while gazing on the beautiful, ripe fruit, of the forbidden tree, heard a strange voice say, ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden, and she answered, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden, but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the subtle serpent-like voice said, ye shall not surely die, but the eating of it will make your understanding keener to perceive good and evil. To this voice she listened instead of what God had told her, and when she had eaten she gave some to her husband, who also eat. This was their first sin, and no sooner had they partaken of it than their minds were filled with care, and anxiety how to provide themselves clothing, for sin had developed shame. Another voice now greets their ear, which they knew to be the voice of the Lord God, having no doubt heard the sweet tone many a time before, when their listening ear caught with joy the pleasing sound, but now they run from it, and try in every way to hide themselves among the trees of the garden, but the voice sounds louder and calls to the sorrowful sin-stricken gardener, Where art thou? and he said, I heard thy voice in the garden and I was afraid, because I was naked and I hid myself, and the Lord said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree whereof I commanded thee thou shouldst not eat? and the gardener said, The woman whom thou gavest with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. And the Lord God said unto the woman, what is this that thou hast done? and she said, the serpent, or "Seeing" beguiled me, and I did eat.

Children beloved, through disobedience the happy gardener and his companion lost the precious favor of God, which brought death to them and every creature. There is nothing God loves so much as a listening ear, and a willing mind to obey. In God's favor there is life.

Your affectionate Teacher,

E. COFFMAN.

SELECTED JEWISH NOTES.

There is great distress among the poor of Jerusalem, provisions being dear and water scarce.

M. Pines, of Jerusalem, recently visited the town of Pekyin in Palestine (mentioned in the Talmud,) and states that there is no doubt that most of the merchants and farmers have dwelt there since Palestine belonged to the Jews. They speak Arabic and dress like the Arabs.

Roumelia has a large number of Jewish communities, several of whom have been supplied with schools by the Alliance Israelite. Some of these congregations, notably those of Eski Zaghra and Kezanlik, the centre of the rose-growing district, were all but ruined and dispersed during the Russo-Turkish war; but the majority of the Jewish residents have returned and rebuilt their desolate homesteads, synagogues, Yeshibis, and Talmud Torah Schools. The most important congregation is that at Philippopolis, the capital of the province, and the oldest is probably the community at Eski Zaghra. It dates back to the fifteenth century.

One Noah, a native of Ashus, Persia, has recently arrived in Warsaw, and gives a harrowing account of the persecutions endured by the Jews in Little Persia, on the borders of Turkestan. Noah is the bearer of a letter from the rabbis of the district, full of lamentations, and requesting their European brethren to intercede for them with the Shah of Persia. Their chief persecutors are the savage and fanatic Turkomans, and they are also subject to restrictive and cruel laws. If a Jew owes a debt to a Persian or a Turkoman, and is not able to pay it, he is tortured and compelled to sell his wife and children. Any vessel belonging to a Mussulman, if touched by a Jew, becomes "unclean," and the Jew must pay double its price, and undergo torture. They are also constantly exposed to the rapacity of the Turkomans, and are all, without any exception, in a state of most abject poverty. Owing to this circumstance they are able to bring their complaints before the Shah. Besides, they are a small number and widely scattered in the district.

The Bulletin of the Geographical Society of Marseilles estimates the total number of Jews in the world at 6,377,602—that is 5,407,602 in Europe, 215,000 in Asia, 412,000 in Africa, 300,000 in America and 12,000 in Oceanica. The European Jews are distributed as follows: 1,643,708 in Austria-Hungary, 561,612 in Germany, 60,000 in Great Britain, 3,000 in Belgium, 3,943 in Denmark, 1,900 in Spain, 70,000 in France, 2,653 in Greece, 7,873 in Switzerland, 2,698 in Holland, 36,289 in Italy, 600 in Luxemburg, 200 in Portugal, 260,000 in Roumania, 2,552,145 in Russia, 3,492 Servia, 3,000 in Sweden and Norway, 116,000 in European Turkey. There are about 150,000 in the Asiatic provinces of Turkey, 15,000 in Persia, 47,000 in Asiatic Russia, in India and China 19,000, and 14,000 in Turkestan and Afghanistan. In Africa there are about 35,000 in Algeria, 100,000 in Morocco, 55,000 in Tunis, 8,000 in Tripoli, 200,000 in Abyssinia, 3,000 in Egypt, 8,000 scattered over the desert and about 1,000 at the Cape of Good Hope.

"I DO NOT KNOW THE MAN."

Dost thou not know me? Hast thou then forgot
The poor lone man by yonder distant seat?
I call'd, and thou didst choose my mournful lot:
Yes, thou didst leave thy all to follow Me.

Dost thou not know Me? Yet this sullen face
Should not be strange to those dim, dazzled eyes,
Which late beheld on Tabor's sacred place
The sun, now setting, in such glory rise.

Dost thou not know Me? Ah, what form had He,
Who, when thy life was sinking in the abyss,
So quickly stretch'd his hand to rescue thee?
Look! mine is bound; but was that hand like this?

And can the sheep its bleeding shepherd smite?
Say; of whose be-ten body didst thou eat?
Dost thou not know Me yet? Who but this night
Knelt down, O my beloved, to wash thy feet?

In dark Gethsemane the weight of woe
Press'd drops of blood from this tame-tortured brow;
But ah! they lead Me to the cross!—I go:—
Thou serpent:—tell Me, dost thou know Me now?

The Word that Goeth His Way out of a Mouth of the Lord. A Sample of It. God's Talk with Job and how He Lived Thereby.

We read in Matthew as one of Christ's sayings quoted from that which had been written by a prophet, "not upon bread alone shall man live, but upon every word (το ῥημα the spoken or oracular word) that goeth its way out through a mouth of God."

I have translated the passage in this literal way to give its full parable meaning. For it is a good illustration of parable language.

The "word" here is the spoken word, to teach us that there is such a thing in God's teaching as a general argument, his λογος, and a specific teaching ῥημα. "All the inspired [Scripture" has its place and value in the teaching economy of God, but we are especially exhorted "to heed the surer prophetic word."

Now a true prophet is "a mouth" or "mouth-piece" of God and generally so called in the Scriptures. So you see why we have "a mouth" instead of "the mouth" in the text. "Through" indicates instrumentality. The prophet was an instrument or instrumentality of God's. "Goeth its way." That is a way peculiar to itself, God's way, and this we are told is as much "higher than man's way as the heavens are higher than the earth." "Living upon a word" implies a belief in the first teaching of God, namely, that he bespake this natural life which we now have and can bespeak the higher spiritual life to which the gospel calls us.

With this preliminary to illustrate the difference between the λογος or the general argument of God and the ῥημα the specific teaching, I will proceed to give the passages from Job, referred to in the caption, premising that the gist of the teaching in this case turns upon the use and proper understanding of this same word ῥημα in the two passages given. I have therefore italicised them.

JOB XXXVIII.

1. And after Elihu had ceased talking, the Lord spake unto Job through a whirlwind and clouds.

2. Who is this that hideth me in counsel, and withholdeth words (ῥηματα) in heart, and thinketh to hide me?

3. Gird up thy loins like a man, and I will question thee and do thou answer me.

4. Where wast thou when I founded the earth? Tell me if thou has exact knowledge in an understanding way,

5. Who set the measures thereof if thou knowest? Or who led a measuring line thereupon?

6. Upon what were the rings (the orbits) thereof hung? And who is he who laid a corner-stone therefor?

7. When there came to be stars, all my angels praised me with a loud voice,

8. And I shut up a sea with gates when she leaped from her mother's womb to go her way.

9. And I made a cloud her swathing-band, and I wrapped her in mist.

10. And I set bounds for her, placing about her bars and gates.

11. And I said unto her, thus far shalt thou come, and thou shalt not overstep it, but in thyself shall thy waves be broken.

12. Or did I order a morning ray over thee? and did Lucifer (the Morning-bringer) know that his own office was (13) to lay hold of the wings of the earth to shake irreverent ones out of it?

14. Or didst thou take clay earth and mould a living being, and place it a talking thing upon the earth?

15. And didst thou take away the light from irreverent ones, and break the arm of contemptuous ones?

16. And hast thou come in search of fountain, and walked in the footprints of an abysmal depth? (the "pit")

17. And have death's gates opened to thee with fear, and were the door-keepers of Hades astounded when they saw thee?

18. And hast thou admonished the breadth of that which is under the heavens? Tell me forsooth of what sort any one is,

19. And in what sort of a land is light campeth, and what sort of a place the place of darkness is,

20. Couldst thou conduct me to the bounderies thereof? and hast thou fully understood their paths?

21. I should know surely that thou hadst been begotten then and the number of thy years were many.

22. And hast thou been to the stored-away treasures of snow, and hast thou seen the stored-away treasures of hail?

23. Were they forsooth laid away by thee, for an hour with enemies, for a day of warfare and battle?

24. And silence doth the hoar-frost or its way, or the south wind dissipate it in that which is under the heavens?

25. And who hath made the gliding rain ready to flow, going its way with uproar

26. To water a land where there is no man, a wilderness wherein there is no human being;

27. To make the trackless and uninhabited spring up with grass, and sprout with verdure?

28. Who is father of the rain? and who is he who brought forth the drops of dew?

29. And from what womb doth the ice go its way out? and who brought forth the hoar-frost in the heavens?

30. Or bringeth it down like running water? Who smote the face of an irreverent one?

31. And hast thou understood the binding of Pleias, and hast thou opened the prison of Orion?

32. Or wilt thou be at variance with Mazzaroth in his season and Hesperus on his flowing hair? Wilt thou lead them?

33. And hast thou come to know exactly the revolutions of the heavens or the things that have occurred with one accord beneath the heavens?

34. And wilt thou with voice summon a cloud and will it obey thee with the trembling of gliding water?

35. And wilt thou send forth thunder-bolts and will they go their way? and will they say unto thee, What is it?

36. And who gave to women the wisdom of the woven web or the embroidery art?

37. And who is he that numbereth clouds in wisdom, and who leaned the heavens toward the earth?

38. Fine dust hath been poured even as the earth and I have caused it to cleave together even as a stone in cubic form.

39. And wilt thou hunt up food for lions, and wilt thou satisfy the souls (natural organisms) of dragons?

40. For they have grown apprehensive in their lairs, and have lain down, as they lie in wait in the forests.

41. And who hath prepared food for the raven? For his young have cried unto the Lord as they wander seeking food.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

1. Dost thou know the season when the tragelaphos (a species of bearded deer) of the rock bring forth, and hast thou watched over the birth-pangs of the notelopes?

2. And hast thou numbered their months, the months requisite for their bringing forth? And hast thou allowed their birth-pangs?

3. And hast thou brought up their offspring without fear? and wilt thou dismiss their birth-pangs?

4. They will disever their offspring from them; they will become multiplied in generating; they will go away and they shall not return to them.

5. And who is he that let the wild ass go free, and who loosed his bonds?

6. I made the wilderness his abode, and the salt-marsh his tarrying-places.

7. Laughing with scorn at the crowded populace of the city, and declining to listen to the reproach of the tax-gatherer, (8) he views the mountains as his pasture and goes seeking after any green thing.

9. And will the unicorn choose to serve thee as a bond-servant, or lie down by thy manger?

10. Will thou forsooth fasten a yoke upon him with thongs, or will he plough thy furrows on the plain?

11. And wilt thou trust him because his strength is great, and wilt thou handle him carelessingly in thy employment of him?

12. And wilt thou trust him to give away thy seed to sow and bring back again to thy threshing-floor?

13. A wing of those who dance for joy is Neelasso's, should she apprehend time and mud;

14. Because she will leave her eggs on the ground and warm them upon the dry earth,

15. And ignore the fact that a foot may crush them and wild beasts of the field may tread upon them.

16. She has become so hard-hearted toward her offspring as if she was not herself. For naught hath she toiled without fear;

17. Because to her God hath kept silence as to wisdom, and hath not given her an allotment in the way of understanding.

18. Betimes she will rise on high; she will laugh at a horse and his rider.

19. Or hast thou put potency on the horse, and didst thou clothe his neck with respectful fear?

20. And didst thou put on his warpanoply and make daring a glory of his breast, (21). when pawing on the plain he leapeth, and goeth his way on the plain with might? (22). Should he meet with a king even he laugheth in scorn, and he will not turn back from iron.

23. Bow and sword leap upon him (24). and with wrath they darken the earth; and he will not believe it until the trumpet soundeth the signal:

25. But should the trumpet sound the signal, he saith Aha (or it is well) and he snuffeth battle afar off with a leap and a shout.

26. And by exact science doth the hawk stand poised and fly without moving his wings while he scrutinizeth things down towards the south?

27. And at thy command will the eagle soar on high and the vulture when he hath devoured bivouac on his nest upon the precipitous edge of a cliff and in a place of concealment?

28. While there he is seeking his food; his eyes view it afar off;

29. And his young wallow in blood; yea, wherever the dead be, they find it straightway.

30. And the Lord God answered Job and said, Dost thou decline to argue with one who is enough for you? But when one convicteth God he will have answered this question.

31. And Job taking up the discourse saith unto the Lord,

32. Why do I argue further admonishing and reproving the Lord? When I hear such things and am nothing, shall I reply to them? I will place my hand upon my mouth.

33. Once for all have I spoken plainly, but I will not repeat it.

CHAPTER XL.

1. And the Lord taking up the discourse spake still further unto Job out of the cloud,

2. Yea, but gird up thy loins like a man and I will question thee and do thou answer me.

3. Dost thou set aside my verdict, and dost thou think that I have divinely revealed otherwise unto thee than that thou art just in a way that is inscrutable?

4. Or is thy arm against the Lord or dost thou thunder against him with a voice?

5. Aye, take up light and potency and wrap thyself in glory and honor.

6. In wrath send forth angels, and in every way humble the haughty, (7.) and quench the scorner; and straightway destroy the irreverent in corruption (8.) and hide them altogether in the earth, and fill their faces with dishonor.

9. Then will I confess that thy right hand can save.

10. But lo, take the wild beasts into thy estimate; they eat grass like the cattle,

11. And, lo his strength is in his loins, and his might in the navel of his belly.

12. He stands his tail like a cypress, and his sinews are woven together.

13. His sides are sides of brass, and his back-bone cast-iron.

14. This one is a beginning of the Lord's plastic work, made for his angels to amuse themselves with.

15. And when he approached the edge of the mountain precipice he caused merriment to the four-footed in Tartarus (the black abysmal depths of the sea below)

16. He lieth down under shady tree, beside the papyrus plant and the reed and the bonlomos (a plant like the papyrus growing in marshy places)

17. And great trees with their branches afford him shade and the succulent shoots of the field.

18. If a freshet should occur he will not heed it: he trusts that the Jordan will tumble into his mouth.

19. With his eye he will take it in; he will turn up his nose at it with a scornful twist.

20. And will thou lead drake (the dragon) with a hook; and will thou put a halter about his nose?

21. Or will thou fasten a ring in his snout, and will thou ornament his lip with a pendent trinket?

22. And will he speak softly to thee, beseech thee entreatingly?

23. And will he make a covenant with thee, and will thou take him for (an eternal aiwnion) bond-servant for life?

24. And will thou play with him as with a bird, or will thou tie him up as a young bird for a child?

25. Forsooth nations may make a meal of him, and nations of Phoenicians might distribute him around?

26. A whole flotilla of boats gathered together could not carry a hide from his tail, and his head in the boats of fishermen.

27. Should'st thou lay a hand on him though, remember the battle that took place and never let it happen again.

CHAPTER XLI.

28. Thou hast not seen him, nor wondered at what has been said?

1. Hast not feared because he hath been prepared by me? Who is he that withstandeth me?

2. Or who will withstand me and abide? If all that is beneath the sky is mine,

3. I shall not keep silence because of him, and show mercy at a word of might like to his.

4. Who will uncover the face of his covering, and who will penetrate the overlappings of his breast-plate?

5. Who will open the gates of his face? There is fear round about his teeth.

6. His insides are brazen shields and his putting together like polished stone.

7. One by one they join and a breath cannot go between them.

8. As a man will have cleaved to his brother they hold together and may not be separated.

9. With his sneeze a gleam is enkindled and his eyes have the appearance of Hesperos (the morning-bringer, or Lat. Lucifer).

10. From his mouth there goeth forth as it were lighted lamps and they scatter like coals of fire from a hearth.

11. From his snout there goeth forth smoke of a furnace kindled with a fire of coal

12. His soul (living body here) is coals, and a flame of fire goeth its way out of his mouth.

13. In his neck dynamic power resideth, and loss runneth before him.

14. And the flesh of his body hath been cemented together. It is cast (like melted iron) upon him; it may not be stirred.

15. His heart hath become as hard as a stone and he is as unassailable as the highest summits of things.

16. When he turned, fear was upon the four-footed wild beasts who were caught.

17. If companies of spear-men should meet him they could do nothing:

18. For he hath accounted an iron spear and a shield to be chaff and brazen armor to be like rotten wood.

19. A brazen bow may not pierce him; he hath accounted a rock-hurler grass.

20. Battle-axes have been accounted reeds and he laugheth at a fire-charged commotion of the elements.

21. His couch is sharp-pointed spits, and all the gold of the sea is in his estimation as it were clay that is unaccounted.

22. He maketh the abysmal depth to boil like a brazen cauldron; and he thinketh the sea as it were something to be wiped out;

23. And the black depth (Tartarus) of the abyss (the "pit" in Common Version) as it were something to be led away captive: he hath accounted the abysmal depth (the "pit" again) something to be walked about in.

24. There is nothing upon the earth like to him made for my angels to amuse themselves with.

25. He seeth every high thing, and he is king of all [illegible] in the waters.

CHAPTER XLII.

1. And Job taking up the discourse saith unto the Lord,

2. I know that thou hast all ability, and that nothing is impossible with thee,

3. Yea, who is he who hideth thee in counsel, and is sparing of words (ῥηματων) and thinketh to hide thee; and who will tell me what I do not know, great and wondrous things of which I have not had an exact knowledge.

4. But hear me, O Lord; allow me also to speak plainly; and I will ask thee and do thou teach me.

5. I had heard of thee before with the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye hath seen thee.

6. Therefore I make little of myself and come to nought (like melted) and account myself dust and ashes.

7. And it came to pass after the Lord had spoken all these words (ῥηματα) unto Job, the Lord said unto Eliphaz the Themanite, thou hast sinned, thou and thy two friends. For ye have not spoken in my sight anything true as my servant Job hath. (The word for servant here is "courtier" at the court of a king.)

As I said at the outset, the object in view in giving this oracular passage of God's word in its integrity was twofold; first to show any inquiring reader who will take the trouble to read and compare, how far the C. V., and the R. V., and all the versions I have seen fall short of giving the thought, the whole thought and nothing but the thought of the oracle, in its wonderful suggestiveness and fulness on many scientific as well as doctrinal points difficult to understand. Second to show what it was in the estimation of God that Job lacked after God had pronounced him "just," and how this oracular teaching convicted and convinced Job that he was "just" only in the sense of being "justified," and that he was in reality "nothing" of himself except "dust and ashes."

There was no "immortal soul" talk in Job's final confession to which this "oracular" teaching brought him. It was rather an utter "laying down" of all that he had and was, just as Christ in his teaching requires, that God might "raise him up" "a new creation." And every one who is in "Christ is a new creation." This is the lesson and may God carry it home in the integrity of his "spoken word" to any who like Job are hugging to their breasts the delusion that they are going to be "accounted just" and stand before God under some other "verdict" than the one that hath been divinely revealed through Jesus Christ our Lord, who came "to bring immortality to light" as we'll as to show angels and mankind "how God could be just and the Justifier of the Irreverent," a "mystery," "an inscrutable thing" in Job's time to angels as well as men, "but which now hath been revealed," but which requires us to become absolutely "beggars for the spirit," not "poor in spirit," and to say as Job did "I will ask thee and do thou teach me." "Ye have an unction from the sanctified (or holy spirit) and have no need that any one teach you." "The unction which ye have received therefrom abideth in you." "Moreover as this same unction teacheth you of all things and is true and not false; and even as it hath taught you abide therein."

And the result of this teaching will always be enlightened reason. "For ye are renewed by the renewing of your mind." Don't ignore your "common sense" then, for this is your highest natural gift in Adam.

Messianic Predictions: A Critic Criticised.

In a sermon on the Revision of the Old Testament version, a clergyman in New York is reported as having said recently: "The famous passage in Isaiah, which has been chief proof text for the dogma of the miraculous conception, has long been of more than questionable authority. The consensus of scholarly judgment is that the word there rendered virgin should properly be translated a young wife. The passage has no possible reference to anything beyond the horizon of the immediate day in which Isaiah was speaking. It is only by the most arbitrary and unnatural emphasis upon the description of the young woman, and upon [the title given to the young child that any possible allusion can be found to Jesus. The doctrine of the immaculate conception must stand or fall upon the historic evidence of the New Testament, and not upon such flimsy foundation as that which theologians have laid in this passage of Isaiah."

One wonders in reading this whether the man who makes these statements is simply ignorant, or whether he expects, by bold assertion, to set aside the learned conclusions of others, and mislead the ignorant. Charity suggests the former conclusion, and if this be true, profound indeed must be the ignorance of the man who can assert: "The consensus of scholarly judgment is that the word there rendered virgin '(Behold a virgin shall conceive)' should properly be translated a young woman or a young wife."

This is a bold assertion. It may be the consensus of Jews, and some modern German writers: it is not the opinion of Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Eusebius, Bishop Pearson, or Bishop Wordsworth. The Hebrew word Maalmah, translated "virgin," comes from the root alam, to hide, to keep at home; Bishop Wordsworth adds, "As Eastern virgins were kept," and therefore rendered apokruphos by Aquila, a Jew. In Hebrew there are two words used to describe the state of virginity, bethula, which describes the virgin state as such, and almah, which describes a virgin growing up, approaching marriageable age, and "can denote (says Hengstenberg) nothing else than puella nubilis." But still more decisive is the usus loquendi. In Arabic and Syrio the corresponding words are never used of married women, and Jerome remarks that in the "Punic dialect also, a virgin proper is called almah."

It is true Gesenius says that almah in this passage is improperly translated virgin, and should be a young woman, or a young wife, but this is merely the assertion of a Jew, who would naturally oppose the reference of Isa. vii. 14 to the Messiah, which is utterly unsupported by evidence.

In the Hebrew Scriptures, besides the passage in Isaiah the word almah is used elsewhere six times, viz., Prov. xxx. 19, Gen. xxiv. 43, Ex. ii. 8, Psa. lxviii. 25, Song of Sol. i. 3, vi. 8; and in those passages the word is undeniably used of unmarried persons.

Hengstenberg says:—"In the Christian Church throughout all ages the Messianic explanation was the prevailing one. It was held by all the fathers of the Church, and by all other Christian commentators down to the middle of the eighteenth century." Luther's remark is even now in full force: "If a Jew or a Christian can prove to me that in any passage of Scripture almah means 'married woman,' I will give him a hundred florins, although God alone knows where I may find them."

Ptolemy Philadelphus, 280 years B. C., sent for seventy learned Jews, who, according to Josephus, each one by himself made a translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek. The translations were collected, and the Septuagint was placed in the Alexandria library, and was appointed to be read in the eastern synagogues, where Hebrew was not understood. The seventy united in translating almah by the Greek word parthenos which has never any other meaning than virgin.

But, says our modern Nestor: "The passage has no possible reference to anything beyond the horizon of the immediate day in which Isaiah was speaking." This is the old assertion of Trypho the Jew, with whom Justin Martyr had a controversy towards the end of the second century, and most ably refuted his allegations. Trypho says: "The whole prophecy refers to Hezekiah, and it is proved that it was fulfilled in him, according to the terms of this prophecy."

So far is this from being true, this sign was given and this promise made ("a virgin shall conceive and bear a son") at some time in the reign of Ahaz. This "Ahaz reigned but sixteen years in Jerusalem" (2 Kings xvi. 1); and Hezekiah, his son, who succeeded him, "was twenty and five years old when he began to reign" (2 Kings xviii. 2), and therefore was born several years before Ahaz was king, and consequently not now to be conceived when this sign was given (vide Bishop Pearson). How strikingly all this illustrates the saying that the interpretations of modern rationalistic writers, if investigated, will usually be found to be old falsehoods, uttered and exposed sometimes hundreds of years ago.

The modern sage who, by the study of modern rationalistic writers, has learned how to interpret the Bible, and so is competent to teach his brethren how rightly to use it, asserts with emphatic dogmatism: "The famous passage in Isaiah, which has been the chief proof text for the dogma of the miraculous conception (of our Lord) has long been of more than questionable authority." We come to examine this, and it requires very little learning for the purpose, and we find Trypho the Jew quoting for his purpose Theodotion and Aquila, also Jews, making the same statement before the close of the second century, and that he was most completely and satisfactorily answered by Justin Martyr. Irenæus also, in the same century, ably answered the heretics of his day, having left us an exhaustive examination of this very passage of Isaiah. Our preacher goes on: "The consensus of scholarly judgment is that the word rendered virgin," etc. We examine this, and find that the Hebrew will not bear it; the Greek translation will not bear it; every Christian writer of note, from the fathers down, many of them, be it remembered, men of profound learning, with a knowledge of Hebrew and Greek, which puts to shame much of the modern superficiality, condemns it; so that the paraded consensus is, after all, simply that of Jews and rationalists.

It would seem that the fact that Matthew quotes this very passage from Isaiah, and tells us that it was a prophecy of the birth of the Messiah, and was fulfilled in our Blessed Lord, ought to settle the question, Jews and rationalists to the contrary notwithstanding, but when the inspiration of even the Gospel is questioned, of course their authority is questionable. In view of this amply dogmatism one is tempted to exclaim with Holofernes in the drama: "O then monster ignorance, how deformed dost thou look!"—J. T. Mulyon, in Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

The Restitution advocates the total restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouths of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christian King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked (eternal) life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion, as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential to final salvation.

Communications.

Will the World Be Converted before Christ's Second Advent?

This would seem to be the almost universal belief which prevails throughout Christendom. Among the Christian Churches throughout, not only this country, but throughout Europe and other countries, donations are solicited for the purpose of sending the gospel to the heathen world, for the purpose of converting them to Christianity. So far it is in perfect accord with Christ's last commission to his Apostles, to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature, he that believeth [the gospel] shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned, [condemned] Mark xvi. 15, 16.

The language of this commission implies that not all to whom this gospel should be preached would believe and obey the same.

But it is the imperative duty of Christ's servants to go and proclaim the "glad tidings" of the Kingdom of God, (the gospel) and when those servants shall have performed their duty, then their responsibility ceases. God will take care of the results. If Jehovah's word is faithfully proclaimed, it will not return unto him void, but it will accomplish the object for which it was sent, even if the world should not be converted according to our unwarranted expectation. This expectation, (the conversion of the world) prior to Christ's second coming, will be found to be fallacious, when we consult Acts of the Apostles xv. 14-18; particularly the 14 verse. Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles to take out of them a people for his name. To take out of them a people for his name, is stronger than mere implication, that the masses of the Gentiles will not believe, or heed the gospel call, and of course, that is the only channel and medium of salvation. Decadence is written as with an iron pen on all human governments. Their past history is replete with it, not only as taught from sacred, but profane history.

The present state of the nations is indicative of decadence. We need look no further than our own country, which is universally admitted to be the purest government extant; yet this is becoming proverbial for its corruption; the principles upon which our republic was based, are being set aside, and we are aping the fashions, and imbibing the same principles, which our fathers fought and bled to overthrow. This may not be so apparent to those who are young or in middle life; but to those who are aged like myself (being nearly 85) and who can well remember the state of things which existed 70 years ago, and so institute a comparison between that time and the present, that would cause grief but for the fact, that this is a cause of rejoicing, as Christ has said, that "When ye see these things, (this is one in the series) then lift up your heads and rejoice that your redemption is nigh." Believing or rather knowing, these things, it is not strange, that those who believe the gospel of the kingdom, and that all the blessings promised, must come through the kingdom arrangement, and that the present kings and rulers must first be deposed—the present kingdoms must be destroyed, (not converted, as is erroneously taught) before the kingdom of God can be set up or established.

The relation which the present four kingdoms sustains to the fifth or Christ's universal kingdom, is very graphically set forth in Psa. ii.

1. Why do the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing?

2. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord and against his anointed, saying,

3. Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cord from us.

4. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision.

5. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath and vex them in his sore displeasure.

6. Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion.....

8. Ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.

This eighth verse is often seized upon by our post-millennium friends as proof of the conversion of the heathen to Christianity, and taking this isolated, or disconnected from the context, and it would rather seem to favor that idea, but let us read the context; the 9th verse particularly.

Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron: thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.

In the xi. chapter of Daniel, he uses the strongest language possible, to set forth the decadence of the four kingdoms which will precede the fifth or everlasting kingdom. The symbols employed are significant as to this fact. He describes the conversion in the following language in the 44 and 45 verses, chapter xi.

And in the days of these kings (symbolized by the 10 toes,) shall the God of the heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to another people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever.

Forasmuch as thou sawest the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the silver and the gold; the great God hath made known what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure. This interpretation by Daniel of the four kingdoms, in all of their different phases, from the head of gold of the first, down to the toes of the fourth does not symbolically, to say nothing of the plain testimony, favor in the least, the idea of the conversion of the world, before the final subjugation or conquest. In Daniel vii. the symbolization of the deterioration is still more striking if possible, i. e., from the lion, a noble beast, down to a nondescript, a terrible beast, as the last phase of Gentile rule or power. In Psalms cxlix. after the exhortation to Israel to rejoice and praise the Lord, from the 6-9 verses it reads thus, Let the high praises of God be in their mouth and a sharp two-edged sword be in their hand. To execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people:—To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron.

To execute upon them the judgments written: the honor have all the saints. A perfect parallel to this is found in Dan. vii. 21, to the end, will be found the tragic scenes to be enacted at the close of Gentile times. The reader is requested to read the whole chapter. If the words employed by the spirit has any meaning, they are to show that instead of the world being converted, i. e. in the common acceptation of the term, it will be by conquest, by subjugation by Christ with the saints, as his co-workers.

Editor Restitution:

Thinking that some of the old veterans of 43, 47, and 50, and 87, would like to know what their aged pilgrim brother has been about since his last notes of labor appeared in THE RESTITUTION, therefore I write.

First, I have attended to my own business and let other people's alone.

Second, from January 10th, I remained at my own home, spending my time in study, writing, reading, and giving instruction to all who sought knowledge of me, or that I had an opportunity to impart it to.

Upon the opening of the spring, I engaged in the labor necessary to be done on our grounds, and upon the roads becoming settled, and the weather favorable, I started out on my much loved work. Spent a number of first days with the brethren and friends near Foothill, Ont., preaching the kingdom of God and the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ, and the signs of the times and the fulfilment of prophecy, and the preparation to meet the Lord at his coming. Immersed one young man, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins.

Spent a number of first days with the brethren and friends in Darlington and vicinity. As usual our Chapel was well filled with attentive hearers—closing our services by eating the memorial supper. As usual I visited them all at their own homes, with pleasure to myself and I believe to them. To the glory of God, I say it, they did their duty to me, and I endeavored to do mine to them.

By the request of Brother Cronkhite, who resides in Alliston, Ont., I made a visit to that place, (this being a new field,) and gave five discourses, selected by Brother C., without my knowledge, and advertised in the village newspaper, to attentive congregations, the majority being members of the "New organised church of the Latter Day Saints." This church has no connection with Brigham Young or his party.

The ministers belonging to the so-called orthodox churches, did their best to keep their people away from our meetings, and they succeeded quite well, hence our congregations were not as large as Brother C. expected. But I had great liberty in presenting the truth, which will prove a savor of "life unto life," or "death unto death." Brother C. reminds me of Lot in Sodom.

From A., I went to Collingwood, and spent about three days—visited the lovers of truth at their own homes, where I had pleasant seasons in conversing upon vital truths.

On Sunday I presented a subject in the Chapel belonging to the Disciple Church, selected by Brother Duggeon, Mayor of the town, to an intelligent congregation, who gave their undivided attention during its delivery, which occupied two hours. By them my needs were not forgotten. I am always at home with these lovers of truth. But one thing caused me much grief during my visit. Death had laid its hand upon Sister Duggeon since my last visit among them. She was a jewel, and a bright and brilliant star in the Church of God. But she will live again when Jesus comes, and this is consoling for Brother D., and his children, and the brethren. Sister D. was a true friend of Mrs. Lyon. More anon.

Editor Restitution:

By your kind permission, I will offer a short report of our Conference meeting just closed. Meeting commenced Sep. 25th, and continued over Sunday. The meeting was well attended by brethren from a distance. Brother and sister Morris came some two hundred miles to enjoy this meeting; others came a corresponding distance. Brother Adams just got moved near here in time for the meeting. He is, we understand from Missouri, and others from different directions. The brethren Chaplin, Vickery and others from near Gouda Springs, made a general turn out; and others that we had never met before. Here we all met on one common plane to renew our covenants, to bear words of comfort, something to gladden our hearts, and thus further us on our pilgrimage journey. The acquaintance of these brethren and sisters made at this meeting will long be remembered.

Preaching brethren present, Moore, O. C. Ramsay, Wilkins of this state, N. J. Henry, of Galva, Illinois.

Brother Moore did most of the preaching. Brother Ramsay gave one discourse on Sunday at eleven o'clock. Brother Henry did no speaking, just recovering from a sick spell; but gave us a discourse last Sunday on theology, showing by unmistakable evidence and history where we are living. In short the discourses were of a general character of a restitution order.

Sad to know, yet true, that some become offended and hurt at some of the preaching as regards the wicked dead notions. Now brethren, let me say once for all, that while I am a firm believer in a complete restitution to life, I am at a loss to know many of the wicked dead will accept the blessings of eternal life. That God's purposes from the beginning will be carried out to the letter we believe. Life was lost, life will be restored. I therefore think best that we let God settle the controversy if all of Adam's race is saved. Amen. If any be condemned it is God that justifies. Let us feel that we are in the hands of a just God who will do all things well. Don't let us conclude too soon, while we are in the mist, God will conclude the matter when the time comes, and he will send his Son e'er long. May we be ready. I have hoped that all hobby ponies would dry up like chaff and blow away. Take up the commission, then perhaps men and women would do as on the Day of Pentecost. What must I do to be saved. I have every confidence that judgment and justice will be given to every son and daughter of Adam's race, and as to how it will be done I cannot say, neither am I authorised, while it seems unnecessary, for God has appointed a day for that purpose, and we understand that the gospel is making its selection to execute God's plan. Better we wait till the time comes to do this great work. O, brethren, it pains my very heart to see and hear of so much speculation, and done in such a way that it makes sad hearts. Brethren, stop and think, preach to the living, get as many into the Christ as possible.

Now to one and all that I have written, I have not designedly tried to trammel or hurt feelings. No, no, God forbid, but rather caution. Outside the strained positions concerning the wicked dead, everything went off lovely. Now, brethren, let us all examine ourselves by the rule laid down in God's word, and for the love of mercy let us labor to enter into that rest that remains for the people of God. Our next meeting may be in the kingdom of God, may it soon come with our Head the Christ and all of the faithful waiting ones.

Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly. J. S. Miller.

OBEDIENT SERVICE.

An address delivered at the Mildmay Conference, London, England, June 24, 1885, by Canon Wynne, of Dublin.

It is recorded of a certain great philosopher that a friend who went to visit him met the philosopher's little daughter before he met the philosopher himself. Knowing the father was such a deeply learned man, the friend thought that the little girl must have learned something from him very deep, something very grave from her very learned father. So he said to the little girl, "What is your father teaching you?" The little maid looked up to him with her clear, blue eyes, and just said the word, "Obedience." This was what the great, wise man taught his little girl, and I believe that is the most important lesson for children, to learn to be obedient. It is a lesson necessary for their happiness and for their safety; I think we may say necessary for their very life.

And after all, what are we? Grown people of this great world so full of mysteries, what are we after all but weak, ignorant little children? How little we know of what is around us and what is before us. How little we know what may be the consequences even of our own acts. Manifestly, therefore, the most important lesson for us to learn is the child-like lesson of obedience. And it is our Father's wish above all to teach us this lesson. A lesson that we are to begin to practice upon earth, and to practice for evermore when we serve him day and night among the angels.

I am glad that it has fallen to me this evening to have the great privilege of trying with you to learn this great principle of Christian service and of human life, to join with you in learning a lesson in obedience. The little verse suggested to us in the programme on the subject of obedience is exceedingly helpful, as showing us the ground and the measure of Christian obedience. "Whatsoever [says the mother of the Lord Jesus to the servants] He saith unto you, do it."—John ii, 5. I do believe that in that word "He" we have the foundation of our obedience. "Whatsoever he saith."

The mother of our Lord knew who he was. She knew something of the solemn, sacred mystery of his Divinity. She knew much, through daily intimacy, of the tenderness, the gentleness, the sympathy of his human love. She knew that whatever he said must be the wisest and the best thing to do. So we see that the great foundation of obedience is personal knowledge of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

If the Lord Jesus is a stranger to us we cannot obey him. If there are any in this room who have not a personal acquaintance with him, I cannot say to you, "Go and obey him." You could not do it. If there should be any among us here who do not personally know the Lord Jesus, we can but join in prayer that he would by his Spirit make himself known to all such hearts. But when we know him as Lord and King, as our Savior who has loved us, and who has given himself for us, as our personal, loving friend, always with us, more deeply interested in our happiness by far than we are ourselves, have we not then the desire and the longing to serve and to obey

COMPARATIVELY poor health for a few weeks past, coupled with cares and duties ordinary and extraordinary, has prevented writing Editorially to much extent. Next week the Board will decide the question of Editorial supervision, so far as our loved paper is concerned, for another year. In our past connection with THE RESTITUTION we have tried to do what we could—like the woman in the gospel—though others might have done a great deal better.

Church Notables Expressing Themselves.

Free thought and free speech are characteristics of our times. Old creeds are thrown into the crucible of searching investigation, and in this fire-test the fine gold of divine truth is found to be greatly alloyed with human error. In a recent Church Congress two men, denominationally notable, expressed themselves in a somewhat remarkable manner. Bishop Williams spoke of truth in its general comprehensiveness, while Canon Farrar made the doctrine of the atonement his subject for special remark. When Galileo was compelled by the Inquisitive Church (?) to abjure his teachings on the earth's motion and the sun's stability, clad in sackcloth and kneeling, he is said to have spoken, in an undertone, upon rising from the earth these words:—E pur si muove—"and yet it moves." In theology "the world moves." An imprimatur from the "Supreme Quack" is no longer necessary before a book can be printed, or a doctrine promulgated contravening the jargon of Papal Rome. Truth, simple, precious, and pure is to be found in God's word alone. It would be a Reformation worthy the name if Protestantism were divested of every rag that ever belonged to the robe of the Mother of Harlots. We now subjoin the expressions alluded to above:—

Bishop Williams in welcoming the Congress said: We live in the time of searching criticism of truth; the broken moulds in which it has been cast lie all about us, and we need divine wisdom to guide us in recasting it in forms that will retain all its spirit and divine force.

Canon Farrar's exposition of the doctrine of the Atonement was far from being as radical as many of his hearers had expected. He quoted the words of the Bible, the Creeds and the Articles of the church on the subject, with the declaration, "All this I fervently believe;" but he denied that any theory of the atonement had ever been accepted by the church catholic, and reviewed many theories, showing their errors, and claiming that, while we put our whole trust in Christ and look on his atonement as the one source of our hope, we are not obliged to accept any of the theories of men concerning it, although its blessed results are the joy and thanksgiving of our lives. "Faith," he said, "in the atonement, the belief that Jesus lived and died for us and that by his life and death we are saved, is an essential part of our common Christianity. It is the key of the evangelical position. Into this faith all who profess and call themselves Christians are invited. Without this faith the gospel is robbed of its most central meaning and message." But with regard to much of its purport, we must learn to say, we do not know, and not attempt to fly up into the secrets of Deity on the waxen wings of the theological understanding."

Speaking of the ages between Cherry and Louis XV. Catholic to his Friends Revolution, says:—"Alas! of their sins, World History can take no account; they have become comprised in the annals of mankind: blotted out in appearance, which indeed they are. Napoleon says, wherein, if ever in any, lies an unhappiness to be born? To be born, and to learn only, by every revelation and example, that God's vengeance is Devil's and a lie; and the Supreme Good the blessed of none!"

Literary Notices.

Babyland.—Happy in conception, and beautiful in style and execution, this periodical is for the tiny learner the ne plus ultra. Babyland is really the baby's library. Now is a good time to subscribe as the Christmas number will thus be secured as a present. Address D. Lothrop & Co. Boston, Mass., 75 cents a year.

The Phrenological Journal.—The November number of this well known literary periodical is on our table. First in its varied contents is a tersely written biography and portrait of the late Stephen H. Tyng, D. D., with a good portrait. In a following article virtue and vice are pictured in expressive mute, and, at the same time, dissected by the pen of a very ready writer. Another paper—Influence of Inebriety on Civilization—is a well-written and well-timed contribution. To new subscribers the numbers for the last three months of this year are offered free. Address Fowler & Wells Co., 753 Broadway, New-York. Terms $2 a year.

As numbers of our subscribers are interested in matters regarding the Public Domain, we subjoin the following notice of the American Settler's Guide a copy of which has just come to hand. "Henry N. Copp, the Land Lawyer of Washington, D. C., sends the ninth edition of Copp's Settler's Guide, an indispensible book to all who are interested in public land. A chapter, illustrated with numerous cuts, shows how to tell township, section, and quarter-section corners, and explains the system of Government surveys. It gives the latest rulings and instructions under the homestead, pre-emption, timber culture, desert land, and other laws. The price of the book is only 25 cents. It will tell you who is entitled to enter land; how continuous your residence must be; what improvements you must make; what affidavits you must swear to; all about contests, and on what grounds they can be commenced; also about state lands, stone and timber lands, mineral lands, desert entries, saline, railroad, coal, townsite, and other lands; scrip, warrant, and other entries. Its purchase will save money and trouble, as erroneous statements circulated by conversation among settlers may, if acted on, cost you a contest, perhaps your land and improvements."

The New Song.

I made a short call at Brother Carter's, a neighbor of mine, and seeing an organ in the room, I asked the young folks to sing a piece of music. They sang a piece, I should call the New Song, very good and very pleasant music. John, the Beloved, sees 144,000 stand on Mount Zion. They sang as it were, a new song, the same new song David wrote. Three thousand years since the ninety-eighth Psalm, and no man could learn that song but the one hundred and forty-four thousand. They were the first fruits unto God and the Lamb. I suppose the first fruits of the new dispensation, the twelve thousand of each of the tribes of the children of Israel, they were sealed in their foreheads. This song is appropriate for them, as the song sung by Miriam and her companions was proper for them to sing on the banks of the Red Sea. This company were virgins, suggesting their relation to the parable of the ten virgins in Matthew.

O sing unto the Lord a new song, for he hath done wonderous things, his right hand hath gotten him the victory. The Lord hath made known his salvation, his righteousness hath he openly shown in the sight of all the heathen. He hath remembered his mercy and his truth towards the house of Israel. All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.

Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all the earth, make a loud noise and rejoice and sing praise. Sing unto the Lord with a harp, with the harp and the voice of a Psalm, with trumpets and the sound of the cornet, make a joyful noise before the Lord the King.

Let the sea roar and the fullness thereof, the world and they that dwell therein. Let the floods clap their hands, let the hills be joyful together, before the Lord, for he cometh to judge the earth, with righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity. Rev. xiv. And I heard a voice from heaven as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder, and I heard the voice of harpers, harping with their harps.

OTHA BOARDMAN.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

The cloud which has appeared over the horizon of Europe may portend war. It is no bigger than a man's hand now, but it may rapidly assume larger dimensions. From whence come wars? Can no peace societies stop them? Can no arbitrations avail to supplant the appeal to the 'sword? From whence come wars and fightings among you? St. James asks and answers the question by another. "Come they not hence, even of your lusts?" Nations are full of "lusts," and these lusts must be satisfied. Lust for territory is politely concealed under such phrases as "rectification of frontier," "scientific boundaries," "adjustment of the balance of power." But why do frontiers need alterations, and boundaries need altering? Why the present tension among the armed nations of Europe, on the "Eastern Question"? Why need there be nine millions of men kept under arms?

There is a disturbing element secretly at work which no diplomacy, combination of powers, or treaties can control. That disturbing element is the absence of the nation of Israel from their own land. Wars cannot cease until that nation is reinstated. The dispossession of the nation has been followed by an unbroken series of wars and conquests and evermore the storm clouds seem eddying round this quarter of the world.

In Deut. xxxii. 7, 9, it is written, "Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations; ask thy father, and he will show thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee. When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." When God settles boundaries they will be unalterable. There will be no lasting settlement, then, until "the people" of the Lord are restored to their inheritance, and they shall have acknowledged and submitted to Jesus Messiah. He maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth; He breaketh the bow and cutteth the spear in sunder, (Psa. xlvi. 9). In praying for the peace of Jerusalem, we are praying for the peace of the nations surrounding Jerusalem.

General Gordon's prediction, dated March, 1880, that Bulgaria and Roumelia would, before long, be united, though Europe did not wish it, received its fulfilment a few days ago. The Great Powers may decree as they please, but there is a Greater Power which works all things after the counsel of its own will. The wheels of time are travelling on in the track of a Divine purpose, and statesmen find that they have to follow rather than to lead. Concerning the Ottoman Empire, we read in the foreign correspondence of The Times. It cannot be disguised that the very essence of Mussulman rule in Europe inevitably involves its disappearance."

After giving reasons for this conclusion the writer goes on to say—"Logic requires the successive enfranchisement of the Christian provinces from the Papal and Imperial rule of the Mussulmans; and the great effort of Europe consists in staving off, in the interests of peace this inevitable consummation." There is a King eternal and immortal, though "invisible," concerning whom it may be written on the walls of every council chamber in the world: "The nation and kingdom that will not serve Thee shall perish." Let it be remembered, also, that this is as true in London, as in Constantinople.

The above I copy from "The Christian," London. Our glorious Deliverer is coming. Even so, come quickly.

Extracts from Letters.

Sister S. T. Palmer, of Norwalk, O., sends her subscription for a year, and adds:

THE RESTITUTION is a welcome friend, comforting and encouraging us on our way to the heavenly land, where Christ is to be our King, and will reign in righteousness. May the Lord bless you in your labor.

Brother J. M. Fike, of Stockton, Kan., after renewing his subscription, has these good words for us:

I do not want to be without our excellent paper, though money is scarce and hard to get here at three per cent. a month. We have had quite a boom here, as the railroad is building, and this will be the terminus for a while. The kingdom is near, and the Redeemer will soon come. Amen.

Sister Charlotte Fisher, of Gilead, Ind., says:

Inclosed find one dollar for the paper, as I cannot think of doing without it. I cannot go to hear any preaching, as I am old and feeble, and may not need anything long, but I must have THE RESTITUTION while I stay in this world.

A card from Brother Richard Ballsback, of Montana, Ind., says: Brother and Sister Woodward are still holding meetings here. Three have come out for baptism, and we think others will soon follow. The meetings will continue over next Sunday (Nov. 1.)

Asia possesses the most powerfully equipped hornets. The Indian Medical Gazette tells of a man who was bitten on the neck by one of them. Within ten minutes he became cold, pulseless and unconscious. He was a robust man, but the use of active remedies only brought him to after a couple of hours. The hornet was of medium size, bright yellow and striped with black.

The Great Listener.

It was the opinion of some of the fathers, that since Malachi signifies in the Hebrew "My angel," he was a veritable angel, descended from heaven to close the sacred canon of the Old Testament, and to utter the last note of warning to the Church, before Shiloh came.—Others believed Ezra and Malachi were the same individual. He informs us that amid all the secret abominations of the wicked—amid all the silent prayers and holy deeds fragrant with virtue, however unknown, are not unseen or unheard. There is one who is the Great Listener. "For the Lord hearkened and heard." However the evil thoughts or guilty acts may be remembered, there is a book of remembrance for the righteous, written by the pen of mercy in rosy characters of love. This Great Listener has the most perfect method of hearing.—Our ears are become dull in hearing. Blunders are uttered which we never hear—praises given which reach us not. If a receiver be exhausted of its air by degrees, the bell within rings fainter, until its tones die away, and the bell is rung on, but all is as silent as the grave. Remove the surrounding air, and with one hand discharge a cannon, and yet would you hear no sound,—that which now shakes the foundations of our dwellings would be no louder than a whisper. But he who listens from above depends upon no created media. Should there be a solitary being far beyond those burning sapphires, who has wandered where the wing of an angel never dared venture, or where man never sent out a solitary thought, and there hold communings with his spirit, he that sits in the heavens hears those secret, silent thoughts.

The sons of men must be near to the sounds they desire to hear, else they reach not their ears. Instances have occurred where parents have stood on the lofty head-lands and have beheld the ocean fiercely vexed, and the vessel that contained a son wrecked, and amid the angry billows their child sent up his last prayer, but they heard it not; but what infinite number of leagues can the arithmetic of man or angel compute, what vast intervals of untraveled solitudes in space, across which the faintest thought cannot be heard by the Divine ear.

Suppose that one of the countless orbs of the great empire of Jehovah was to break away from its sphere and fly off for millions and millions of leagues; that its population should see their sun lessening, and dimming in the mighty distance into a mere glimmering star, and at length should cease to see it in the immeasurable expanse; conceive if that world in its long journey should pass star after star, and sun after sun, system after system, and should travel beyond the boundaries of all created things, into the starless, sunless void; suppose that world should journey on, age after age, further and further from the throne of God, and there be planted a way-mark, to tell how far and how long it had journeyed; conceive that world to move on other ages, and over still more distant interval, of space until the imagination droops on its wearied wings: and should its wretched inhabitants from that far-off world lift up a prayer from those deep and distant solitudes, thinkest thou the Great Listener could not hear?

A defective organ prevents ofttimes the children of men from hearing the sweetest strains of music, or voice of faithful friend. There be parents who have never heard the joyous tones of their own babes, and sons and daughters who will never hear the accents of parental lips, until they hear them first in the kingdom of God. No such defects can ever prevent the Lord from knowing the most secret thoughts of men.—Everywhere present, he fills the universe.—Wherever he is, he is there to listen. Hence the most secret, silent wish in the depth of the soul is heard as clearly by that ear as will be the last trump of the Archangel.

He listens to every murmuring thought.—How smiling, how amiable, how reverent seems the general aspect of the community to the eye of man. Who could believe that beneath that gentle current there flow such dark and bitter waters, such discontent, and rebellion? There be many who for a crown and kingdom could not be persuaded to utter aloud their secret thoughts against a holy Providence. Multitudes there are, who could never again stand up in human society, should their silent thoughts be published to the world, who would never consent to utter them for a thousand worlds in the ear of the dearest bosom friend. But while we conceal them from our fellow-beings, as we dare hope to conceal them from the knowledge of him who listens at the door of every heart in the universe?

What reader of these lines would dare enter his closet, and with no human eye or ear present, write out his wicked thoughts of God, and look at them in all their full meaning? And yet while we are afraid to put them down on paper, the recording angel writes them all in the book of remembrance above.

When Latimer was examined before his martyrdom, he tells us he heard behind the arras the moving of a pen. "How careful was I what I said." Although we see not that Listener, nor hear the moving of that recording pen, still not a desire, nor hope, nor lust passes the mind, but is daguerreotyped, in the book which will be opened. He listens to our repinings at our lot and the hardships we endure, forgetting that where he sends one affliction, he sends a thousands mercies—where one friend proves a traitor, a hundred remain faithful.—Yet we murmur because with many bright sunny days, he sends one dark tempestuous one, or amid myriads of exalted blessings he sends one rod.

Two thousand years since, the prisoners in a dungeon in Syracuse thought their plans and rebellions were concealed from the tyrant Dyonisius. But they were all revealed to his jealous ear. The form of the ceiling was in the shape of the ear, and there the king placed himself. Thus the heavens encircling our globe may prove a vast ear, and every thought here is distinctly heard in heaven. You secretly envied him who was your rival, and your sinful desire was heard at the throne of God.—When your favorite scheme was scattered, you brooded in sullen, silent rebellion over the ruins, but your guilt was heard in heaven. When you saw Providence seemingly slight you, and pour affluence, and pleasure, and honor in another's lap, you felt in your inmost soul those rebellious thoughts which David cherished, as he saw the wicked flourish. Your dearest friend did not and could not hear those thoughts, but the Great Listener hearkened and heard, and a book of remembrance was written.

Nor is he ever deceived. History informs us of the warrior, who, encased in mail, retired to his tent one night to rest—who on the field of battle never felt the first emotion of fear, but at midnight he heard the beatings of, he knew not what fiend of a death-watch, so that he trembled in his armor. Sleepless hours only increased his dread and deepened his forebodings. The next morning he found they proceeded from a clock standing in a hovel against the wall. But His ear was never thus deceived. In recording all the shades of guilt for thousands of years, not the least mistake has ever occurred. Could we hear the moral results of the secret thoughts of our souls as he hears them in the moments of our interior being, we would be filled with dismay, not unlike the half-starved soldiers of a castle besieged, who placed their ears to the ground, and heard the sound of workmen mining their way under the very foundations of their citadel. Their hearts die within them as they forget the famine in the dread of being overwhelmed by the sudden springing of a mine. If our ear was as open to listen to our murmuring thoughts as to the evil reports of others, how much more music would be heard by an approving conscience. How much oftener the sacred approval: "He hath done what he could." Reader, so live that thou mayest not have cause a dread even while listening to the thoughts of thine heart.

A photograph of a section of the sky has been taken at the Paris Observatory some five degrees square, which shows 8,000 stars on a ten-inch square plate. There are distinctly seen on the plate stars of the fourteenth and fifteenth magnitude. If this portion of the sky is fairly representative, the number of stars, visible to the fourteenth magnitude inclusively, must be more than 20,000,000.

COSTLY CARPETS FOR THE HOLY STONE AT MECCA.

The London Times says: "The silk covering for the Kaaba, which the Sultan sent this year to Mecca, has been valued at $77,000, and that sent by the Khedive for the same purpose at $58,000. Both are black, most richly embroidered in gold and so large that each of them covers entirely the whole Kaaba. On the first day of the Kourban-Bairam festival the new covers were laid on the whole stone in the place of the old covers, one of which was sent to the Sultan, and the other to the Khedive, as presents from the clergy of the mosque."

SUNSTORMS AND RED SUNSETS.

An observation of the sun yesterday at noon showed that still another sunstorm has made its appearance following the disturbance seen last Wednesday. The new disturbance consists of quite an extended group of spots, and its advent has been followed by a new barometric depression and rise of temperature in the Northwest. In some parts of Kansas yesterday the temperature was up to 70 degrees. In Dakota, also, quite warm weather prevailed. With the renewal of the solar storms brilliance of the red light has increased. Last evening it shone behind the clouds with fine effect until darkness came on. The constant fluctuation of the red light with the sunstorms indicates a physical connection.—Inter-Ocean, December 24.

DAMAGE DONE BY AVALANCHES.

The London Times says: "A statistical memoir lately issued by the Italian Government enables us to form some idea of the great destruction caused annually by avalanches in the Alpine districts of Italy and the Tyrol. In the single district of the Val di Susa two avalanches fell on January 18; one at Dorier, between Exilles and Salbertand, was estimated at about sixty meters long and six deep, and slid down the slope a distance of about a kilometer. Its volume is supposed to have been 360,000 cubic meters, and the weight of snow composing it was 45,000 tons. It destroyed sixteen houses and killed forty-three persons. The second avalanche of January 18 fell near Voneus, was 150 meters long, its volume was about 3,000,000 cubic meters, and it bore nearly a quarter of a millions of tons of snow. But although the slide extended to nearly four kilometers only twenty-four houses were wrecked by it and six persons killed. A third avalanche, which fell at Meffetto, and was computed to contain little more than 1,600 tons weight of snow, was much more destructive, killing seventeen persons and destroying eighteen houses."

Easter of next year falls on St. Mark's Day, April 25, its latest possible date. The last time this occurred was in 1726 (old style), and it will not so fall again until 1943.

A mammoth's remains have been discovered near Yreka, Cal., by miners. They were found forty-five feet below the surface. The horn is five and a half feet long, in the shape of a cow's horn, and is eight inches in diameter at the base. The teeth and other bones are of mammoth size. An animal built in proportion to them would weigh at least ten tons when alive. The teeth, horns, etc., show that the animal was of the bovine species.

TO SUBSCRIBERS TO "THE RESTITUTION."

Some have complained because of the several notices we have sent out during the past year, asking for money due us, and for prompt renewals. These complaints say, "We are tired of being dunned." Well, so are we tired of being compelled to say we need what you owe us. When we order a bill of paper, a few days after the goods are received we get a statement, and at the bottom of the sheet is a little note that reads after this style: "Unless otherwise advised, we will pass draft on you on——inst., at 1 days sight, for $——. Please honor and oblige. Should you prefer to remit, please do so on or before——." We know then that the proper thing to do is to get the money from somewhere—but where is somewhere—and be ready to pay the bill. The money must be found. We look over our accounts and find that in the great state of Kansas there are over one hundred of our friends who have asked our leniency because of the grasshoppers, failures of crops, and various reasons. We have continued to send them THE RESTITUTION because we thought them good, true brethren, who would send just as soon as possible. We have helped them when they said they were in need, and when we only ask them to send us what is ours, and has been for months, and in some cases years, they are offended. In other states it is the same as in Kansas. In some places floods, fires, sickness and other reasons are given for delaying to remit.

Now brethren, we do not wish to "dun" any one. We dislike the word "dun" very much. One thing however, must be apparent to you all, and that is that this money to meet bills must come from somewhere, or the machinery must stop sometime. We can think of no better place to go for this money than to our friends, and if all who know themselves to be indebted to us will make the effort, we believe they can make it quite easy for us to pay all bills as fast as they are due. We do not ask one cent of donation otherwise than to send to those too poor to pay. We have been sending the paper to a large number of friends poor in worldly goods but rich in faith, and their letters of gratitude and thankfulness would make a volume. Have you an extra dollar that you can send with your subscription for 1886? If you have it is well worth investing it in blessings from the poor of God's household of faith. We wish to hear from every one who receives a copy of THE RESTITUTION, before the commencement of 1886. Let us know your circumstances, and if you are unable to pay for the paper we can perhaps get some more able brother or sister to continue it for you. If you wish to stop taking it, do not refuse to take it from the Post Office, but pay what is due, and have it discontinued in an honest, business-like way. We have revised our mail list, and all can tell how their account stands by examining the label on their paper, or send a card if in any doubt about it, and a statement will be sent. Do not put this matter off till "next week," or "next month," but remember that NOW is all the time we have, and that we have more time now than we will have next week. Send remittance by bank draft, express money order, post office money orders, or registered letter. Do not send money loose in a letter unless you wish to run the risk of losing it yourself.

Address all letters, and make orders payable to "THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Ind."

MY MOTTO.

"With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men."—Eph. vi. 7.

"With good will doing service,"
A simple little phrase,
And yet I often find it
A help in weary days.
No work so dull and irksome
But brightens at this word:
"With good will doing service,
As unto Christ the Lord."

I oft have tried, but vainly,
To summons the "good will,"
And would have done the service
With heart that murmured still;
But that my little motto
To answer mood suited,
Reminding me that Christians
Should work "as unto Christ."

In roughest toil there may be
A service full as sweet
As going to the temple
To sit at Jesus's feet;
If we will but remember
This little warning word:
"With good will doing service,
As unto Christ the Lord."

God loves a cheerful giver;
Not one who grudgingly
Yields up a scanty service
For all his bounties free.
Let heart and hand and brain, then,
Each its best work afford;
"With good will doing service
As unto Christ the Lord."

THE AGE.—NO. I.

The special boast of this age is its progress. Upon this its self-gratulations are numerous and fervent, as if it not only loved to advance, but to let the world know, as decidedly as possible, how much it thinks itself advancing.

Are these gratulations well founded? Is this progress a reality? Is there not exaggeration in the boasting? Are there not many compensating and neutralizing considerations which go far to raise the question whether, upon the whole, having respect to minus as well as the plus of the items, and looking well at the opposite sides of the great balance-sheet, there has been solid and thorough progress—progress which will abide—progress which has placed the nation or race upon a higher level—spiritually, morally, intellectually, physically.

Let it be allowed that, in many things, the age is one of advancement. Thus much is notable and beyond question. It would be unjust and unthankful, as well as untrue, not to allow this. We admit it ungrudgingly, not reluctantly or through constraint. Into much that is true the age has found its way, and in several provinces of knowledge, unreached by its predecessors, it has made good its footing. Circle after circle has widened round it, and its discoveries are certainly neither shadows nor dust—they are real and solid. No Christian need fear to make this admission, nor think that by so doing he lowers the credit of the Scriptures as the true foundation-head of God-given truth, or casts dishonor upon him, "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge."

The mental philosophy of the age is, in some respects, of a truer kind than heretofore, though still cloudy and unsatisfying—nay, often stumbling into Scepticism, Pantheism, Atheism. The science of the age is prodigiously in advance of former ages. The age's literature is wider in its range, and higher in its aim. Its arts are on a higher and more perfect scale. Its astronomy has searched the heavens far more extensively and profoundly. Its geology has pierced the earth more deeply and successfully. It—the age, we mean—has brought to light law after law in the system of the universe. It speeds over the earth with a rapidity once unknown. It transmits intelligence not only more swiftly than sound, but more swiftly than the light. It is restoring fertility to the soil. It can shut out pain from the body, in circumstances which, but a few years ago, would have rocked or torn every nerve. These things, and such as these, the age has discovered and done; and because of these things we may admit most freely that there has been, in some things, wondrous progress—progress which might be turned to the best account—progress for which praise is due to God.

All that is true, in any region of God's world, must, in its measure, be valuable. What is true is of God, and therefore not to be cast aside, because discovered by an unsanctified understanding: seeing God has often used his worst enemies as his servants, making them his hewers of wood and drawers of water. The value of a truth is not to be judged of by the character of the discoverer; for why may not God use the finger of a Balaam to point to the Star of Jacob? The difficulty lies not in discerning what truth is of value and what is not, but in regulating its degree of value, so as to give to each portion or fragment the right place, the true level, the proper space, the due order, and to assign the exact amount of thought and study which it demands or will repay.

"All truth is precious, tho' not all Divine."

said Cowper; but to this we must add, that though all truth is precious, yet all truth is not equally precious, nor equally worthy of our care; nay, and we must also add, though all truth is precious, yet much of it must be left unstudied totally; our life is brief, and we have no time for all; we must select—for we are hurrying onwards;—the King will soon be here, and it concerns us to dwell most on those things which will help to fit us for his presence and kingdom.

There is the atom of dust under our feet—there is that flower-bed rising above it—there is yon forest stretching miles around—there is yon vast mountain-range that walls in the plain—there is the blue arch above us, with its clouds and rainbows—there is day with its sun and splendor—there is night with its stars and stillness. All these things exist. Their simple being is a truth; and with that being there are connected ten thousand truths. Yet there is not the same kind of truth, nor the same amount of truth, belonging to each other, for each is the centre of a circle, wider or narrower, less or more important, according to its nature. Yet what there is of truth in each is equally real, and therefore not to be slighted. To say that the facts in each of these are equally precious because equally true, or to say that the same amount of study should be allotted to each, would be foolishness. To say that the same amount of time may be expended upon each is gross miscalculation, indicating a false estimate of the different parts of truths, as well as of the true value of time. The truth which affects the future, specially the eternally future, must be more momentous than that which influences the present only. The truth which relates to the inner man must be more important than that which relates to the outer man. The truth that goes to make up the link between us and the God that made us, must be unspeakably more precious than that which forms the tie between us and the earth, or even between us and each other. The truth which bears upon earthly citizenship and its rights, must be far inferior to that which bears upon heavenly citizenship and its more glorious privileges. These distinctions the age does not consider. Progress in one direction, or at least in one or two directions, it is apt to regard as progress in all directions. Blinded by the magnitude of its discoveries, and by their present bearing upon society, it overlooks counteractions—it forgets how sadly it is losing ground in many things—it veils the evil, and exaggerates the good; and then reports progress, where real progress there is none.

To confound or misregulate the degrees of value in truth is at once an error and a mischief. It deranges everything. It is in itself an error, and it leads on to innumerable errors. It is in itself a mischief, and it is the root of endless mischiefs. It is not merely the non-discovery of truth; it not merely neutralises the truth discovered, but it draws out of it all the evil of positive untruth, thus making truth the producer of error, good the fountain of evil, light the cause of darkness. So that there may be made steps of advancement, which by the evil use made of them or the false level assigned to them, become in the end so many steps of retrogression. Has this been duly weighed by those who boast of progress? Have they calculated the loss as well as the gain, the minus as well as the plus, and is it on the ascertained difference that they rest their congratulations? If so, let them boast. It is well. If not, then their estimate is so wholly one-sided, that no credit can be given to it even by themselves.

It is a literary age—it is an age of science—it is an age of far-ranging inquiry—it is an age of discovery—it is an age of action—many run to and fro, and knowledge is increased. But still it may not be an age of progress. The amount of knowledge gained may be nothing to the amount lost; or that which is gained may be so perverted or ill-regulated as to injure instead of profiting.

In these different parts of the world's progress, God is not recognised, or only by a few, or only recognised out of compliment or custom, and in such a way as to place him at an immeasurable distance from the works of his hands. What is there that is good, or true, or beautiful, of which God is not the centre? And is not the age in its progress fast severing God from his works, making man, or chance, or abstract laws the centre of creation, instead of the living, personal Jehovah,—thus shifting the axis of the universe in order to be saved by irksomeness of coming into contact with him in whom we live, and move, and have our being? What, then, becomes of the advancement or the enlightenment of the age? Can we look upon them in their present stage without suspicion, or can we contemplate their issues without terror? For all science is a lie,—or at least lodges a lie in its very core,—if apart from God and his Christ. All wisdom is foolishness, if independent of him "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." All inquiry must be a mere maze of scepticism, if separated from him who has said, "Learn of me." All truth and goodness are but empty abstractions, if away from him who is the true and good. All beauty is but a torn blossom or a broken gem, if sought for out of him who is its birthplace. All enlightenment is but a dream, if not received from him who is the light of the world, the light of life. All liberty is but a well-disguised bondage, if not found in the service of him whose love hath made us free. All rule and law are but the exhibitions of man's selfishness and ambition and pride, if dissociated from him who is the Prince of the kings of the earth. Nay, and all religion is but hollowness and unreality, if severed from the fellowship of Jehovah and his Incarnate Son.

We hear much of the knowledge of the age. Well: but has not one of its own poets said, "Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers!" Yes, knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers! Knowledge comes, but goodness lingers. Knowledge comes, but the world is as far as ever from peace and righteousness. Its wounds are not healed; its tears do not cease to flow. Its crimes are not fewer; its morals are not purer; its diseases are as many and as fatal. Its nations are not more prosperous; its kingdoms are not more stable; its rulers are not more magnanimous; its homes are not happier; its ties of kindred or affection are not more blessed or lasting. The thorn still springs, and the briar spreads; famine scorches its plains, and the pestilence envenoms the air; the curse still blights creation, and the wilderness has not yet rejoiced, or blossomed. Yet man is doing his utmost to set right the world, and God is allowing him to put forth all his efforts, more vigorously and more simultaneously than ever, in these last days. Nor can any Christian mind fail to look with interest though most painful interest upon these vain endeavors. We know that they must fail. Man cannot deliver himself, nor regenerate his world. Reforms, republics, constitutions, congresses, change of dynasties, will not accomplish it. Art in every form, science of every name, are bringing into play unheard-of energies for the improvement of this globe, and for giving man the complete empire of earth and air and sea. But the task is superhuman, and each new forth-putting of human strength or intellect is only proving this the more. And hence it is with such interest, as well as with pity, that we look upon the generation around us with its overwrought muscles, its overtasked energies,—toiling unrestingly, and yet failing in its mighty aim,—the generation of the world.

There is a secret consciousness of the evil of the times, even among those who have not the fear of God before their eyes. They see but the surface, indeed, and yet that surface is not quite so calm and bright as they could desire; nor are the effects of the supposed progress quite so satisfactory as they expected it would be. They have their misgivings, though they cheer themselves with the thought that the mind of man will ere long be able to master all difficulties, and rectify all the still remaining disorders of the world. Accordingly they set themselves in their own way to help forward the regeneration of the world, and the correction of the evils of the age.

Among those there are various classes, or subdivisions. There is, for example, the educational class. It labors hard to raise the level of society by the more importation of intellectual knowledge—"useful knowledge," "scientific knowledge," "entertaining knowledge," "political knowledge;" in short, knowledge of any kind, save that of the Bible, and of the God of the Bible. There is the moral-life class,—a very large one, and possessed of far greater influence over the community than is generally credited. It has set itself to elevate the race by exciting what they conceive to be the purer feelings of our nature. Of one school the standard of perfection is romantic tenderness; of another, hero resolutions of character, without reference to such a being as God, or such a thing as his law; of another, it is good-nature and Christmas festivity; while others seem to have no real centre of elevation in view, only they hope, by stimulating some of our finer feelings into growth, to shake or weaken our grosser and more hateful. There is the poetical class. They think, by the inculcation of high thoughts and noble images, to lift the world to its proper level. With one school it is the worship of nature; with another it is the love of the beautiful; with another it is chivalry; with another it is the re-enthronement of "the gods of Greece," with another sentimental musings. These, and such as these, are the devices by which they hope to put evil to flight, and bring back the age of gold! There is the satirical class. Their plan for meliorating the world is ridicule. Folly, vice, misrule, are to be caricatured in order to be eradicated! Pity men with enough of ridicule; just show them how ridiculous they are or can be made; raise the laugh or the sneer against them; exhibit them in all the exaggerated attitudes that the genius of grimace can invent, and all will be well! There is the philosophic class,—large and powerful, composed of men who are no triflers certainly, but who are sadly without aim or anchorage. Give them but "earnestness," and on that fulcrum they will heave up a fallen world into its true height of excellence. Give them but earnestness, and then extravagance, mysticism, mythism, pantheism, so far from condemned as ruinous, are welcomed as so many forces operating at different points of the anticipated elevation. Give them earnestness, and they will do without revelation; or give them "universal intuition," and they, setting it up as the judge of inspiration, will make man his own regenerator by making him the fountain-head of truth. There is the political class. They have their many cures for the evils of society, and are quite sure that by better government, a wider franchise, freer trade, the abolition of ranks, the division of property, the extinction of laws of primogeniture, they will bring all into order and peace: as if these could touch the seat or the disease, or minister to the real wants of a helpless and heart-broken world.

To see the vanity of all these efforts of man to better himself, apart from God, one needs only to look into the extent of the evil to be remedied. It is vast, it is incalculable. We see but its outer circle,—its innumerable inner circles of vileness and misery we see not, we cannot see. It is an evil so broad, so deep, so manifold, so malignant, that to attempt to cure it by such appliances seems like silencing the thunder by the tones of the harp, or arresting the havoc of pestilence by scattering roses on the breeze. Whoever would have some idea of the hideous mass of evil under which the earth is groaning, and with which the atmosphere of the age is filled, let him read the third chapter of second Timothy, or the twenty-fourth of Isaiah, or the descriptions of Israel's state and sin, drawn by Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Let him compare those inspired descriptions of Israel's condition with what he sees in the world around him, and he will, we doubt not, go forth to the world a wiser, more thoughtful, more solemn man; not disposed to hate, or to scorn, or to satirize, but to pity, and to mourn, and to pray.—Journal of Prophecy.

The Title on the Cross.

Pilate wrote, "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews." "Well," says one, "what has that to do with us?" I answer, write this also on that great cross which the whole church has to carry after Christ. He is a King whom his subjects refuse. The heaviest cross the church has to bear is that the world will not bow to Christ. Perhaps in our younger days we said, We have only to tell men the gospel, and they will obey it; but we soon found out our mistake. We thought that there was very little for us to do except to push the world before us, and drag the church behind us; but to-day we have a different opinion. We see the legions of darkness still in their entrenchments, and though we have won many a victory, yet how small our success, compared with what still remains to be done! Africa, China, India, why, these are all parts of the great cross for the church to carry. Jesus is King of these countries, for he is "head over all things;" but, as yet, we see not all things put under him, and this is our cross.

Write on the burden of your service these words, "Jesus, the King of the Jews," and be encouraged. Jesus possesses a throne which rules Israel, even though Israel be not gathered. "Oh," says somebody, "the Jews are the last people that will be converted." Perhaps so, for judicial blindness has fallen upon them; but yet, Jesus is their King, and he will yet bring them to bow at his feet. He despairs not of them, he doubts not that Israel shall yet adore him; therefore, be of good courage. Do you wish it had been written, Jesus, the King of the Gentiles? Ah! but this is better still; for when the Jews bow the knee to Jesus, then the fulness of the Gentiles shall be gathered in. Their conversion will be the capture of the innermost citadel of unbelief. I remember how Luther used to talk of the Jews in his wild, cruel way; he did not believe in their salvation at all: but we have made a great advance upon so un-Christian a feeling. We hail with acclamation the title, "King of the Jews."—Spurgeon.

The Silver Lining.

There's never a day so sunny
But a little cloud appears;
There's never a life so happy
But has had its time of tears?
Yet the sun shines out the brighter
When the stormy tempest clears.

There's never a garden growing
With roses in every plot;
There's never a heart so hardened
But it has one tender spot:
We have only to prune the border
To find the forget-me-not.

There's never a cup so pleasant
But has bitter with the sweet;
There's never a path so ragged
That bears not the prints of feet;
And we have a Helper promised
For the trials we may meet.

There's never a sun that rises
But we know 'twill set at night;
The tints that gleam in the morning
At evening are just as bright;
And the hour that is the sweetest
Is between the dark and light.

There's never a dream that's happy
But the waking makes us sad;
There's never a dream of sorrow
But the waking makes us glad;
We shall look some day with wonder
At the troubles we have had.

There's never a way so narrow
But the entrance is made straight;
There's always a Guide to point us
To the "little wicket-gate;"
And the angels will be nearer
To a soul that is desolate.

There's never a heart so haughty
But will some day be...ened;
There's never a heart so wounded
That the Savior cannot heal,
There's many a lowly forehead
That's bearing the hidden seal.

The Wolf Spider.

Suddenly appears on the wall a dark gray fly or perhaps a beetle. It moves with wonderful quickness, but always by fits and starts, sometimes one way and then another. All at once it darts a few inches from the wall and then flies back again to the same spot. This action is several times repeated, and is so quick that the creature's wings cannot be seen. I approach the wall more closely and find that the creature is neither fly nor beetle, nor even an insect. It is a hunting spider, and of course has no wings. How, then, did it fly from the wall and back again? I have long been familiar with these pretty and active spiders. I have often seen them sidle cautiously toward a fly, leap upon it, and have a sharp tussle with it before it succumbed to the venomed fangs. Window sills, especially when facing southward, are happy hunting grounds for this spider. I had often seen spider and fly tumble together off the window sill, and presently the spider return still clasping its prey. It had saved itself from falling to the ground by spining a thread as it rolled off the sill, and was able to regain its position by climbing up the thread. But until lately, I had never seen it leap from a perpendicular wall, and to all appearances fly back again. The thread affords the means whereby this remarkable feat is performed. It is extremely elastic, and when the spider has reached the end of its leap the thread contracts and jerks it back again, just as a child throws a ball away from him, and draws it back to his hand by a India-rubber thread which is attached to it. How I had failed to notice this action for so many years I cannot imagine. Even the common wolf spider will act in the same way. I caught a glimpse of the creature crouching in the wall under the shadow of a vine leaf, so that I could not identify it. Suddenly it darted from the wall and alighted on the ground at some little distance, the elastic thread causing it to describe a slow and graceful curve, just as if it had wings. As it darted from the wall I put the net over it, and, much to my surprise, found that it was no insect, but a wolf spider.—Longman's Magazine.

Faith of a Mexican Child.

Our Mexican minister was telling me this evening about his little boy Ruben (Reuben). Once the father was very poor, so poor that the children had no clothes, and he had no money with which to buy them even the few garments that were necessary; poor little Reuben was very much distressed, and said to his father, "Papacito, what shall I do for clothes?" "My little son," said his papa, "go and ask God to give you a coat, and to give your brother and sister clothes." A little while afterwards the father was told that Ruben was alone in the church, so he went very quietly and looked in, and there he was kneeling, his little hands clasped, and his face upturned, and praying, "Oh, dear God, give me some clothes, and my little sister and brother, too; hear me, and help me, dear God, for Jesus sake;" and the poor little voice choked with tears. That afternoon, to the wonder and grateful joy of the family, a present was sent these three little ones of enough money to buy each one a garment.

This little boy is only about seven years old, and about two years ago he was suffering a great deal with an inflamed face. One night his father, hearing a noise from the children's corner, went quietly over, and there was Ruben kneeling and praying, "Oh, dear God, help me, and make me better of this dreadful pain; take it away and make me well." The tears were rolling over his cheeks, and he was in great trouble, but asking with all faith for help. After he got up and went back to bed his father went to him and gave him some medicine which soothed the pain, and in the morning he said to him, "Papacito, the dear God came to me and cured me last night; I asked him, and he came." I wish I could give you this in the sweet Spanish words, for it seems to me that the speech of the little children is indescribably sweet in this musical language; but you will see the wonderfully strong faith of this little lad, which was the fact which impressed me most forcibly. Many of the little Mexican children have this beautiful faith and trust in God, and it is something very touching. Remember little Ruben, and pray that he may grow up a good, earnest, faithful Christian.—Miss Cochran, in Children's Work.

Revelation by Degrees.

The eternal God is never in a hurry. A gradual development is the divine order. Revelation is not a Jonah's gourd, rising up in a night; rather is it like the oak, for it takes ages to grow. The old preachers said, "Revelation began in Eden, had its centre point at Calvary, and its end in Eternity." The Old Testament runs into the New; it is a whole; they harmonize. We read that in heaven they have the song of Moses and of the Lamb, for these songs harmonize. The harmony of the songs they sing there is a proof of how well they harmonize here. There is a gradual development; and this runs through all the works of God.

First there was chaos. The world did not reach its present state in a few years. It has taken many ages for the world to become as we see it to-day—its fields covered with flowers; its woods filled with the singing of birds, and butterflies with rainbow-tinted wings floating through the summer air. One glory made way for another.

Man was created in due time. Creation is a growth. A flower does not open and grow up in a day. First the stem, then the bud, and then the flower. Man is not born full grown; his is a gradual growth, a gradual development. Yet man must play through his programme in a few years, or death will step in and stop him; but God has all ages for his plans. A thousand years with him are but as one day.

We find the same gradual development in intellectual and moral things. We grow step by step. Education grows slowly—line upon line, precept upon precept, a little at a time. First a picture-book, then a book with pictures and a little reading; and we must ever hold a higher book before the child. It is so in revelation. There were four thousand years between the first Adam and the second Adam. God was powerful enough to have brought them close together. Why not have placed the garden of Gethsemane close to the garden of Eden? Why should not the Savior's feet have trod the earth in the first century? Thus we see the God of our redemption and the God of the world is one and the same. There is the same slow and gradual process. Our hasty and our little reasonings are at nothing to God; he is never in a hurry—he sees the end from the beginning.

The march of the Israelites might have taken only a few months from Egypt to Canaan; but God led them by a path that made the journey occupy forty years. Christ lived thirty years before he worked one miracle. Peter wanted to go out at once to preach (how great the need of it!) but Jesus said, "Tarry ye at Jerusalem." "Tarry." Redemption is slow, even as the rocks and hills were slowly prepared for man's habitation. Thank God, it was so! Why? A full-ordered redemption would have overwhelmed us. God holds himself back because of our weakness. We could not bear a vision of his splendor. Moses said one day, "Show me thy glory." God placed him in a cleft of the rock; he could not bear a full view of God's glory. Thank God for the cleft in the rock. How weak we are in the presence of Heavenly splendor! Remember Daniel says that on beholding the vision, "there remained no strength in me"—he had lost his breath. John, on seeing the "seven golden candlesticks, and in the midst of them one like unto the Son of man," "fell at his feet as dead." We cannot bear a full revelation of God's glory. The Bible is not yet exhausted of its teachings and truths.

"Our little systems have their day,
They have their day and cease to be;
They are but broken lights of Thee,
And Thee, O Lord, art more than they."

—Alfred Tennyson.

COFFIN.—At Raisin, Mich., Anna Coffin, daughter of Sister Elizabeth West, and step-daughter of Brother Hulet West, October 21, 1885, aged twenty-three years.

Sister Coffin was baptised into the Christ about six years ago, by Eld. L. O. Chase, since which time she has lived a consistent Christian life. She was a young lady of sterling worth, only to be known to be loved. She leaves a mother, two brothers and one sister, and a large concourse of friends that mourn her loss. But we mourn her loss not as those who have no hope, for we believe that she sleeps in Jesus, and all that sleep in Jesus God will bring with him. The funeral was largely attended, and especially so by very old people. Discourse by the writer from St. John xi. 25, after which we laid our dear sister away to quietly sleep till Jesus comes.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

JAS. WATKINS.

CHURCHILL.—At Tipton, Cal., Sept. 14, 1885, Elder Castle Churchill, aged seventy-two years, one month and two days.

Bro. Churchill, like Simeon of old, was a "just man and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel."

He was incapable of an act of injustice; and his devotion was limited only by his whole capacity of mind and study; and for years he hoped with much confidence and entire consecration, that he might be spared to the coming of the Lord.

His last conversation with the writer some weeks before his departure, was that he "was preparing for the translation."

A good man has gone, and his friends are still "waiting for the consolation of Israel."

WAITING.

Be still, sh, restless heart, be still,
For waiting is the Master's will;
When he commands 'tis sweet to do,
But he appoints the waiting too.

"Rest in the Lord, and wait for him,"
Though heart be faint, and eyes grow dim;
Then, in his own good time, will see
That thine own prayer was answered thee.

Thy rest may be God's working hour;
Thy weakness proves a heaven-sent power;
God's great success—thy failure here,
When all life's riddles are made clear.

What seems but backward steps to-day
May bring thee fastest on thy way;
Thine earthly loss be heavenly gain,
And priceless gifts these hours of pain.

In God's own great eternal plan,
Mysterious to short-sighted man,
Oh, may I have some humble part,
And do or wait with trustful heart.

JOB'S HOPE.

In the Authorized Version of the Old Testament, the last clause of Job xix. 26, reads:—"Yet in my flesh shall I see God." In the Revised Version this is changed to:—"Yet from my flesh shall I see God." The change is merely verbal, both versions making Job express the same thought.

There is an alternative rendering in the margin of the Revised Version, which has the support of the American Revision Company. It reads:—"Without my flesh shall I see God." This is not merely a verbal change. It is a change which makes Job express a thought entirely different from that of the reading in the text.

Both versions agree in making Job affirm the hope of a resurrection from death; but the marginal reading makes him express a belief that although his body were destroyed, he could still live on and enjoy the faculty of sight.

The answer to the question:—Which of these two ideas did Job actually express?—hinges upon the signification and use of the Hebrew preposition min, here rendered in the Revised Version from, and in its margin and appendix without.

In Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar min is stated to be derived from an obsolete noun signifying "part," and the radical and primary signification is given as from, out of. Bagster's-Davidson's Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon gives the same derivation. The primary meaning of min, then, is from, and in the clause we are considering, from, making sense with the context, has been placed in the text of the Revised Version. In placing it there the revisers have taken no unusual course. They have but given it here the same rendering which they have given it elsewhere, whenever it occurs in precisely similar circumstances.

In the case before us, min governs a noun connected with a verb of seeing. It occurs thirty-one times in circumstances similar, as far as governing a noun connected with a verb of seeing is concerned, though with varying construction of the clause. In the Revised Version, in twenty-seven of those cases it is rendered from, and these include all the cases where the construction of the clause is precisely similar to the one we are considering; as in Numbers xxiii. 9-13, and xxii. 41. In the remaining four cases min is twice rendered out of; once in of; and once (in Psalm xxxix. 13) it is lost in the translation.

For the convenience of the reader these thirty-one cases are here collated. The preposition is printed in italics.

Genesis xiii. 14—"Lift up now thine eyes and look from the place where thou art."

Exodus xviii. 21—"Moreover thou shalt provide (Heb., look upon) out of all the people able men."

Numbers xxii. 41—"Balak took Balaam and brought him up into the high places of Baal, and he saw from thence the utmost part of the people."

Numbers xxiii. 9—"For from the top of the rocks I see him, and from the hills I behold him."

Numbers xxiii. 13—"Come, I pray thee, unto another place, from whence thou mayest see them."

Deut. xxvi. 15—"Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven, and bless thy people."

Job vii. 19—"How long wilt thou not look away from me?"

Job xiv. 6—"Look away from him that he may rest."

Job xix. 26—"Yet from my flesh shall I see God."

Psalm xiv. 2—"The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men."

Psalm xxxiii. 13—"The Lord looketh from heaven; he beholdeth all the sons of men."

Psalm xxxix. 13—"O spare me (margin, look away from me) that I may recover strength."

Psalm liii. 2—"God looked down from heaven upon the children of men."

Psalm lxxx. 14—"Look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine."

Psalm lxxxv. 11—"Righteousness hath looked down from heaven."

Psalm ciii. 19—"For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary."

Psalm cxix. 18—"Open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law."

Cant. ii. 9—"He looketh in at the windows."

Cant. iv. 8—"Look from the top of Amana, from the top of Senir and Hermon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards."

Isaiah xxii. 4—"Look away from me."

Isaiah lxiii. 15—"Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness."

Jeremiah vi. 1—"Evil looketh forth from the north."

Lam. iii. 50—"Till the Lord look down and behold from heaven."

Referring to the rendering of Job xix. 25-27, given in the appendix to the Revised Old Testament, which includes the clause now under consideration, Mr. Talbot W. Chambers, one of the American Revision Company, says:—"The rendering here given is certainly a possible one; and the sense quite suitable to the connection." But it is not with renderings which are merely possible that the Bible student should be satisfied. Readings which are absolutely certain should be the object of his search; and when these are unattainable, he should still seek those which combine with possibility a high degree of probability. It is true that the lexicons give without as one of the significations of min, but as a matter of fact, speaking on the authority of the Englishman's Hebrew Concordance, min is never so translated in the Authorized Version. It is translated by no fewer than twenty different words,* but not once by without. On the other hand, without is made to do duty as the representative of as many as eleven different Hebrew words, but not one of these is min. Therefore, while without may be admitted to be a possible meaning, it must be set down as being a very improbable one.

There is a sound and sensible rule with reference to the translation of words from one language into another; it is that:—"When the words in connection admit the primary and usual meaning, it is unwarrantable to look for another." It has been shown that the primary meaning of min is from; that when it occurs in circumstances precisely similar to those in the clause we are considering, not only the usual, but the invariably rendering is from; and that in this case the words in connection admit the primary and usual meaning. Therefore from is here the correct rendering. It is unwarrantable to look for any other; and, consequently, without is inadmissible.

Such being the case, it follows that the idea brought out in the text of both the Authorized and the Revised Versions is the idea to which Job gave utterance; and in that utterance he affirms his belief and hope in a resurrection from death.—N. K. R., in Messenger.

THE NATURAL IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

Men come to the Scriptures with a certain theory about the immortality of the soul. They find some of the plainest and most easily understood words of the Bible against their theory; then, instead of making their theory square with the Word, they put an unnatural meaning on the Word to accommodate it to their theory. Many in the orthodox sects, so called, thus try to accommodate the doctrines of Holy Scripture to their opinions. This is no misrepresentation, but the simple statement of a fact. Oh, how little do some men—professing Christians—value the teachings of the Bible! What a little pains they take to understand its teachings. How unwilling they are to accept its teachings when its teachings are contrary to the teachings of their creed. And how much more respect they show to the creed than to the Bible. It is not so much what does the Bible teach, as what does our standard teach? If a man is tried for what is said to be false doctrine, he is tried, not by the Bible, but by the creed, or standard, of his church.

If we believe the Bible to be a rich treasury of truth,—if we believe it to be inexhaustible, how can we suppose that our forefathers got all the truth out of it that there is in it? Or how can we suppose that they clearly understood, in all its bearings, the truth they did discover? Must we suppose that they went so far that they left no room for advancement? Have they taken possession of all the land that there is to be possessed? Have they weighed and examined every truth, every principle? Well, it would seem as if they thought so who deprecate any change in the old creeds. But we are not of that opinion. While we are thankful for the various helps our forefathers have handed down to us, for the light they have thrown upon various parts of the Scripture, we think there were some great errors into which they fell, and that it is our duty to avoid them: and some great truths which they, in a measure, neglected or overlooked, and that it is our duty to make them more prominent. Truth must be more precious to us than any creed, however time-honored it may be; it must be more precious to us than wealth, or social position, or reputation, and for its sake we must be willing to let it go, if the Lord in his wisdom should see it to be necessary.

Let us now inquire if the natural immortality of the soul, handed down to us by our fathers, and so commonly accepted, is a true doctrine. If natural immortality is a true doctrine, and if the Scripture writers were inspired writers, how is it that they have said nothing about it? If this doctrine is true, it must be of the first importance for us to know it; and can we suppose that God would give us a revelation, and yet make that revelation silent on such a truth? It is well known that even the advocates of this doctrine admit that the Bible does not teach it, except by inference. And we affirm that the premises from which such an inference is drawn, do not warrant such an inference.

If it is true that man possesses immortality as a natural endowment, then it could not be immortality that Christ came to bring man, but simply happiness. Yet this is not the Scripture representation of the matter. It is life, or immortality, that Christ came to bring, and that is now offered to men, according to the Scriptures.

If we are born with immortal souls,—if in the very make-up of our being at birth we are possessors of immortality, the sacred writers, and specially John, err greatly in attributing our immortality solely to Christ, through faith in his name. By believing, we may receive pardon, cleansing, favor, peace, and joy; but the attribute of deathlessness being inherent in our nature, being destined to live forever, independent of our faith or our acceptance of the Christ, according to the common teaching, Christ cannot be the Giver of life in the sense and in the way the Scripture teaches. But accepting Scripture teaching as true, believing that John taught the absolute truth when he taught that Christ is the Giver of life to those who receive him, and that those who do not receive him cannot have life, but shall perish; we reject, and are bound to reject, the theory that we possess by nature undying souls, and are destined to live forever.

"Immortality," says a very learned writer, and one of the greatest Bible students of the present day, "is not and cannot be an intrinsic quality of any creature, however exalted: for it is as much the exclusive attribute of Deity as infallibility, or omnipotence, or any other. "God only hath immortality, just as he is the only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords (1 Tim. vi. 15, 16; i. 17.)....Two things on the point are certain. (1) That no creature can be immortal except by union with God through Christ. (2) That none but a holy creature can have a union with the holy God."

The immortality taught in Scripture is not inherent in man; nor is it to be found in any system of philosophy; nor can we learn it from nature; it is only revealed to us in the gospel. It is God's wonderful gift through His Son to those only who receive Him: Son as the Christ. It will not be given to unbelievers. "Whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die," says Jesus. This makes deathlessness, or immortality, to depend upon believing on Jesus. And the passages are numerous which condition immortality, eternal life, on faith in the Son of God.

In Acts iii. 15, Christ is called the "Prince of life;" that is, according to the margin, the "Author of life." But if every man is possessed of inherent immortality, how does he receive it from Christ? If that is true, how can Christ be said to be the author? It is said by one writer, in one of the monthly magazines, that "the term life, when used descriptively of the future state of the righteous, does not denote existence, but happiness exclusively." On this point we shall obtain light by a reference to two passages in John. "The thief cometh not, but that he may steal, and kill, and destroy; I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life." John x. 10; iii. 16. In the first of these passages life is put in contrast with kill and destroy; and in the second, everlasting life is put in contrast with perish; thus showing that life is existence, and everlasting life everlasting existence.

In Psa. xxi. 4, we read, "He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever." This clearly shows the sense in which the term life is used. It shows that it is used in the sense of endless existence, and not in the sense of a happy condition of existence. This latter idea is always included. Happiness will be an accompaniment of life in Christ, or unending existence.

Knowing that the Bible says nothing about the immortality of the soul, its advocates lay down the position that "the Bible does not reveal, but it assumes the immortality of all men," just as it does not prove, but assumes the being of a God. But this assertion has no sanction in the teaching of Scripture. Now all through Scripture, in hundreds of instances, there is a being called Jehovah, or Lord, or God; therefore, the existence of God is assumed. But where is there any person, any human being, any soul called an immortal soul? No where. The being of a God is assumed, for the names by which he is called occur from the beginning of the Bible to the end; but the immortality of the soul is not assumed in any part of the Bible, for from the beginning to the end of it it is never mentioned.

Now since immortality does not belong to man, since by nature he is mortal, how presumptuous it is in him to claim immortality as a part of his nature. Such an arrogant claim must be displeasing to God.

The belief in natural immortality, in some cases, doubtless leads the unsaved into fatal error. Trained in and accepting the dogma of inherent immortality, the sinner thinks that he shall live forever; and he cannot be deprived of immortality, and that if at last he acknowledges his sin, and asks for mercy, God, who is love and delights in mercy, will not consign an immortal creature to eternal misery. This idea is cherished to the last by many who know nothing of genuine repentance or saving faith. Oh, how this lie of Satan is deceiving precious souls!—Silas Henn, in World's Crisis

A Dying Saloon Keeper.

About three years ago I was requested to visit a dying man whose bar-room was a notorious resort. The man himself sent for me, and I was curious to know why. I went immediately to his place and entered the bar-room. That was a shocking sight. Miserable creatures were standing there clutching their glasses of liquor, looking as wretched as if they had come from their graves to get the stuff and had forgotten their way back. The proprietor's wife was behind the bar, and when she saw me she beckoned me to the private door. "My husband wants to see you. He is dying. Oh, this accursed business! I never wanted to begin it. We were doing well as we were, but he had the chance of getting this place, and said there was a fortune in it." I went into the chamber of death. There upon the bed lay an old business acquaintance of my own, but so changed that I could scarcely recognize him. The business had played fearful havoc with the seller. I talked with the man for some time, and then asked him if I might read and pray with him. He raised his hands and wrung them in despair. "No," he said, "it's of no use now. I only wanted to see you once more and tell you to go on with your great work. Save the people, Noble, if you can. I'm a lost man." The agonizing look on that man's face has haunted me ever since.

Irish Boycotting.

Where an English workman is boycotted by his companions, he has the sympathy of a larger public all around him. But a man belonging to the Irish peasant class has no other public within sight. If he quarrels with this, he feels that the whole world is against him; and even an emergency man may not always be an Athanasius. Moreover, the sanctions, if more commonplace, are infinitely more severe than any known in an English trade quarrel. Here men are set against her." My experience corroborates the truthfulness of this picture. Shall I therefore hint that there is danger in falling into the sin of Jehu, viz., self-seeking, by any holding the unpopular doctrines advocated by THE RESTITUTION? I answer, Yes. I honestly believe that there is such a thing as an ambition to be singular, disputatious, just for the sole sake of attracting attention. Some manifest it in their dress, some in their dwellings and some in their religious views. There is a better way of teaching those who differ with us than fault-finding Jehu's tactics, viz., excommunication, or refusing to recognize them.

We are taught by the example of our Lord to persevere in the beautiful work of teaching and opening blind eyes, and unstopping deaf ears. It might help our patience to reflect on how our Lord has borne with our own dullness in coming to the truth.

Just here I am disposed to halt a moment and contrast the present dispensation with the old. See, dear reader, the difference between the zeal of Jesus and the zeal of Jehu

Jehu charges his eighty armed men, to go in and slay. "Let none escape," he said. Jesus pleads for his murderers—"Father, forgive them, they know not what they do."

Let us thank God that we live in the grace dispensation. Above all, let us accept God's mercy. Do not be discouraged if people seem slow to see at a glance that which is now so plain to you. Nearly all the pulpits and religious papers sneer at the idea of our Lord returning in power to reign on the earth. My own Church paper—The Baltimore Methodist—calls it, "Millerite nonsense." It will require skill and patience to break the hold that the time-serving press and pulpit have on the creed-bound masses. The only hope I have in breaking down the enemy's gate lies in the Sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. This is better than Jehu's false zeal and cruel sword. This is the hammer that breaketh and the fire that burneth.

Let us remember that all who call themselves Christians, profess to believe God's word—the Bible. The only difference between us is, we study it and they do not. They read it as a kind of penance, some like a Romanist counts his beads. I speak from my own experience. I do not believe there is one person in ten in any of our churches who could repeat from memory the Ten Commandments. (Several of my church brethren quoted from the hymn book). I shall never forget how surprised I was when told that "never dying soul," "immortal soul," were terms nowhere to be found in God's word.

It might be interesting to the readers of THE RESTITUTION to know how I keep my place in the M. E. Church, and speak in "love feast" just as I write. Here is the reason, several of our leading members are close Bible students, and even know more than I do about the coming King and kingdom.

I mention this to show the importance of getting people to study the word. One of the best methods for the dissemination of Christian knowledge would be to stop preaching and organize Bible classes. The people have been gorged with preaching. Our Lord's words:—"Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures," apply to the preachers as well as the people. Preacher and people should meet at least once a week to study the word.

JEHU.

In the county Derry, Ireland, this name "Jehu" is about as familiar as that of St. Patrick. From what I have read of these two men, I must number them, among the successful specialists which have appeared before the curtain in life's drama, played their pieces and then dropped through the stage trap out of sight.

I have neither the time nor ability to even approximate the benefit their life has been to the world.

As I am an Irishman, I will be excused if I express a little preference for the man who drove out of the "Island O' Saints," the breed, seed and generation of the snake family. I know it has been said that he resorted to deception in order to induce some of the old serpents to step into his snares. Whether this be false or true I know not, one thing I know, namely:—that treachery to a dirty snake is not near so criminal as the treachery and deceit Jehu employed in order to rid the land of Baal worshippers. On the way to his bloody work he meets Jonadab the son of Rechab, an earnest and good man, deservedly popular with the people. After asking him if his heart was right, he took him up into his chariot.

It is well to be found in good company, but according to the parable of the ten virgins, this by itself will be valueless when the Bridegroom cometh. Good company will improve our manners, but to obtain the wise virgin oil, we must do as directed in Matt. xxv. The question Jehu put to this man:—"Is thy heart right?" has in my opinion made millions of our race rest in a false security. It is so common to hear people say, "So one's heart is right all will be well," meaning by this that it is of very little consequence whether we are in the truth or in error, so long as the heart is right. Jehu thought his heart was right. "Come with me," he says, "and see my zeal for the Lord." O, how easy it is to over-estimate ourselves, to call political ambition by the holy name—"zeal for the Lord."

Had Jehu's heart been right, he would not have stopped at pulling down the false, he would have shown equal zeal in building up the true. The Word says:—"But Jehu took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord God of Israel with all his heart: he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, which made Israel to sin." 2 Kings x. 31.

Between Baal worship and the worship of the golden calves that were in Bethel, and that were in Dan, there could have been no difference in God's estimate.

It makes no difference to me whether it was an Englishman or a Frenchman that alienated my wife's affections from me. I trust the dear readers of THE RESTITUTION will show as much zeal in building up as they do in pulling down. (It is much easier to pull down than to build up.) Jehu called his zeal "my zeal for the Lord," but the record proves that it was for self-advancement. I hardly think it is necessary to even hint at the purity of any one's motive who advocates the doctrine of our Lord's return to this earth in power and great glory. Since the writer has been known to hold these views he has been treated as a speckled bird.

Jeremiah xii. 9, puts it "Mine heritage is unto me as a speckled bird, the birds round about are against her." My experience corroborates the truthfulness of this picture. Shall I therefore hint that there is danger in falling into the sin of Jehu, viz., self-seeking, by any holding the unpopular doctrines advocated by THE RESTITUTION? I answer, Yes. I honestly believe that there is such a thing as an ambition to be singular, disputatious, just for the sole sake of attracting attention. Some manifest it

Announcements.

The First Quarte , Conference of the Church of God in Indiana, will be held at Plymouth, Ind., commencing Friday, Nov. 13, 1885, and continue over the following Sunday. Brethren, this is your meeting. The friends in Plymouth can entertain all who will come, and are anxious to see a good number present. Let us have a representation from every church in the State, and let the brethren who are isolated come to this meeting and join in the feast of good things the Lord has provided us. If those who cannot attend would write a short letter, telling of the cause of Christ in their locality, of their faith and hope in the promises of God, it would encourage those fortunate enough to be able to attend. Take the matter in hand, brethren, and let us have one more good meeting. The Annual Meeting of the Publishing Association will be held in connection with this Conference.

POLITICAL PROBLEMS.

Can the British Empire afford to suffer the Ottoman Empire to fall? Shall it Not? What is its Absolute and Official or Relative Strength. Late Movements in the East. How will Russia (fare) reach the Mountains of Israel? The Preliminaries of that Mighty Transition. Hebrew Developments.

Much has been said and written relative to England and Russia as to the breaking the empire of Turkey in Europe, and as regards the policy and intent of each of these empires. What will England do for the Ottoman Empire? What are the designs of Russia? Into whose hands will Turkey fall? What is to be done with the Jews? Such problems with many others of a kindred nature have their solution in the Bible. To its inspired records we must turn.

In our forthcoming work on the "Eastern Question" we have fully investigated those great national topics; at present, we shall simply notice a few points that will tend to illustrate the intricacies of the present complications in the East.

Since the reign of Peter, the Great, the ultimate designs of Russia have been apparent. Why she has not fully succeeded may not be so clear. Her want of entire success must be attributed to a power behind her throne. Often, during centuries of struggle, when about to seize her coveted prize a sudden change, unforeseen, and adverse would wrest it from her grasp. Name this Providence, or chance, or what you may, it has chained Russia to a radius whose length has never extended to the Ottoman seat of empire. The "Sick Man," has long been the favorite appellation of the Turkish Sultan. With how much propriety, however, will appear on further investigation.

It is often said of distinguished persons, such as Luther, Washington, Columbus, and Napoleon I, that they were immortal till their mission was accomplished. So with empires. God's mission is the sure pledge, and limit of their national existence. Beyond their specific work their lives do not extend.

The perpetuity of the Ottoman Empire is evidence that Jehovah has not terminated its vast and protracted mission. As Custodian of one of the great Eastern thoroughfares, it has had a great work to accomplish. What has been that specific work? Its history since A. D. 1453, attests the nature of its official work, as connected with Russia and the Orient.

Her history for centuries, previous to her enthronement upon the seat of the Eastern Cæsars, marks the special character of her official training. And it is worthy of special note, that the Turks were kept out of Constantinople, till the Greek empire became too feeble to resist the encroachments of the bear. For reasons apparent to the close student of prophecy, the king of the Slavonian race has been kept north of the belt of empires that have scattered Judah and Israel. The immutable purpose of Jehovah, still binds the Russian bear to his empire of the North, though about to put on the crown of Central Asia.

Let us now examine the Ottoman empire, as to its absolute and relative, or official strength.

That the Ottoman power, as a nation, is on the decline cannot be seriously questioned. Within a few years Turkey has been shorn of nearly one-half of her European territory. Every struggle between the Sultan and Russia, results in diminishing his absolute power to oppose the steady encroachments of the great northern autocrat. While, as a nation, the Ottoman empire is declining, her relative or official strength increases in the ratio of Russia's advancing greatness.

By many this allegation may be denied. We are free to say, that in our opinion, the Russian armies would, today, find it as difficult to enter Constantinople, as it was three centuries ago. To the close observer, the reasons are obvious.

(1) Her physical defences are quite equal, and are still growing. By land and sea the Sultan is strengthening. She is accomplishing all that money and human skill can do. The following item tends to establish this position:—"Herr Krupp is to supply the forts with a large number of guns. The most [illegible] for [illegible] very heavy guns of 35½ (12.815 c.) centimeters bore, each similar to the one already mounted at the Dardanelles; twenty-two guns with [illegible] of 21.59 centimeters (8½in. in.) and four hundred field pieces and mountain guns, ranging in calibre from seven to nine centimeters (2.72 in. to 3.51 in.) Four of the large guns are to defend the Bosphorus, and three the Dardanelles. The others are intended for various fortifications along the coasts, and to bring up the artillery department of the army to a standard just determined by the Turkish War Office."

2. The Ottoman empire has, in itself, two elements of great strength. (a) Its position, by nature. Constantinople, at the eastern terminus of the "Great Sea" is, by its peculiar location, a second Gibraltar, "the fortified rock of Andalusia." (b) This empire has the support of the Mohammedan world. It fails only when the authority of the Koran is no more. This will stand until the beginning of Messiah's personal reign. These elements are the two strong pillars of her throne.

3. The chief strength of the Ottoman empire is official. Its tenure office, as custodian of the middle gate of one of the great Eastern Thoroughfares, is its chief element of strength. The hand that made the Turkish empire custodian, in 1453, has held that power in office till 1885, and will hold her there, till its mission is accomplished. It is true of nations, as of persons, that they are immortal till their work is accomplished. The last four centuries have demonstrated the certainty of this position relative to Turkey.

When the Turk first entered upon the duties of his office as gate-keeper, he had sufficient inherent strength to hold his office and execute its peculiar work. The great Northern despot fully tested this point, by centuries of sad experience. Providence was always in the way, since the Ottoman had been placed there by divine appointment. Nor can that officer be removed by any other authority.

In our opinion, Turkish rule at Constantinople is not dependent upon the extent of her territory. The authority of the custodian of any great highway does not consist in the extent and riches of his out lots and gardens; in the splendor of his buildings, or in the vigor of his own constitution, but in the power that sustains his office. Turkey may be denuded and robbed of her national possessions, and yet be officially invincible. The Ottoman, in her European career, has had a remarkable experience. For many years her power was, in itself, absolute and invincible. As it began to wane, a new element of power began its course in Western Europe, the system of equilization of national authority, called "balance of power." The Western nations, as France and England, looking Eastward, became jealous of Russia. And seeing the results of Russian occupation of Constantinople, resolved to hinder such a dangerous result. Turkey was, therefore sustained against her northern foe.

This balance of power system, has made strong the Ottoman weakness, and Russia for two centuries or more, has been denied the occupation of the old Greek Capital.

During the operation of this international system, the British empire has been extending her territorial possessions eastward, and south of the Ottoman empire, having that empire as a wall of national defence against the Russian Gog.

The British empire is the friend of the Jew and the protector of the Ottoman empire. This empire of the south, under Jehovah, is the visible agent to carry out God's purpose in restoring the Hebrew nationality preparatory to Messiah's reign. As such England is the "Children of thy people," (Dan. xii. 1), and the defender of God's ancient people.

If the Ottoman empire should fall, it would become a Russian province, and the interests of England and of the Jews would be exposed to the attacks of the ancient enemy of God and of his people. (Ezek. xxxviii.

Should such an overthrow of Turkey now transpire what would become of Jewish colonization? It is certainly contrary to the purpose of Jehovah to the Jews, that Palestine should now fall into the hands of the Russian autocrat. That land, with its colonization schemes, must be in the controlling power of the Jew's national friends, or a nation under the control of their national friends. In our opinion, the British empire cannot afford to have the Ottoman Empire broken down nor does it appear to be the will of Jehovah that it should now fall.

The official strength of the Turkish empire, is therefore, equal to Jehovah's purpose. No power, but that of God, can eject him from his office. But is not that empire the "great river Euphrates" of Rev. xxi. 12, whose waters were to be dried up, "that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared?"

Such is the general view, we admit, but is it correct? Neither Scripture nor history warrants such an interpretation, in our view at least.

Those that hold to this construction, will do well to consider the following objections:—

(a) The mystic Babylon bears the same relationship to the mystic Euphrates (if there is such a river), as the literal Babylon did to the literal Euphrates. But "Mystic Babylon," is the Roman hierarchy. Did the Ottoman empire (the mystic Euphrates) ever sustain the Roman hierarchy? It sustains the Mohammedan priesthood. Therefore the Mohammedan priesthood would of necessity be the mystic Babylon.

(b) The term Euphrates is found in about nineteen places. In seventeen of those passages, it is admitted that the literal river is intended. The other two passages are in the Apocalypse. The one is in Rev. ix. 14. "Loose the four angels which are bound in (at) the great river Euphrates." The four angels represent the Ottoman power. How, then, in the same vision can it be represented by the Euphrates. How can the Ottoman empire be bound at the Ottoman empire?

In Rev. xvi. 12, Euphrates is the name of a river, and is, therefore to be literally understood. Kings would be literal, and it is literal, and the final conflict of Gog, which is here intended, is literal.

These thoughts are suggested by passing events. Let us examine the signs, and read them in the light of prophecy. Let us not look for the fall of the Turkish empire, till its work is accomplished.

Selections.

THE AGE.—NO. II.

Along with its boast of progress, the age boasts of its liberty. Let us look at this, and see how far it can make its boasting good. True liberty is a blessed thing; for it is another name for the love that "beareth all things," that "thinketh no evil," that "rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth." With this, however, the liberality of the age has nothing common. Its essence is, indifference to sin and error. Its object is, to smooth down the distinctions between good and evil; between holiness and sin; between the church and the world; between Protestantism and Popery; between the belief of God's Word, and infidelity, or Atheism. All its sayings and doings in government, in the legislature, in society, in corporations or private intercourse, are based upon the axiom that there is no real difference between these things, or, at least, that if there be, it is not discoverable by man; so that man is not only not responsible for acting upon it, but it would be intolerance and presumption in him to do so. Kings are, therefore, to rule as if there were no such distinction, forgetting by whom they reign. Judges are to know no such distinctions, forgetting that they are to judge "in the fear of the Lord." Society is to be constructed without any such distinction, as if the Bible were not the basis of all society. But is not this calling good evil, and evil good,—putting darkness for light, and light for darkness, bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter?

We see this liberality in the kind things spoken of Infidelity; in the praises of Popery; in the sneers against Protestantism, as being by its very name a system of illiberality. Education from which God is shut out, and in which the Bible has no place, is contended for, even by men who call themselves religious; and this is named liberality. To attend mass in a Popish cathedral; to listen to the blasphemies of Socinianism for the sake of the eloquence of the preacher; to hold fellowship with the avowed Infidel for the sake of science; to sit at the table of the licentious, on the score of his artistic fame,—these are common things amongst us, and all are honored by the name of liberty! Because our fathers condemned these things; because "they abhorred that which was evil, and cleaved to that which was good," they are branded as intolerant and narrow-minded; and because our own age has thus filled up the gulf between the good and the evil, it is honored with the name of enlightened.

Thus to blot out the difference between the truth and error has been the feat of the age. For this it praises itself, pitying the littleness and contractedness of other days and other minds. In so doing, it forgets that no man is narrow-minded who expands to the full circle of truth, and that the first step beyond that is contractedness of spirit. Latitudinarianism is not true liberality; indifference to error is not true liberality, unless it can be shown that the Bible, the Book of Truth, is equally Latitudinarian, and equally indifferent to error. It is an appalling fact, that men, with the Bible in their hands, should deny the distinction between truth and error, and then, as if ashamed of what they had done, call it by the venerated name of liberality. But it is a more appalling fact, that man should give, as the reason for this indifference, that truth is not discoverable, thereby throwing the blame upon God for having given a Bible so vague, so ambiguous, so unmeaning, that no one reading it can certainly gather what is truth or what is error.

This liberality, however, turns out to be a one-sided principle. Its toleration of error is unqualified and unconditional, almost as if the fact of its being error entitled it to toleration, and even encouragement. Its toleration of truth is grudging, meagre, restricted. Nay, it only consents to tolerate truth on condition that its supporters will not contend for it too decidedly, but will bring it considerably down to the level of error. Thus, though assuming a Protestant name, its deference to Popery is unlimited; while its hatred of all that is decided and essential in Protestantism is deep and unconcealed. It finds many excuses for the Popish claim of infallibility, but none for Protestant assertion of the full and thorough inspiration of the Word of God. It palliates the Popish system of monastic vows, but detests and denounces the Scriptural doctrine of separation from the world. It praises and associates with a Papist that believes in the lying legends of saints, and in the virtues of dead men's bones, or in the immaculacy of the Virgin Mary; but it rejects, as silly and insipid, the acquaintanceship of the man who reads his Bible, and loves his Saviour, and walks humbly with his God. Its sympathies are all practically on the side of those very errors it professes to reject, and its hostilities are directed against those very truths which in words it owns.

The age also boasts of its religion as part of its progress. With many, religion is mere philosophic speculation upon the truth connected with man's soul. With others, it is the exemplary discharge of all relative duties. With others, it consists in admiration for the Bible, as a book of literary excellencies. With others, it is the adoption of a creed or connection with a church. With others, it consists in bustle and outward zeal. In all, it lacks life,—that deep, intense, glowing life, which so marked it in earlier times. Its root is not in the conscience, but in some outer region of the soul, which does not bring us into close and living contact with Jehovah himself. It is a thing of the imagination, of the intellect, or even of the affections, but not of the conscience. There can be no religion that has not its seat there. The hinderance to living religion is the want of a "purged conscience," and till the conscience has been purged from the dead works, there can be no religion, no true service of God. How little is there of conscience in the religion of the day! Hence that lack of simplicity, of freshness, of serenity, which we should expect. Hence its hollowness and shallowness.

The religion of the day is an easy-minded religion without conflict and wrestling, without self-denial and sacrifice; a religion which knows nothing of the pangs of the new birth as its commencement, and nothing of the desperate struggle with the devil, day by day, making us long for resurrection-deliverance, for the binding of the adversary, and for the Lord's arrival. It is a second-rate religion,—a religion in which there is no largeness, no grandeur, no potency, no noble-mindedness, no elevation, no self-devotedness, no all-constraining love. It is a hollow religion, with a fair exterior, but an aching heart,—a heart unsatisfied, a soul not at rest, a conscience not at peace with God; a religion marked, it may be, by activity and excitement, but betraying all the while the consciousness of a wound hidden and unhealed within, and hence unable to animate to lofty doings, or supply the strength needed for such doings. It is a feeble religion, lacking the sinews and bones of harder times—very different from the indomitable, much-enduring, storm-braving religion, not merely of apostolic days, but even of the Reformation. It is an uncertain religion, that is to say, it is not rooted in certainty; it is not the outflowing of a soul assured of pardon, and rejoicing in the filial relationship between itself and God. Hence, there is no liberty of service, for the question of personal acceptance is still an unsettled thing: there is a working for pardon, but not from pardon. Hence all is bondage, heaviness, irksomeness. There is a speaking for God, but it is with a faltering tongue; there is a laboring for God, but it is with fettered hands; there is a moving in the way of his commandments, but it is with a heavy drag upon our limbs. Hence the inefficient, unlnfluential character of our religion. It does not tell on others, for it has not yet fully told upon ourselves. It falls short of its mark, for the arm that drew the bow is paralysed.

These are some of the features of the age. Such is its progress. Such are its prospects of self-regeneration, or world-regeneration. Alas! how little is all this do we see God! How little can we detect, in these movements, of the Spirit of God! There is a movement, doubtless, nay, not one movement, but many. But how much of this is the work of the Holy Spirit, of [illegible] who alone can reform an age or regenerate a world? How much from above, and how much from beneath? How much onward and upward, and how much backward and downward? Is not the age one which is especially grieving, nay, quenching the Spirit? And in many of these things which are counted progress, are we not grieving Him most signally and awfully? Instead of setting our face steadfastly to go after Christ, are we not following after Antichrist in his manifold delusions, in which by mixing up truth and falsehood, he is seeking to deceive the very elect? Instead of putting ourselves under the teaching of the Spirit, are we not taking the false guidance of the evil one, now clothed in the fair disguise of radiant knowledge, and going before us as an angel of light to mislead and ruin?

Not as though some strange thing were happening to us. We look for no times of righteousness in these last days. We have been warned to expect evil and good,—progressive evil, not progressive good,—until the Lord come.

The age of progress is not the present; it is the age to come. In the present there is the development of evil,—in the future, the development of good. Man is now putting forth his power to the utmost in efforts after progress. Poor progress at the best, yet much boasted of. It is but man's progress; it is but finite development. Man is now put to the proof. He is allowed to do his best, and he is given time to do it in. God will not hinder the attempt, nor hurry him in making it. Full time, ample scope, large opportunity will be granted. Man ruined a world; it is to be proved whether he can rebuild it. He ruined it in a day; he is given six thousand years to attempt its reconstruction. His downward progress was swift enough, it is to be tried whether his upward progress will be as rapid or whether there can be such a thing as upward progress at all where he is left alone. God has been putting him to proof. He says to him, "Try to govern the world;" man tries it but fails. He says to him, "Try to regenerate a world;" he tries it, and fails. He says to him, "Fertilize the earth;" he tries it, and fails. He says to him, "Try to advance,—make progress,—increase in knowledge;" man tries it and fails. It will not do. Man's day has been a long one; but it has been a day during which in all possible circumstances and with all advantages, he has been proved helpless, ignorant, evil; unfit to rule, and unfit to be left without a ruler; unfit to teach, and unwilling to learn; unfit to be intrusted with the care or management of aught within the world's wide circle,—from the atom of crumbling dust beneath his feet up to his own soul.

When God has made this proof to the universe of man's utter incapability; when he has demonstrated man's unworthiness of trust and inability for any progress, save a downward one; he sets him aside as "a despised and broken vessel," in order to bring in the "greater man,"—aye, the greater than man, even his own Son. The great experiment of 6000 years is now drawing to a close. The vast but awful demonstration is now nearly complete. The case is most manifestly going against man. King, prince, noble, peasant, beggar; statesman, diplomatist, master, parent, child, servant; poet, philosopher, artist, mechanic,—all have had their long age of trial, and all have failed. The verdict will soon be given, and the sentence pronounced.

At this crisis we now stand. At the close of a long series of experiments made to see what man could do, we find the world as wicked and lawless (to say no more) as at the first. Peace has not spread her reign among the nations, or miracle departed. Righteousness does not sit on the throne of the nations, nor does holiness beautify the homes of the children of men. Man's merchandise is not consecrated to God, nor his wealth laid at the feet of Jesus. The heart still remains deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked. Oppression, murder, cruelty, selfishness, lust, sedition, strife, and hatred, are still uneradicated, unsubdued, unmitigated. Man has found no cure for these maladies. They rage on, but he is powerless. The curse still pervades the earth and poisons the air. Man cannot disinfect it. The thorn and thistle still shoot up their prickly memories of the primal sin. Man cannot uproot them. Disease still haunts the body, and man says, "Depart," in vain. The "rooted sorrow" still keeps place in memory, sickening health's freshness, and tearing down life remorselessly,—man vainly endeavoring to pluck it out. Death still smites down its daily myriads, man cries in vain to bribe or disarm it. The grave still receives the loved, man preys upon the beautiful,—man pleading in vain that it should give back the joy of his heart and the desire of his eyes!

Such are the fruits of the first Adam's doings, and such the powerlessness of his children to remove so much as one of the ten thousand evils. It has been proved that man can ruin, but not restore a world.—His attempts at restoration have been sad and mischievous failings. His attempts at progress have been abortive; so that progress in evil, progress in alienation from God, is the feature of greatest prominence in his history.

But this progress in evil has a limit. God has set bounds to it which it cannot overpass. He will not allow this earth of his to be totally a hell. He will make the sin of man to praise him, and he will restrain the remainder thereof. A certain amount and a certain duration he will allow, but no more. Neither of these is indefinite; and we seem to be nearing their boundary.

It is well. For then shall the good displace the evil, and the blessing the curse. The second Adam is at hand, and, with him, the kingdom and the glory. He brings the cure. He knits the broken world.—He rebukes disease and sorrow. He binds death.—He rifles the grave. He delivers creation. He sets up a righteous, peaceful throne. He draws aside the curtain that hid heaven from earth, making them as one,—the inner and the outer chamber of the one tabernacle of Jehovah,—and setting up the true Jacob's ladder, on which the angels shall be seen ascending and descending, still ministering in holy service to him and to his saints in the day of the kingdom, as heretofore they have done in the day of tribulation and shame.

That is the age of progress! What progress, when God shall set his hand to it! In the light of the ever-widening knowledge, in the blaze of that ever-brightening glory, how poor, how vile, shall seem the progress of the dishonored past! Not merely like age's recollection of childhood's trivialities and wasted time; but like morning's remembrances to the drunkard of last night's revelry and lust; like the king of Babylon's remembrance of his seven years' sojourn with the beasts of the field.—Journal of Prophecy.

Jews and Jerusalem.

The issue just to hand of Tidings from Zion, a little monthly printed in Jerusalem, has the following interesting notes on the returning of Jews to Jerusalem:—

A large number of newly-arrived Jews came to see me during the month. All classes were represented. A few well-to-do people, the majority respectable poor people; some helpless children; some invalids of both sexes. None of them had any business with me; none of them expressed a desire to become Christians; and, if I had sent them all away without seeing them, I do not think a single one of them would have complained. They came, and came in the full confidence that they would not be turned away. And just because the thing happens contrary to all ordinary transactions in daily life I cannot get away from the firm conviction that these people are sent by God that they may receive a blessing to their soul. "Why have you left your home?" is my first question, to which I receive as answer tales of woe which, however differing from one another, convey to me in every case this burden: Jews in their hundreds of thousands are made to feel homeless in the countries of their dispersion.

To my second question, "Why did you go to Palestine?" I generally get as answer another question, "Where else should we go?" which is to me a more eloquent plea than any amount of correct argument.

And to the third question, "Why do you come to the missionaries?" the answer is ever, "We have heard that they are real friends to the Jews." And when I inquire a little farther, and get to know that not one or two places, but in scores of Jewish communities in Russia and Roumania there are those who cherish as the best recollection of Jerusalem the kindness they received here from the Jewish Mission, I feel that we have reason to thank God and take courage.

These new-comers do not appeal to us in the hope of getting money, for they know we have none to give, but they come for comfort and advice, and they take away with them a glimpse of gospel light. Most of them are really anxious to associate themselves with us; they are in a similar stage to that of Andrew and John when they answered the Lord's question, "What seek ye?" with the word, "Rabbi, where dwellest Thou?" But we dare not tell them, "Come and see," for we know the material losses these poor people would sustain, and we do not know how to make them good to them.—Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

STOCKHOLDER'S MEETING.

The stockholder's meeting of the Christian Publishing Association will be held at the Christian Chapel Plymouth, Ind. Saturday, Nov. 14th, 1885, at 10:30 a. m.

E. K. BARNHILL, Sec.

In a foot note in the first column on the second page of THE RESTITUTION last week, the name Carlisle should be Carlyle.

A LETTER from Brother L. E. Connor of Macy, Ind., states that Brother and Sister Woodward commenced a series of meetings at that place on Friday evening of last week, and notwithstanding the bad weather, are speaking to crowded houses. They are to remain at Macy till Wednesday night, and will then probably come to Plymouth and remain till after the quarterly meeting Nov. 13, 14, and 15.

Creation versus Evolution.—This is the title of a well-written pamphlet of which Mrs. H. V. Reed is the author. Its arguments are pointed and plain, and, although condensed, are very comprehensive. Mrs. Reed has become widely known, both at home and abroad, as Author of "Bible Triumphant" and "Earnest Words to Honest Sceptics." Price of pamphlet 25 cts. Address the Author, Norwood Park, Ill.

THROUGH the courtesy of Brother G. W. Young, of Brooklyn, we received a copy of the N. Y. Tribune of date Oct. 25, containing a report of a sermon preached on Sunday, Oct. 28, in the Trinity Church in New York City. Do not fail to read this discourse, as it contains some very scathing remarks on that abhorent Papal dogma—Eternal Torture. We also give a letter written by a Presbyterian in Michigan, intended for one of his brethren in the same church, but as news of the latter's death came while Mr. Monteith was writing his letter, he sent it for publication in THE RESTITUTION, prefaced by some lines to its editor. Sermons and letters of this kind show how the human mind is revolting against that horrible God-dishonoring error.

It is evident from the following that the dark clouds of war still hang threateningly over Africa. As Egypt and Palestine have figured largely in history, so they occupy a prominent place in prophecy. They are lands of destiny in the closing scenes of this dispensation.

"After the fall of Khartoum the Mahdi declared that his army would start for Egypt four months after Ramadan. The expedition has not been greatly delayed if we may credit the report from Assouan that a large rebel army is now marching down the Nile from Khartoum to Abu Hamed, 360 miles north. In point of fact the followers of the new Mahdi already control the river from Khartoum to Dongola, about 700 miles. Early in August 4,000 dervishes occupied Dongola, and have been living there on supplies furnished by the neighboring tribes. Only 280 miles further north is Wady Halfa, on the boundary between the Soudan and Egypt, whither the aged Murdir of Dongola and many of his followers were compelled to flee on account of the aid they gave the English, who left them to their fate.

There is reason to believe that the Soudanese do not now possess sufficient unity and enthusiasm to seriously menace Egypt with invasion. Since the retreat of the British we have heard little from Khartoum except reports of revolts in Kordofan and bitter quarrels among the Mahdi's chief followers. It is now reported, however, that the Egyptian garrison has abandoned Sennaar, which, if true, gives the rebellious Soudanese the entire control of the Nile as far north as Dongola."

An appended extract will show how astronomers account for the wonderful star showers that have been seen at different times. The origin of the strange phenomena may be correctly shown and the startling exhibition of 1833 be no less a marked sign of coming events.

NOVEMBER METEORS.

November holds one source of unfailing interest, for during her reign the earth plunges headlong through the November meteor zone. Those who watch on the nights of the 12th, 13th, and 14th will find proof of the passage in a few stray meteors radiating from the constellation Leo, and set on fire by a concussion with the earth's atmosphere. The November meteoric showers are caused by the earth encountering a swarm of particles following Temple's comet in its orbit. The swarm of meteoroids is not yet equally scattered, and the earth meets the densest portion once in 33¼ years. A grand display marks the passage. The heavens seem to be on fire, and the sublimity of the scene is indescribable. Chinese, Arabian, and other records give accounts of meteoric showers that occurred years ago.

Humboldt, while traveling in the Andes, saw a wonderful shower in 1799. One was seen in this country in 1833, another occurred in 1866–67, and one is confidently expected in 1889. The November meteor zone is a gigantic hoop or ellipse, crossing the earth's orbit at a point passed by our planet on the 13th of November, and extending beyond the orbit of Uranus. It has a period of 33¼ years. Leverrier thus accounts for its presence in the solar system: As far back as the year 126 of our era the planet Uranus captured a meteoric comet, and imprisoned it within the boundaries of the sun's domains. The comet is disintegrating, and the meteoroids are slowly extending over the whole zone. When this takes place, thousands of years hence, the great displays will cease, and a greater number of falling stars will be seen every year. As nothing is more uncertain than the behavior of comets and meteors, it is well to be on the watch. It may be that the observers of the present year will find a rich harvest to reward their labor. The best time for the observation is about 3 o'clock, when the constellation Leo, from which the meteors radiate, is about half way between the eastern horizon and the zenith.

The Way of Redemption according to God's Word. The Testimony of "A Faithful Witness." Read and Ponder.

II KINGS XXIII. OR SAMUEL II. C. V.

1. And these are the last words of David, faithful David, son of Jesse, and a faithful man whom the Lord raised up over God's anointed Jacob, and befitting psalmody are they for Israel.

2. A Spirit of the Lord spoke in me and his word was upon my tongue.

3. The God of Israel saith: For me a watchman from out Israel hath spoken a parable. Say unto man, how will ye control fear of Christ (or an anointed one)

4. Even in the light of God's morning? Arise thou sun in the morning, (the Lord hath not passed unnoticed) with effulgence and like verdure from the earth after a shower.

5. Not in this wise though is my house in relation to a Strong One. A covenant though, an eternal one hath he made with me, made ready, guarded on every occasion, because all my salvation and all my purpose is that the evader of law shall not sprout up.

6. Even as a thorn that is thrust away are they all, because they will not be laid hold of with the hand,

7. And a man (ovyp a man of sense or high culture) shall not toil among them; yea they are full of iron and they are the wood of a spear, and with fire will he burn them, and they will have been burned to their shame.

PSALM XXX. OR XXXI. C. V.

1. Unto the end (the perfected state) David's Psalm of ecstasy.

2. In thee, O Lord, have I hoped; may I never be put to shame! In thy righteousness rescue and deliver me.

3. Incline thine ear unto me and deliver me speedily, because thou art unto me a God, a protector and a house of refuge to save me.

4. Because my controlling power and my refuge art thou, and for thy name's sake thou wilt guide me and support me through.

5. Thou wilt lead me out of this snare which they have hid for me, because thou art my protector, O Lord.

6. Into thy hand shall I have committed my spirit; thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of the truth.

7. Thou hast hated those who stand guard over vanities in vain, but I have hoped in the Lord.

PSALM XXXI. OR XXXII. C. V.

1. For understanding David's (Psalm understood) blessed happy are they whose transgressions have been remitted, and whose sins have been covered up.

2. Blessed happy the man unto whom the Lord shall not account sin, and in whose mouth there is no guile.

Read Paul's interpretation and application of this fundamental Christian truth in Rom. iv., especially the thirteenth verse, which reads as follows:

13. For not through law was the promise to Habraam or to his seed that he should be an heir-at-law of the cosmos, but through a righteousness belonging to faith.

17. Even as it hath been written, I have made thee a father of many nations, in the sight of him in whom he believed, the God namely who maketh the dead alive and calleth things as though they were;

18. Who against hope, believed in hope that he would become the father of many nations, according to that which had been spoken (the oracular word again) namely, in this wise [shall thy seed be.

20. And he did not waver in unbelief in the promise of God but was enabled in belief (faith) when he had given glory to God (or God the glory).

PSALM XLVIII. OR XLIX. C. V.

1. Unto the end (the perfected state) for the sons of Kore (the temple choir)

2. May ye have hearkened unto all these things, ye nations; may ye have marked them well, all ye who inhabit the earth;

3. Ye earth-born and sons of men, ye rich and poor alike;

4. My mouth hath spoken wisdom, and the meditation of my heart understanding.

5. I will incline my ear unto a parable; I will open up my theme on a psaltry.

6. Why do I fear at all on a day of wickedness? (question.) (Answer) The transgression of my heel (the Adamic transgression) will encompass me.

7. There are some who trust in their own ability and boast in the abundance of their riches.

8. Shall not a brother redeem? May a man redeem himself? (he is speaking according to the Levitical law which is a type of the true). (Answer) He may not pay God the expiatory price, (that is the love-price) for himself;

9. And the honor of the redeeming of his life (soul); even though he should have toiled his life-time through (εις τον αιωνα, that is his breathing space, or as long as he breathes, an instance of the limited, ordinary use of the phrase commonly translated "for ever and ever" in C. V.)

10. And should live unto the perfected state (εις τελος end, in the sense of the end of time and this natural order of things in which we now live, and the beginning of a new order of created perfections) so as not to see (that is experience) corruption.

13. And man (the natural man) though in honor, hath not understood; he hath been compared to the brutes who do not apprehend, and he hath been likened unto them.

14. This their way is their cause of stumbling (stumbling-block), and after these things with their mouth will they bespeak blessing. Interlude (Selah C. V.)

15. Like sheep have they been put in Hades (the grave); death shepherdeth them, and the upright will lord it over them in the morning, (the morning of the resurrection), and their cry for help will have waxed old in Hades away from their glory.

16. But God will redeem my life (soul) from the hand of Hades when he taketh (λαμβανει) me. Interlude.

17. Fear not when a man groweth rich and when the glory of his house hath become enlarged,

18. Because when he comes to die he will not take them all, nor will his glory go down along with him.

19. Because his life (soul) will have been blessed in his life-time. He should have confessed unto thee whenever thou didst do him good.

20. He will go unto generations of his fathers; until an age (a breathing space, life,) he will not see light.

21. A man though in honor hath not understood, he hath been compared to the brutes that do not apprehend, and hath been likened unto them.

If the reader will compare the above selected passages with the different versions and then with the text itself, if he is a scholar, some clouds of mystery may clear away from his mental horizon which have long obscured his perception of the Sun of Righteousness, and the plan and purpose of God in redemption. Don't be afraid, open the window of your household of faith toward Jerusalem and let the blessed light of revealed truth come in as it did of old to Daniel in that old Babylon of captivity. You may not realize it, but you and I are in a worse Babylon of captivity than he was. Babylon means a "howling confusion." The whole civilized world is this Babylon of our day, and the nominal Christian Church sustains the same relation to it that God's nominal people of old did to old Babylon. They were in spiritual captivity; and so is the nominal Christian Church of the nineteenth century.

Hear the apocalyptic cry, "Come out of her." For Babylon will fall. Her doom is written in the apocalyptic 666. Read it, exactus: adverb meaning "way of apostasy," the way of man or men or mankind, the natural man.

- α equals 1
- ξ equals 60
- ο equals 70
- π equals 200
- ρ equals 300
- σ equals 1
- δ equals 4
- ε equals 10

666 equals the 'epithet or the accounted value of such an individual or aggregated body. Everything in this cosmos remember is numbered, measured and weighed.

The Weary One Rested.

I have been alone with Jesus,
My head upon his breast,
For I was so very weary,
I wanted there to rest:
I have been alone with Jesus,
He bade me stay awhile,
And I felt it very precious,
The sunshine of his smile.

For I was weary, weary, and longed to be at rest,
And oh! it was so peaceful there, while leaning on his breast.

Shall I tell you what I told him
While I was sitting there?
I told him all my trouble,
I told him all my care.
I told him Satan's whisperings
Oft called me into sin;
And I asked him if I might not
Forever stay with him.

For I was weary, weary, and longed to be at rest,
And oh! it was so peaceful there, while leaning on his breast.

Shall I tell you what he told me
While I was waiting there?
For it took away my trouble,
It took away my care.
He told me how he loved me,
His wayward, erring child.
And I felt so very happy,
For still on me he smiled,

For I was weary, weary, and longed to be at rest,
And oh! it was so peaceful there, while leaning on his breast.

Then he told me I was welcome
To stay with him for aye;
And he said that he would never
Cast his loving child away.
"Hark!" he said, "I am your Savior,
Firm as a rock I stand;
Come and rest beneath my shadow
When weary in the land."

Oh! 'tis precious, very precious, to lean on Jesus' breast,
For when the heart is weary, 'tis the only place of rest.

Eloquence that Went Home to the Heart.

In the winter of 1880 I had an occasion to go from Green Bay, Wis., to Chicago, on the Northwestern Railroad. At Oshkosh we were joined by a delegation of lawyers on their way to Madison, the capital, to attend the Legislature then in session. They were all men of more than usual intellect and unexceptional character. Two were ex-judges of the Circuit Court, and one I had seen Chairman of the Young Men's Christian Association. The party found seats near together, and after the first salutation was over, they began to look for means to while away the time. After awhile some one proposed a game of cards. No sooner said than done. Two seats turned apart so as to face each other, a cushion improvised to serve as a table, and three of the lawyers, including the Chairman of the Y. M. C. A., and a Chicago runner on good terms with them, were soon deep in the mysteries of a game of euchre.

I was surprised to see the Christian gentlemen, judges of the law and equity—leaders of society, makers of public sentiment, law-givers of a great State, directors of public morals, supposed to be public exemplars of all that is good, and guides to young—thus setting publicly their seal of approval to a most dangerous and evil practice. To be sure they played for stakes no higher than the cigars for the party. But it seems to me, in the eyes of all discreet persons, this does not change the act or lessen the danger or its example, but rather heightens it, as from the less to the greater is the invariably course of crime. I did not intend to moralize on paper—I was about to say that, while I was filled with such thoughts as these, one of the party grew tired of the game, and our remaining Judge was invited to take his place. I saw the blood mount in an honest blush of disapproval to his manly face, and he hesitated and drew back. But the game had become interesting, and his spirited companions urged him.

"Come, Judge, take a hand; we can't go on without it."

The Judge rose slowly from his seat inwardly condemning the act, as I evidently saw, and stepping forward, took a seat among the players, and the game went on.

I had noticed an old lady in a seat to the rear of the players, who had gone to sleep at Menasha, I believe. Gray, and bent with age, she sat absorbed, and with eyes closed she seemed asleep most of the time until the train stopped at Oshkosh, and took on board the company of lawyers. She then underwent a change, and became greatly interested in the company, looking from one to another, as if she recognized them all, or was trying to recall their faces. When the game of cards started she became restless, would hitch about uneasily in her seat, take up the hem of her faded apron and nervously bite the threads. Once or twice I thought she wiped her eyes, under her "Shaker bonnet," but could not tell. She acted so strange, I became more interested in her than in the players, and watched her closely. She got up after a time and tottered forward, holding on to the seats as she passed.

She brushed against Judge——— in passing, but he had become interested in the game, and did not notice her. Reaching the water tank at length, she drank a cup of water, took a seat near the door with her back to the players. But she did not remain there. Rising again with difficulty, she tottered back to her former seat, but reaching the players she paused directly in front of them, and now excitedly threw back her long bonnet and looked around at the company. Her actions at once arrested their attention, and pausing in their play they all looked up inquiringly. Gazing directly in the face of Judge, she said, in a tremulous voice:

"Do you know me Judge——?"

"No, mother, I don't remember you," said the Judge pleasantly; "where have we met?"

"My name is Smith," said she, "and I was with my poor boy three days, off and on, in the court room at Oshkosh, when he was tried for—for—for robbing somebody, and you are the same man that sent him to prison for ten years, and he died there last June."

All faces were now sobered, and passengers began to gather around and stand over them to listen and see what was going on. She did not give the Judge time to answer, but becoming more and more excited she went on:

"He was a good boy, if you did send him to jail. He helped us to clear the farm, and when father took sick and died, he done all the work; and he was getting along right smart till he took to town, and got to playing kards and drinking, and then somehow he didn't like to work after that, but used to stay out till morning, and then he'd sleep so late, and I could not wake him when I knocked, he'd been out so late the night before. And then the farm kinder run down, and then we lost the team, and one of them got killed when he'd been to town one awful cold night. He stayed late and I suppose they got cold standin' out and got skeared and broke loose and ran most home, but run against the fence, and a stake run into one of 'em, and when we found him next morning he was dead, and the other was standin' under the shed. And so after awhile he coaxed me to sell the farm and buy a house and lot in the village, and he'd work at carpenter work. And so I did, as he couldn't do nothing on the farm.

"But he grew worse than ever, and after awhile couldn't get any work, and would not do anything but gamble and drink all the time. I used to do anything I could to get him to quit and be a good, industrious boy again, but he used to get mad after awhile; and once he struck me, and then in the morning I found he had took what little money there was left of the farm and had run off. After that I got along as well as I could, cleanin' house for folks and washin'; but I didn't hear nothing of him for four or five years; but when he got arrested and was took up to Oshkosh for trial, he writ to me."

By this time there was not a dry eye in the car, and the cards had disappeared. The old lady herself was weeping silently and speaking in snatches. But recovering herself she went on:

"But what could I do? I sold the house and lot to get money to hire a lawyer; and I believe he is here somewhere [looking around]. O, yes, there he is, Mr.———[pointing to Lawyer ———, who had not taken part in the play]. And this is the man, I am sure, who argued against him [pointing to the district attorney]. And you, Judge———, sent him to prison, for the poor boy told me that he really did rob the bank. But he must have been drunk, for they had all been playing kards most all night, and drinking. But, O dear!

"It seems to me kinder as though if he hadn't got to playing kards he might have been alive yet. But when I used to tell him it was wrong and bad to play, he used to say, 'Why, mother, everybody plays now.' I never bet only for candy or cigars, or something like that.' And when we heard that the young folks played kards down at Mr. Culver's donation party, and that Squire Ring was going to get a billiard table for his young folks to play at home, I could not do anything at all with him. We used to think it was awful to do that way when I was young; but it just seems to me as if everybody nowadays was going wrong in something or other. But may be it isn't right to talk to you in this way, Judge, but it just seems to me as if the sight of them kards will kill me, Judge. I thought if you only know how bad I felt you wouldn't play on so; and then to think, right here, before all these young folks!

"May be, Judge, you don't know how young folks took up to such as you; and then I can't help thinking that may be if them as ought to know better than do so, and them as are higher larnt, and all that, would not set such examples, my poor Tom would be alive and caring for his poor, old mother. But now there ain't any of our family left but me and poor grandchild, my dear darter's little girl; and we are going to stop with my brother in Illinoy."

Tongue of man or angel never preached a more eloquent sermon than that gray, withered old lady, trembling with old age and excitement, and fear that she was doing wrong. I cannot recall half she said, as she, a poor, lone beggared widow, stood before them noble looking men, and pleaded the cause of the rising generation.

The look they bore as she poured forth her sorrowful tale was indescribable. To say that they looked like criminals at the bar would be a faint description. I can imagine how they felt. The old lady tottered to her seat, and taking her little grandchild in her lap, laid her face on her neck. The little one stroked her gray hair with one hand, and said, "Don't cry, gran'ma." Eyes unused to weeping were red for many a mile on the journey. And I hardly believe that one who witnessed that scene ever touched a card again. It is just to say that when the passengers came to themselves, they generously responded to the Judge, who, hat in hand, silently passed through the little audience.—Messiah's Herald.

Miscellaneous.

The Queen of Great Britain and Ireland rules over 310,000,000 of people (an increase in fifteen years of 55,000,000,) occupying an area of almost 10,000,000 square miles. The trade carried on by these 310,000,000 amounts to $5,500,000,000 a year. Their flag floats over three-fifth of the shipping on the seas. London, their capital city, has (with its suburbs) a population of five and one-quarter millions! No civilized empire has existed at all comparable to the British in size, either in ancient or modern times.

The Vicar-General of one of the Roman Catholic bishoprics in Brazil considers the Bible a dangerous book. In a circular to the clergy he says that Protestant missionaries are overrunning the diocese and distributing books fair in appearance, but which are "designed to instil poison into the midst of the unwary. Among these books," he continues, "they bring the Bible in the vernacular, without notes, without the ecclesiastical authorization, and mutilated, with which they sacrilegiously endeavor to combat the truth." He exhorts the priests to warn the people not to buy these pernicious works; and, if they have already fallen into "unwary hands" the priests are to take them and "burn or destroy them." One of the missionaries saw a priest burn a New Testament, which he snatched from the hands of a woman who had purchased it. He burned it in the presence of a missionary, declaring that it was a Protestant book and false. The Rev. W. M. Brown, the Superintendent of the American Bible Society's work, says one of his colporteurs in the North (Parahyba) had a box of Bibles and Testaments, weighing one hundred pounds, taken from him forcibly and burned; and the authorities would not listen to his complaint, replying that he was a Protestant, and that the Government would not protect heretics.

RELICS OF THE REVOLUTION.

WILLIAMSPORT, Pa., Nov. 2—Near the river at Renovo, a small town a short distance from this place, there stood for months the ruins of a once famous mansion that rested upon this site for a century. This house was the homestead of the Welshes, who came to this country in the early days of the American colonies and were prominently connected with the Indian and Revolutionary wars. The old mansion was a massive stone structure. The property passed into the hands of Robert Kane, the President of the Renovo Bank, and as he desired to build on the site he ordered the walls to be torn down. Yesterday there was found at the base of a chimney a large stone which had served as a fireplace. This was removed with considerable difficulty and underneath was discovered a receptacle with slices of slate-colored stone on which was engraved a number of Indian hieroglyphics. In the receptacle was a number of curiously wrought vessels, beads, three scalps, a lot of wampum and a bag full of gold and silver Revolutionary coins. Another cavity was discovered in which there was a number of papers and a long legal document with an English seal upon it. Some of the papers relate to the affairs of the Revolution, and it seems that one to whom it was addressed must have been acting in the capacity of a spy. A search warrant to the village that has all gone and been found, and crowds of people flocked to the ruins. Mr. Kane will place the relics on exhibition.

AT THE APPOINTED HOUR.

At the appointed hour shall we be ready,
That hour that hastens, though it seems so long?
Do we so trim our lamps that clear and steady
Their light shall shine to prove our faith is strong?
No others see the radiance glistening from us,
As through the dark we walk unwearying on,
And feel we surely do believe the promise
That he will come although for centuries gone

Yes, He will come! oh mine then blest assurance,
To those who truly watch and wait for Him.
The only hope that Justice endureance,
The star that shines when all besides is dim;
Still let us not be tired of doing duty,
But take our crosses as they come each day,
And this hard life may round into a beauty
We find not known, if we had marked the way.

From sacrifice of self we gain the sweetest,
Purest, and best, of any joy we know;
And when our work for others is completest,
Then, only then, our natures truly grow.
Then while we watch and wait our coming Savior,
The way to make the time seem short and bright,
Is to grow daily better in behavior,
And by our shining prove we have the light.

CANON FARRAR AT TRINITY.

Before the chimes of Old Trinity had pealed forth the hour of 8 yesterday morning people began to assemble about the church doors. By 9 o'clock nearly every seat not marked "reserved" had been taken and for two hours more crowds pressed into the building, filling all the pews, seats in the aisles, and every available foot of standing-room around the pulpit, under the choir-loft and in the doorways. Hundreds, unable to gain admittance, went away before Archdeacon Farrar ascended the pulpit steps to address the largest audience assembled at this centre of wealth and fashion since Dean Stanley preached there several years ago. From 1,500 to 1,800 people listened to the sermon. Dr. Morgan Dix was assisted in the opening services by the Rev. Messrs. Louis A. Arthur, J. W. Hill and Edward Warren. As the hymn for the day was being sung the Archdeacon ascended the pulpit steps and bowed his head on the desk. His text was "Little children keep yourselves from Idols," from the First Epistle of St. John. This letter, he said, was written to Christians, and was probably the last one penned by the Apostles. The sermon, which was read with few gestures, was in substance as follows:

The whole history of the Jews, of which the Bible is the record, is one long warning and protest against idolatry. All Scripture rings with denunciation against idolatry, not merely against the open idolatry, but also against the secret idolatry. There are three forms of idolatry; the worship of other gods, the worship of the true God under false and idolatrous symbols, and the worship of the true God under the guise of false notions, false conditions. The Jews were tempted to worship Asherah, Dagon, Moloom, because they saw in the lives of one of the nations around them that emancipation from shame, from conscience, from restraint, from the stern and awful laws of morality, for which all bad men sigh. It was not the revolting image of Moloch which allured them, but it was the spirit of hatred; the fierce delight of the natural wild beast which lurks in the human breast. It was not any image of Mammon which allured them to worship that abject spirit. It was the love of money, which is the root of all evil; it was covetousness, which is idolatry. And as for Belial, they did not even profess to raise him images. He was only a subjection idol. Milton, where, in the magnificent first book of his "Paradise Lost" he describes these deities, says:

[Belial came last, than whom a Spirit more lewd
Fell not from Heaven, or more gross to love
Vice for itself; to him no temple stood
Or altar smoked; yet who more than he
In temples and at altars, when the priest
Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons who filled
With lust and violence the house of God?
In courts and palaces he also reigns,
And in luxurious cities where the noise
Of riot ascends above their loftiest towers,
And injury and outrage; And when night
Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial, down with insolence and wine.

CHRISTIANS WHO WORSHIP IDOLS.

Do none of you, my brethren, worship Moloch or Mammon or Baal Peor? Have none of you in your hearts a secret niche for Belial? When your heart is absorbed in a passion of envy, hatred and rage; when you are determined if you can to wound by false words, by bitter attacks, by open or secret injuries; when you display "the eternal spirit of the populace" by giving yourselves up to a passion of reckless depreciation of social, political or religious opponents; when you invoke the very name of God that you may emphasize the curses against your enemies; is God the God of your worship? Of your lips, yes; of your life, no. What are you then? Whatever you may call yourself, what are you but a worshipper of Moloch?

And when you talk of nothing, think of nothing, scheme after nothing, care for nothing, I had almost said prayed for nothing, but money, money, money, all the day long; hesting to be rich, and so not being innocent: ready, if not downright, to force, or to steal in order to get it, yet ready to adulterate goods, to scamp work, to have false balances and unjust weights, to defraud others of their rights and claims, to put your whole trade or commerce or profession on a footing which, perhaps conventionally honest, yet goes to the very verge of dishonesty; toiling for money, valuing it first among earthly goods, looking up to those who have won it as though they were little human gods, hoarding it, marrying your sons and your daughters with main reference to it—is God the God of your worship? Of your lips, yes; of your life, no. What are you then but an idolater? a worshipper of Mammon?

If you are a drunkard, or impure: if the current of your life is absorbed and swayed by unholy impulses; if you have flung the reins upon the neck of your evil passions; if the temple of your body is full of chambers in which wicked thoughts are ever bending before the walls which glow with unhallowed imagery—again is God the God of your worship? Of your lips, yes; of your life, no. What are you then, but an idolater? in what respect are you then less guilty than Zimri, the Prince of Simeon, who worshipped Baal Peor? Not an idolater? Alas! my brethren every one of us is an idolater who has not God in all thoughts, and who has cast away the laws of God from the government of his life. I know not that it is a much worse idolatry to deny God altogether and openly defy the brute impulses of our lowest nature than it is in words to confess God yet not to do, not to intend to do, never seriously to try to do what he commands, or to abandon what he forbids.

Atheism? Ah! there is the defiant, speculative atheism which thinks, or thinks that it thinks, there is no God; and there is the practical atheism which, confessing God on the lips, denies him in the life; that atheism which professing to care much for the doctrines of Christ cares nothing for his precepts; the regular utterance of "Lord, Lord," by men who live in dishonesty, adultery, drunkenness, revellings and all sorts of abominable idolatries; or what is as bad, in the secret intrigues of selfishness, in the quotidian ague of frivolity, in the soothing hubbub of slanderous worldliness, in the ghastly, smooth life, dead in heart, of religious insincerity—how many are the atheists then! And if the love of pleasure, and the love of money, and the love of the world be idolatry, alas! how few of us have truly kept even that first commandment, "Thou shalt have none other gods but Me"?

It was said not long ago by a great orator in the House of Commons that the working classes care as little for the doctrines of Christianity as the upper classes care for its precepts. If that charge be true, and none I imagine will deny that there are some grounds on which it may be substantiated, may it not be that the God of the worldling is an idol, a false image, a totally wrong conception of the living God? Of the thousands of men of the world, of the hundreds of gilded youth, of all those in this great city whose god is their belly, whose glory is their shame, who mind earthly things, not one in a hundred but would be shocked if charged with not believing in God. But might not some stern prophet rise to him that tremendous sarcasm of the Apostle James; "Thou believest that there is a God. Thou doest well. The devils also believe,"—and much more than thou doest, they believe and tremble. Dost thou believe that God is righteous; that he is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; that he visiteth iniquity, transgression and sin? Dost thou believe that the moral law which thou art violating deliberately every day is God's law, and that thy sin will find thee out, and that though hand join in hand the wicked shall not be unpunished?

Thousands do not believe this, or live as if they did not. Their lives give the lie to their lips. And what can God say to them but this: Why dost thou break my laws, and takest my covenant in thy mouth; whereas thou hatest to be reformed and hast cast my words behind thee? When thou sawest a thief thou consentedest unto him and hast been partaker with the adulterous. Thou hast let thy mouth speak wickedness, and with thy tongue thou hast set forth deceit. These things hast thou done and I held my peace, and thou thoughtest wickedly that I was even such an one as thyself; but I will reprove thee, and set before thee the things that thou hast done." My brethren, all history, all biography, all the voices of the consciousness of mankind, bear witness that the God who is the idol of the worldling's fancy—the God who is not righteous, who does not punish sin—is not God. The bad man knows not God. He alone who strives to do His will can know of the doctrine. To him that ordereth his conversation aright will I show the salvation of God.

NO EXCEPTIONS TO THE LAWS OF GOD.

If you do not worship this public idol of the market-place, have you no personal idol of the hive? You fully admit, you definitely believe, that in general God punishes sin; that he does not clear the guilty in their guilt; that he did give the moral law; but, turning God into your private idol, do not some of you imagine that nevertheless you will get off? that there is something special in your case that God will make an exception for you? that your temptations have been so strong, your chances so small, your passions so irresistible, your circumstances altogether so peculiar, that somehow that you may sin and escape? aye, and continue in sin; aye, and live in sin; aye, and die in sin, and yet somehow escape the consequences of sin? If so, my brethren, that is not God whom you are worshipping; it is an idol of the cavern. God is a God of laws, not of exceptions; God is a God of justice, not of favoritism. Whatever charge of folly may justly attach to the sayings, "There is no God," that folly is grander, deeper and less pardonable which says that God will deal differently with me than with others. Because you are young, because you fancy that your temptations have been your exceptions, which is not true; because you think that your passions have been strong, which means only that your reason has been weak; because you think you have so many virtues and amiable qualities; because you love and value yourselves and your sins so much that you think that God must look partially upon them, too, shall God because of this self-love, because of these filthy rags of your own righteousness, break in your case and yours alone the adamantine rock that links punishment to unrepented crime? So might your idol of the cavern do; so will not God.

And yet my brethren, if we fling to the moles and bats these idols of the market-place and of the cavern, let not our God, our Father in Heaven, the God, the Lord God, merciful, gracious, long suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, let him not become to us, as he has become to many, as he has become to the Pharisees of this as of all ages, a mere idol of the school. "God is a spirit, not confined to temples; not bound up in books, not confined in ancient creeds. If it be true that the mass of the working classes care nothing for the doctrines of Christianity, may it not be at least in part because those doctrines have been grievously misrepresented to them? The other day a young girl in a London prison was asked for what purpose she thought Christ ascended. Her answer was 'that he might punish people!' This was her notion, it is probably the notion of thousands, respecting him who died that we might live and who ever liveth to make intercession for us. Oh my brethren, how can we expect the ignorant, how can we expect any, to love God if it is an idol of the school like this that we depict for them?" "If their religion be right, where is their day? If God is a bugbear, what is life?" Is there none to tell them that God punishes them only because he loves; because he would forgive; because he would lead us away from the one thing, the only thing, that can be our ruin; that he punishes not one moment longer than when the work of punishment is done.

"When I was young," says Luther, "all at once the sight of the Holy Sacrament, carried by Dr. Staupitz, so terrified me that I perspired from every pore, and thought I should die with fright. When the procession was over I confessed to Dr. Staupitz, and told him what had happened to me. 'My thoughts,' he answered, 'are not according to Christ. Christ does not terrify. He consoles.' Those words filled me with joy and were a great relief to my mind." Wise teacher, true father of the Reformation. Yes, Christ does not terrify. He consoles. The God of terror; the God who is supposed to elect a very small number to bliss, and to reprobate all the rest to perdition and signalize by eternal decrees for his own glory; the God who is supposed to be driven to avenging fury by a wrong opinion on some point of theology; the God who in dreary human systems of the Atonement, which are wholly unlike what the Bible says of it, is represented as so full of wrath that because he must have some victims he ruthlessly smites the innocent; the awful Moloch God of the inquisition and Intolerance, who was supposed to be appeased by bloodshed, and to look favorably on those through whose fierceness the groans of burning men arose to Heaven, as they gasped out in the fires of Seville and Toledo their agonizing souls—the God of Smithfield and of the Armada, the God of the gibbet and the thumb-screw, and the stake and all the hellish implements of torture and tyranny used by priests to deprave the heart of mankind; the God of theological anathemas and religious hatreds; the God of fierce sectarians and ignorant revivalists—this God is not our God, never could be our guide unto death. "Your God," said Wesley to Whitfield, when he was setting forth some hard system of revolting Calvinism, "your God is my devil." But our God is he of whom it is said "God is love." If perfect love casteth out fear, so no less certainly doth perfect fear cast out love. Abject fear, selfish fear, palsied fear, degrading fear, may gash itself or gash others with knives before its Baalim, like a grovelling slave; but the son, even in rage, even in hunger, even amid the swine when he comes to himself says "I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him 'Father, I have sinned.'"

If you ask how St. John in this Epistle helps you to obey his exhortations to keep yourselves from idols, I answer briefly that he helps you in two ways—one by telling you what God is; one by pointing you to his likeness. He tells you what God is in three sentences; "God is righteous," he says; "God is light," "God is love." God is righteous, and, therefore, he hates all unrighteousness and can be guilty of no unrighteousness in himself. Idols which represent him as a God of arbitrary caprice, treating men as though they were mere dead clay to be dashed about and scattered at his will; idols which would represent his justice as alien from ours, and those things as good in him which would be evil in us, are shattered on the rock of this sentence. Idols which represent him as delighting in narrow formalism, self-satisfied security and bitter exclusiveness, making of dull and sordid dogmatists the sole elect, and rejecting the brighter, bolder, larger natures, as though he loved the jagged thistles and the dwarfed bush better than the rose of Sharon and the cedars of Lebanon, idols of the sectarian, idols of the fanatic, idols of the Pharisee, idols of those whose ignorance would label themselves as the only Christians and the only Gospellers, are shattered by the ringing hammer stroke of the truth that God is light. Idols which represent him as only living a life turned toward self or folded within self, caring only for his own glory; caring nothing for the endless agonies of the creatures he has made; burning with implacable wrath against little deviations of opinions; regarding even the sins of children as deserving of infinite punishment, because, though they are finite he is infinite—idols of the zealot, idols of the ecclesiastic, idols of those who think that their puny wrath can work the righteousness of God, are dashed to pieces by the sweeping and illimitable force of the truth that God is love. With these axes and hammers of the Word break down the carved images of idol temples, whether they be reared by systematizing theology or by ruthless syllogism, by religious hatred or by selfish guilt, and so "Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

HOW TO KNOW GOD.

But St. John will not merely leave you to what is abstract. He will point you to one whom he had seen, and heard, and his hands had handled of the Word of Life; to one who was the brightness of God's glory and the express image of his person. This he says is the true God and eternal life. My brethren, if you would know God, the only begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him. And what do we learn of God from him? How can I compress it into a few words? Ah, my brethren, read the four Gospels; read them for yourselves; read them with eyes unblinded by the fogs of traditional exegesis; read the revelations of God in the human life, in the spoken words of your Savior. Do not go to human systems of theology, do not seek human conceptions of art in order to understand him. If you trust even to Thomas a Kempis he will draw you a picture of Christ which leaves out of sight altogether the most essential features of his ministry—that "He went about doing good." If you rely on religious teachers, they may offer you a dead Christ for a living Christ; an equalized Christ for the ascended Christ; an ecclesiastical Christ for the spiritual Christ; a Christ for the elect few for a Christ for the sinful many; a petty, formalizing, sectarian Christ for the royal Lord of the great free heart of mankind; a Christ of the fold for a Christ of the sea great flock; a Christ of Corinth or of Jerusalem, of Rome or of Geneva, of Oxford or of Clapham, for the Christ of the universal world. If you turn to art, if you would evoke even the genius of Michael Angelo to set forth Christ to you, he will make the Sistine Chapel flame with tumultuous imagery, in the midst of which a wrathful, pitiless, avenging Christ turns away from the redeemed, turns away even from his pitying, pleading human mother, to hurl from his burning right hand ten thousand thunders on the crushed, convulsed, demon-tortured, innumerable multitude for whom he died in vain.

No! turn from these shadows; face the sun. Look at Christ himself. See him in his acts; stern indeed to the Pharisee and to the hypocrite, and dwelling on the awful breadth and grandeur and searchingness of the moral law; yet ever tender to sorrow, with an infinite tenderness, releasing the demoniac, giving sight to the blind, cleansing the leper, preaching to the poor, eating with sinners, feeding the hungry multitude, welcoming the outcast publican, suffering the weeping woman who was a sinner to wash his feet with her tears and wipe them with the hairs of her head, and praying for the very murderers who were driving the nails through his hands upon the cross. If you would know how God loves even the guiltiest of his children, see Misery left alone with Mercy on the Temple floor, and hear the voice, so awful in its warning yet so solemn in its tenderness: "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more." And he who thus represented God by his acts, how did he represent him in his words? Was it not solely, essentially, exclusively as a Father? As Our Father who art in Heaven? As the God who maketh the sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust; as the God of little children whose angels behold his face in Heaven? As the God of the lilies and the ravens; the God of the falling sparrow: the God of the Prodigal Son: the God by whom the very hairs of our head are all numbered; in one word which comprises all, the God of love?

Yes, this is the true God, and Eternal Life. So long as we worship idols, so long as we take pleasure in unrighteousness; so long as we love the darkness rather than the light; so long as we mingle human hatred with our worship of him; so long as we swear, like those in Zephaniah by him and Moloch, as like the Samaritans of old, fear the Lord, and serve our own gods, so long we cannot see him, neither know him. Scripture itself teaches us that, and with the merciful he will show himself merciful, and with the upright, upright; and with the pure, pure; so with the froward will he show himself froward. And because to know him is life, and eternal life, and because there is no other life since all other life is but a living death—therefore St. John wrote as the last words of this epistle, as the last words of the whole revelation of the New Testament, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Editor Restitution:

I have no doubt you with many of your readers, have been interested in the account of the Second Annual Meeting of the A. P. C. K., given by our esteemed Sec'y, Brother Donaldson, and for myself I can say that I never enjoyed meetings more than these. The weather was delightful during the entire session, and this together with social enjoyment with those present, made the session refreshing, as well as pleasant and profitable.

We had the pleasure of entertaining Brother and Sister Reed in our home, and not having seen them for nine years, their presence brought to mind memories of the past, giving us changes to recount, some were pleasing and interesting, while others were painful and sorrowful; and among these most of all was the loss of a dear Sister who together with us visited them at that time. We were led to think that time changes many things, and is no respecter of persons, all being susceptible to this; but if progress is made, and changes in ourselves are for the better, then are we the gainers and not the losers. Brother Reed preached for us for two successive Sundays to a large and attentive audience, and we trust much good may result. He has a happy way of carrying his hearers with him, that few speakers possess; and his imagination being so vivid, and his language so beautiful, to sit under his preaching gives one a feeling of joy and glory that is a foretaste of that which is to come. And added to all this we have had the rejoicing joy of having one of our daughters rise and make the good confession, and in the presence of many witnesses see her go down into the waters of baptism in obedience to her Lord's command, to arise to walk in newness of life. Brother Kramer delivered a very excellent and impressive discourse on this occasion, and as at least one more expressed to us, individually, the decision to be on the Lord's side, we trust the words spoken have fallen into good and honest hearts, and that many more may be gathered in out of this City.

The field is a large one, but by individual and united effort, great may be the result, and it behooves every one of us to be up and doing, hoping and working on, prayerfully and faithfully, till the Master comes in glory and power to reward his servants.

May we then be among that number that will hear the "Well done—enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

We were sorry to learn through THE RESTITUTION of your illness, and trust by this time you are better, if not entirely well; and that years of added comfort and usefulness are yet before you. But the unforeseen future lies before us, and whether young or aged, none of us know how long life will be given us here, but we are looking for that which is eternal.

With Christian love to you and those near you with whom we are acquainted, I am your Sister in Christ, Amen. ANNA M. YOUNG.

On our way to the meeting at Watson, Mich., we met the writer of the following letter a few minutes at Bro. Catt's in Martin. The writer says on a separate sheet:—"I send you a letter intended for Mr. David Wylie, an old friend, and just this moment I have heard of his unexpected death, while visiting his son—the news reaching me while writing his name in the letter. Poor man. O, how hard I tried for the last year to enlighten him on the doctrine of conditional Immortality .....This letter enclosed I intended sending to my deceased friend but it is too late. I would be glad to have you publish my letter intended for him in THE RESTITUTION, and it may do more good than if it had been sent to him. Mr. Wylie was an old time friend and an Elder in the U. P. Church for forty years. We were always warm friends, and he was truly a good man, but awfully bound in chains of darkness, owing to his early education on the Sectarian dogma. I have got over all fears of letting my friends know of my change of views, as I can give any one wishing to oppose me, a good and sufficient reason for my change of views."

MARTIN, Mich.

My dear friend Wylie:—

When we met last you told me you would not talk with me again on the subject of Conditional Immortality. As a last effort to convince you that I am not becoming infidel, but truly Christian in my sentiments, I write you these reasons for my change of views.

When God notified Adam and Eve, that if they ate of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, they should surely die, he spoke to their reasoning accountable minds, their souls not bodies. He did not say they should become miserable, but they should die spiritually, temporally and eternally die. Immediately Satan in form of the old subtle serpent came to Adam and Eve and says to them, God is deceiving you "Ye shall not surely die, but live even if you eat the fruit forbidden by God."

Eve listened to the serpent, and the fruit being pleasant to the eye and agreeable to the taste, she ate of it, gave it to her husband, and they ate of it together and died, temporally, spiritually and eternally died. They obeyed the serpent and disobeyed God, and died, as God had warned them they would. The tree of life and immortality also stood in the midst of the garden, and God saw plainly that if they were permitted to stay in the garden they would continue to eat as they had done before of it and they would regain their lives, remain immortal in their sins, and of course sin would cause them to suffer the penalty of the broken law eternally. This was a misfortune to his erring children which he could not allow, so he drove them out of the garden, lest they should put forth their hands and partake of the fruit of the tree of life and become immortal or live forever in their sins and miseries, and to make the matter doubly sure he placed Cherubim and flaming sword over the tree of life or immortality to guard it forever from their approach. He then pronounced a curse upon the ground which they should till and upon the man who should till it, and upon the woman who induced her husband to eat, but the heaviest of all curses rested upon Satan in the form of the old subtle serpent, who should forever creep upon his belly and eat the dust of the earth. Now, my old friend, is it not plain that God has guarded infinitely more thoroughly than he ever guarded any other matter in his dealings with his children against the awful misfortune of their living forever in sin and misery, proving conclusively to my mind that our orthodox theology on this subject is not the teaching of God, for according to that teaching men do live forever in their sins and miseries in hell, or as they call it the eternal punishment of God, and under his wrath and curse forevermore. This is as you and I were taught, and it was the main staple of the preaching and theology of my youthful years. But I now see its utter falsity and that it all grew out of our teachers, and early theologians following the counsel of the subtle old serpent instead of that of God. Ah, my friend, to my mind there is nothing in all our wanderings from God that equals this sad mistake of our teachers. Oh, what has become of all the part of the human race who have lived and died under this awfully blinding delusion, this nightmare which rested upon their souls, causing them to fear and dread their heavenly Father as an unforgiving revengeful God. My dear friend, this delusion had already commenced in Paul's time, for he says in 2 Corinthians ix. chapter I think, referring to false teachers, "But I fear lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ." This fear of Paul must have had reference to this very false teaching, as it refers to the subtle serpent which deceived and beguiled Eve using the very words. These few thoughts I do not write to distort your mind, neither as finding fault with a much and long loved friend, but to convince you that I am sincere and honest in my views, and also to convince you that I have reasons for my change of views and that I am not becoming infidel, but more Christian as I trust in my mind. In Christ is my only hope for a resurrection to life.

L. MONTEITH.

Brother John N. Davis, writing from Montreal, Va., gives us encouragement in these words:

I regard THE RESTITUTION as one of the ablest Biblical journals I have ever read, and I will add I have for over forty years been a student of the Bible, having as early as 1838 joined the so-called Reformed Baptist, or Campbellites, and was a reader of the Millenial Harbinger, by A. Campbell, Apostolic Advocate, and Herald of the Kingdom and Age to Come, by Dr. John Thomas, and more recently Christadelphian, by R. Roberts, Birmingham, England, all able and instructive journals in their day and place, yet in my opinion none surpasses in efficiency and instructive Bible worth, THE RESTITUTION,—and I greatly lament that poverty and misfortune has prevented my paying my subscription, and am forced to throw myself upon the charity of the brethren to send it to me, but possibly by perseverance I may yet succeed in getting subscribers for it, and propose at least to contribute something to its interesting columns.

I had charge of the church in Richmond some fifteen years, contributing to its nurture and progress. Since the death of my wife and my children grown and scattered, I am left alone, poor and helpless,—and much desire the comfort of your excellent paper. A gentleman a few days ago informed me of the death of my dearly beloved Brother, A. B. Magruder, a noble man and advocate of the Gospel. I witnessed the debate between him and E. E. Orels, Campbellite, in 1855, which took place in the county of King William, Va., and was published in book form.

"THE BURDEN."

To every one on earth God gives a burden to be carried down
The road that lies between the cross and crown,
No lot is wholly free;
He giveth one to thee.

Some carry it aloft,
Open and visible to any eyes;
And all may see its form and weight and size.
Some hide it in their breast,
And deem it thus suppressed.

Thy burden is God's gift,
And it will make the bearer calm and strong,
Yet, lest it press too heavily and long,
He says, Cast it on me,
And it shall easy be.

And those who heed his voice,
And seek to give it back in trustful prayer,
Have quiet hearts that never can despair;
And hope lights up the way
Upon the darkest day.

Take then thy burden thus
Into thy hands, and lay it at his feet,
And whether it be sorrow or defeat,
Or pain, or sin, or care,
Upon the darkest day.

It is the lonely load
That crushes out the life and light of heaven,
But born with him, the soul restored, forgiven,
Sings out through all the days
Her joy, and God's high praise.

Jewish Colonization in Palestine.

The Haifa correspondent of the Jewish Chronicle sends the following important letter, dated Haifa, August 4, which we are sure will be read with considerable interest.

"I have just returned from a visit to the Colony of Zimmarin, which may be said during the last few months to have practically sprung into existence. I have watched it now for three years painfully struggling against a collapse, which the Turkish Government spared no effort to bring about, and which nothing but the energetic efforts of its munificent supporter, ably seconded by his local agents, could have prevented. Had any one predicted on the occasion of my visit last year the transformation which I witnessed a week ago, I should have scouted the idea as impossible of realization. One effect of the long delay in obtaining from the Turkish Government permission to build, was to afford time to make all the necessary arrangements for the erection of buildings whenever it should be obtained. About sixty wooden tenements were sent out which could be put up with the greatest rapidity, while stones were hewn, foundations dug, and preparatory work quietly carried on. The result has been that within four months of receiving permission to build, a town has sprung into being, which is now inhabited by 350 persons, and which promises, when thoroughly completed, to be the most comfortable and prosperous colony in Palestine. The elevation of the main street is just 550 feet above the level of the sea, from which it is distant as the crow flies about three miles, and of which it commands an extensive view. It is built about half a mile from the old Arab village which formed a temporary refuge for the male colonists during the last three years. At the worst and most critical period of their fortune even it was deserted. This was the moment when, had I not been supplied with funds by kind friends in England, the colony must have been altogether abandoned; for fevers induced by starvation were carrying off the poor people who had taken refuge in any shelter they could find in Haifa, and all hope of returning to Zimmarin was given up. For several weeks they had nothing to live upon but the weekly pittance of a piastre a day per individual, which I was thus providentially enable to dole out to them.

"A good wagon road ascends the mountain to the foot of the last rise, here it bifurcates, one branch going up directly to the centre of the colony, the other skirting the hill to the wells. Most fortunately abundant springs have been found in the immediate vicinity of the only well which hitherto formed the water supply of the Arabs. Five wells have been dug with the result of finding water within five feet of the surface. It is proposed to connect them so as to form a large reservoir. In the immediate neighborhood a handsome stone bath house has been erected. It is a two story building. The water is led by pipes into the lower story, which is divided into compartments for the men and women, each having two rooms. One of these is an auditorium, and the other contains a swimming bath with the steps leading down to it. On the floor above are to reside the midwife, and the chemist of the colony. As this establishment would, owing to position of the wells, be a little isolated, six cottages of the colonists are erected in its immediate vicinity; from here a road ascends to the colony, which is sixty or seventy feet above the springs, and about half a mile distant.

"The great advantages of the position compensate for the inconveniences attending the distance from water, which no doubt will ultimately be forced up to the highest point of the colony. Meanwhile there are cottages dotted on each side of the road between the wells at the end of the colony street, which turns off from it at an obtuse angle, and is an avenue sixty feet broad, on each side of which shady trees will be planted, while the houses stand about thirty yards apart, each cottage consisting of two dwelling rooms, with a kitchen and outhouse in the rear, and a stable common to two families. The wagon road bisects this street, and at its point of crossing are the main buildings of the colony, which are built of stone. At one corner is the synagogue, a handsome building, 72 feet by 54, with a gallery for women supported on stone columns and arches. At the opposite corner is the schoolhouse, the ground floor consisting of four rooms, each 27 feet square, divided by a corridor; the upper floor is occupied by the masters and those whose functions render such quarters appropriate. The third corner is appropriated to the administration. Here will live the director of the colony, with the secretary, etc., while the residence of the agricultural superintendent occupies the fourth corner. In the centre of the place thus formed it is probable a drinking fountain will ultimately be erected.

"The entire length of the street, from the bath establishment to the last or most southern house in the colony, is just 2,000 yards, or a little over a mile; and it may well be imagined what an imposing appearance this presents on a hill top that four months ago was a desert, and what a miracle its sudden growth must appear to the natives. It was highly gratifying to me to see these poor people I had known in their desolation and misery, now so comfortably installed in their own dwellings, which they keep scrupulously clean and neat. As the land is now all divided off, each family rejoices in a sense of personal possession hitherto denied them, and they take an evident pride in all their little household arrangements for domestic comfort, while the worn and haggard look which marked their countenances is giving place to an expression of beaming cheerfulness. Some of the men leave nothing to be desired in the way of capacity and industry in their agricultural operations, but of course this cannot be said of all. What is of the highest importance is, that they are thoroughly well disciplined and subordinate, a result in the first instance due to the excellent system inaugurated by M. Sebaid, which has since been well carried out by M. Wormser and M. Dugourd. Owing to the exceptional dry season this year, the crops are not so good as might have been wished, but it is probable that the attention of the colonists will be more largely directed to grape growing than to cereals, while near the wells are large nurseries of oranges, lemons, apricots, peaches, and olives.

"The colony is in part built upon an excellent clay for making bricks, and some of the colonists are engaged in this industry, with the idea of using their wooden cottages with sun-dried bricks as a protection against the sun. There is a good blacksmith's and wagon-maker's shop, and doubtless other branches of industry besides agriculture will be opened in the colony as necessity demands.

"Dr. Aquila, of Haifa, whose long residence in the country and knowledge of local conditions and maladies, eminently qualifies him for the post, has been engaged as permanent resident medical man, while to M. Dugourd the colony possesses an agriculturist, whose long horticultural experience, as gardener to the ex-Khedive Ismail, has already been turned to good account. In conclusion, the Director, M. Wormser, deserves the highest praise for the gallant manner in which he has struggled against the difficulties of the last two years, and must regard with no little gratification the present aspect of the colony, as the result of those arduous labors."

The Jewish Chronicle, in a leading article on the subject, writes:—

"Our correspondent's facts and opinions may safely be accepted as those of a keen observer and a most competent critic. For some time past he has been engaged in carefully watching on the spot the progress of the colonization movement in Palestine, and his eloquent and spirited advocacy have contributed not a little to the success which the project has achieved. But though a staunch champion of the colonization of the Holy Land by Jews, he is by no means blind to the difficulties which impede the accomplishment of the task. He has repeatedly taken occasion to point out in our columns the obstacles which are presented by the want of organization and individual shortcomings on the part of the would-be colonists, to say nothing of the huge impediments which they have to contend with in the opposition of the Turkish Government. When, then, he is able to pronounce a favorable verdict, its truthfulness may be accepted as unquestionable. We may be certain that it proceeds from a dispassionate judge, and not from a mere partisan. It is some three years or more since the attempts to form an agricultural colony at Zimmarin were commenced; but it is only within the last few months that they have been rewarded with anything like success. When our correspondent visited the place last year the idea that it might be a thriving settlement of Jewish farmers seemed a dream that would have to wait long enough for fulfilment. His recent visit has shown him that the fulfilment is already in progress.... It is no wonder that these poor fellows were once 'worn and haggard,' seeing that for three long years they were a prey to the hope deferred which maketh the heart sick, and that fever bread of starvation had marked them out for its own. A pathetic story might be written about the sufferings and the brave endurance of these brethren of ours. Had it not been for timely help from England, which was obtained by our correspondent, and the more substantial assistance rendered by Baron Edmond de Rothschild, the establishment of the Zimmarin Colony would have been as impossible as it once seemed to be. As it was, the colonists kept life and soul together on a daily dole of a piastre. The persistence with which the little band clung to the idea that dominated them, in spite of hunger and sickness and every species of discouragement, and the energy with which they used their opportunities when better times came, are eloquent proofs that they are made of the right stuff, and that, in so far as it depends upon them, the success of the Zimmarin Colony is assured.

"The account we publish to-day is the most encouraging chapter which has yet been written of modern Jewish colonization. It shows that the end for which a few—ourselves among the number—have been patiently striving during the last few years is an eminently practical one. Through good and evil report we have persistently maintained that Jews are fitted for agricultural pursuits, and that colonization based on this truth is the most satisfactory method of helping the Jewish victims of persecution. We have never affected to ignore the difficulties attending such a solution of the greatest of modern Jewish problems. To turn peddlers into farmers is a transformation indeed, and we have never lost sight of the fact. To tell a man who has hitherto lived by his wits that he is henceforth to live by the sweat of his brow, is to bid him to revolutionize his ideas, his mode of life—himself, in short. Nay, in many cases, we frankly admit, the transformation is impossible. Uproot a plant and set it in a different soil, however generous, and in a different atmosphere, however balmy, and the chances are it will sicken and die.

To give the Russian Jew a spade in exchange for a hawker's pack, to set him laboring in the fields in place of measuring his mental keenness against rustic obtuseness, to remove him from the abject life of bated breath and whispering humbleness, which he is forced to lead amid a hostile population, and permit him to taste the independence of the owner of the soil, however small his share of it may be—this is not always to save him, though theoretically it is so. Not every man can change his way of living, even for the better, with impunity. The air may be too pure, the wrench too great; and what we thought to strengthen may droop and perish. But it is possible to recognize this truth, and yet to discern the practicability of Jewish colonization. Not every refugee from Russia or Roumania is fitted for a farmer's life; but many such a refugee is. Discrimination is necessary; the hopeless must be weeded out from the promising. That is why the key to success is organization and supervision. Passively to permit a number of emigrants, however enthusiastic they may be about agriculture, to band themselves together in a colony, without the moderating influences of calmer and more experienced minds, is really to do these people a great wrong. If the colonization movement is to develop with a minimum of drawbacks and disappointments it must be carefully and wisely directed.

"That it possesses the elements of success is demonstrated by the letter of our Haifa correspondent. Nor is it only from Zimmarin that good tidings come.

The other settlements in Palestine are making progress, however slow. The indomitable perseverance of the colonists is the best guarantee of eventual and complete success. The task is uphill work, of course. The preliminary labor necessary for the establishment of an agricultural settlement is peculiarly disheartening, for its practical fruits are not immediately visible. The breaking up of soil which bears the impress of centuries of neglect is a tedious and apparently a thankless task. In the case of the Palestine colonists impecuniosity has aggravated the trials of the laborer. The most effective implements, have been wanting, and the interval between sowing and reaping has been tided over only after a sharp struggle. Truly, the lot of the farmer who does not know, however vividly he may picture, the blessings of capital, is a hard one. It is harder still when poverty finds an ally in unpropitious seasons. And with all these drawbacks, the Jewish settler has had to battle.

But the day is breaking at last, and the shadows are fleeing away. Jewish agriculture in the Holy Land may fairly be said to have at length turned the corner.

"Not the least satisfactory circumstance in connection with this question is the change that has taken place in public opinion. It was once the fashion to deride the possibility of the colonization movement. 'What!' people exclaimed, 'turn the Russian Jew into a farmer! The idea is ridiculous.' Derision was followed by contemptuous skepticism. But in spite of ridicule and incredulity the idea made way: it has gained converts among those who were its most determined opponents. One of the most signal proofs of the altered position which the question has now assumed is to be found in the fact that the desirability of training Jews for agricultural pursuits is now being recognized in the most practical manner by 'men of light and leading' in the community. Arrangements have been perfected and practically put into operation for placing a few Russian Jews as laborers on English farms. On the completion of their training they will be assisted to emigrate. The scheme, which is more important for what it promises ultimately to produce than for what it can immediately effect, is being carried out under the auspices of the London Mansion House Fund for the relief of Russian Refugees. It is destined, we trust, to be the pioneer to a much more extended movement. Agriculture offers so excellent a prospect for the Jewish emigrant, not only from Russia, but from this country as well, that every means should be taken to train Jews for it. The matter is one which our large schools, and the Jews' Hospital and Orphan Asylum particularly, might well take up. The action of the Jewish Orphan Asylum in New Orleans, the managers of which have allotted to each pupil a garden plot for cultivation, evinces a recognition of the importance of the question which our own educational institutions ought to share. The Jew as an agriculturist is a new departure; but it is an eminently desirable one, whether reward be had to the requirements of the Russian refugee or to those of the lad whom the community is training for the battle of life. Certainly the new departure is calculated to affect favorably both the character of the Jew himself and the world's estimate of it."

THE OPTIMISTIC CREED.

The tendency of our times is toward optimism. In the past, it was common to find men dwelling on the degeneracy of the times in which they lived. They spoke of past ages as being better than their own. Men were more public-spirited, purer of life, keener of thought, diviner in spirit than they and their contemporaries. If they did not inquire why "the former days were better" than theirs, they thought they were better. We have changed all that. We think there has never been an age like this. We boast of our culture, our benevolence, our "higher life," and our advances in sciences, the arts, and religion. We have gone further still. We expect that our descendants will make greater advances. It is not uncommon to hear preachers speak of the time coming as a golden age. They assure their hearers that the Church will triumph. They promise certain victory to the soldiers of the cross, "I am an optimist by constitution," said a great preacher, recently, "I expect the triumphant victory of the Church." People who do not believe all this, and who maintain that the world is getting worse, and will continue getting worse, are stigmatized as alarmists and croakers. "Do not heed them, say the optimists; they are bilious; their digestion is out of order. We are not told what the antediluvians said about Noah, but there is reason to believe that his warnings did not receive much attention. Even if he had a respectful hearing, nobody seemed to turn his words to practical account. When the flood came no one was in the ark but his own family. Apparently there were optimists in those days. The fact is worthy of consideration because our Savior explicitly pointed out that the days preceding His Second Coming, would resemble the days of Noah in that characteristic (Matt. xxiv. 37, 39).

Naturally, alarmists are not popular. It is much more pleasant to listen to the optimists. We like to be told we are making progress, and that there is a still better time ahead. But the pessimists may be right. Their medicine, bitter as it is, may be beneficial. It might be an unwelcome sound to people around Wilkesbarre to hear some cold night that there were signs of a cave-in. They would be sorry to be disturbed from their beds by a man proclaiming that the pillars of the mines under them were giving way. They would want to know who he was and how he knew, and if they were satisfied they would lose no time in getting to a place of safety. They would be sensible. They would know that it was suicidal folly to disregard a warning like that. That is the way Christian men should act, not the half-and-half people who call themselves Christians, but who are living lives of worldly pleasures.

The message is now being proclaimed through our land that at a time of trouble is at hand. Solemn assurance is given that society, instead of being better than of yore, is worse. We are cautioned against trusting to appearances and deceiving ourselves into the belief that the fair church-going outside is a proof of spirituality. We are warned that victory is not ahead, but the temporary triumph of Godlessness. The future is no golden age, but an age of trial, persecution, and misery. Safety is not to be gained by heedlessness, but by watchfulness and consecration. The Lord is gathering out a people for himself who will be removed out of the evil, and will return with him to witness and share in his triumph. The preachers of this message are "the pessimist, alarmists, the croakers."

When we ask them for their authority they are reasonable. They invite us to look around. To look below the surface. They appeal to the Bible. They point to the prophecies. Some of them have been fulfilled. When they were uttered they were utterly improbable; but not a letter failed. Nineveh is a quarry. On Tyre the fishermen dry their nets. Babylon is the home of the bittern. Israel is a nation scattered and peeled. The line of the prophecies does not end there. It goes forward, and it is not difficult to find our place on the chart. Behind us stretches the line, perfect and accurate. Not one thing has failed of all the things that God spoke. Before us, too, is the line. What does it tell us?

There are two courts of appeal. There is the present state of the world, and there is the inspired Word of God. Both courts pronounce the same verdict. It would be impossible to survey the entire field here. A few facts and quotations may, however, lead readers to examine more extensively for themselves. In an article recently published in The Truth, the writer condemns them with much force. He cites the fact that the murders in the country at large, during the last year, exceeded those of the preceding years by as many as five for every twelve months. "All right," say the optimists. In St. Louis, which is not by any means the worst city in the United States, but may serve as an average specimen, there were last year 27 murders, 88 suicides, and more than 1000 divorces; 3 for every day of the twelve months. On a pleasant May Sunday there were less than 20,000 of all sorts and sizes in all of the Protestant churches put together, while on the same day there were far more than 20,000 on the base-ball parks, and 87,000, it is said, passed through the gates of the Fair Grounds to witness an exhibition given by "cowboys." The same evening more than 2000 whisky-shops were in full blast, and the theatres were crowded to see low and licentious plays. "All is well," shout the inexplicable optimists of the Christian Church. Surely "they have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace; when there is no peace" (Jer. viii. 11).

But what saith the Scripture? "Behold, the day of the Lord cometh, cruel both with wrath and fierce anger, to lay the land desolate; and he shall destroy the sinners thereof out of it. For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine. And I will punish the world for the evil, and the wicked for their iniquity;.... Fear, and the pit, and the snare, are upon thee, O inhabitant of the earth. And it shall come to pass, that he who fleeth from the noise of the fear shall fall into the pit; and he that cometh up out of the midst of the pit shall be taken in the snare; for the windows from on high are open, and the foundations of the earth do shake" (Isa. xiii. 9-14; xxiv. 17-18).

Figurative language, is it? Well, here is some more of it. After announcing the certain doom of Jerusalem, upon which his name was called, God says: "A noise shall come even to the ends of the earth; for the Lord hath a controversy with the nations; he will plead with all flesh; he will give them that are wicked to the sword, saith the Lord. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Behold, evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth. And the slain of the Lord at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth; they shall not be lamented, neither gathered, nor buried; they shall be dung upon the ground" (Jer. xxv. 31-33). There are many such figures of speech running all through the Old Testament prophecies, pointing to the last days. The New Testament is equally explicit and with more fulness of detail. (See Luke xvii. 18-21; 2 Thess. ii. 2 Tim. iii.)

One of the profoundest thinkers and ablest historians of our day, James Anthony Froude, speaking of the world's vaunted progress after comparing our age with other ages in the history of the human race, expresses his deliberate opinion that the accumulation of wealth, with its daily services at the Stock Exchange, and the Bourse, with international exhibitions for its religious festivals, and political economy for its Gospel, is progress, if it be progress at all, toward the wrong place. Baal, the god of the merchants of Tyre, counted four hundred and fifty prophets when there was but one Elijah..... Yet in the end Baal could not save Samaria from the Assyrians any more than progress, and "unexampled prosperity" could rescue Paris from Von Moltke. Thus our age is an age of material progress, but of moral retrogression. A few are being prepared, gathered out of the putrefying mass; they will be taken to meet their Lord at his descent into the air. For the remainder, the nominal Christians, the careless and the avowed unbelievers, there will be a fierce ordeal. Some will be driven for refuge to Christ, purified by the flames; others will graduate in blasphemy and rebellion until the day comes when Christ shall appear visibly with his saints to consume that wicked one with the ferocences of his wrath.

It is of no use deceiving ourselves, or allowing those who prophesy smooth things to deceive us. The Word of the Lord is sure, and those who sit at ease in Zion, those who utter no cry of warning, those who sleep in slothful indolence, will have a terrible awakening.—The Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

Selections.

THE EARNESTS OF THE MORNING.

The true morning is not yet broken; hardly does it give forth any sign of breaking, save the deeper darkness that is the sure foreteller of the dawn.

It is still night upon the earth; and "the children of the night" are going to and fro in the world's streets, doing "the unfruitful works of darkness;" "walking in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries;" yielding to the "flattering lips" of the seducer, that "lieth in wait at every corner," in "the black and dark night" (Prov. vii. 9-21); making "provision for the flesh," by "living in rioting and drunkenness, in chambering and wantonness, in strife and envying" (Rom. xiii. 13); compassing themselves about with sparks of their own kindling, which only saddon the gloom and make us feel more truly that it is night.

It is still night to the church; a night of danger, a night of weariness, a night of weeping. Her firmament is dark and troubled. The promise of morning is sure, and she is looking out for it with fixed and pleading eye, sore tried with the long gloom. Yet it has not arisen. It is still deferred—deferred in mercy to an unready world, to whom the ending of this night shall be the closing of hope, and the sealing of ruin, and the settling down of the infinite darkness. For "the Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness, but is long-suffering to usward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance."

But though it is night, there are times both in the saint's own history and the church's annals, which may be spoken of as mornings ere now. Such was the "morning" to Adam when Seth was born to him after Abel's death.—Gen. iv. 25. Such was the "morning" to Noah when the flood dried up, and the face of the earth was renewed. Such was the "morning" to Jacob when the tidings came to him that Joseph was yet alive. Such was the "morning" of Naomi when Ruth and Boaz wiped off the tears of widowhood, and when in her old age she "saw her seed," and "took the child and laid it in her bosom."—Ruth iv. 16. Such was Hannah's "morning" when, after long years of bitterness, "the Lord granted her petition," and "she went her way and was no more sad."—1 Sam. i. 18. Such was the "morning" that dawned on Job when the Lord accepted him, and turned his captivity, giving him twice as much as he had before, "blessing his latter end more than his beginning."* Such was Israel's "morning" when the Lord turned back the captivity of Zion, "making them like men that dream," filling "their mouth with laughter and their tongue with singing," in the day of their deliverance from exile.

Thus there are "mornings" over and anon bursting on us now. They are indeed little more than brief brightenings of the darkness—lulls in the long tempest that is to rage unspent till the Lord come. Still we may call them "mornings," just as we give the name mid-day to the dim kindlings of the sky at daily noon, in the six months' Arctic night, when the sun keeps below the horizon. Or, better and truer, we may call them "earnests of the morning"—that morning which is to outshine all mornings, and to swallow up alike the darkness and the light of a present evil world. Dim and transient as are these earnests, they are unutterably gladdening. They cheer the heavy darkness and are pledges of sunrise.

Our life on earth, "the life that we now live in the flesh," is thus made up of many nights and many mornings. It is not all one night, nor is it all one day. Everything pertaining to it seems to revolve or alternate. It is a life of sinking and rising, of going and returning, of ebbing and flowing, of shade and brightness. The health of the soul seems in some measure to need such changes, just as the soil owes much of its fruitfulness to the vicissitudes of the seasons.

As there is no even continuance of constant good, so there is no equal pressure of unbroken evil. As the season of calm is brief, so is the burst of the storm. The days of darkness are many—more in number than the days of light, yet they do not last always. "Many are the afflictions of the righteous," yet there are breaks in the line of evil, for it is added, "the Lord deliverath him out of them all."

Our God has so fashioned us, and so regulated our circumstances, that each grief has its crisis, its springtide, after which it seems, as if by law, to recede. Not only can the soul not bear beyond a fixed amount of pain or pressure without giving way, but it cannot be kept too long upon the stretch. If the tension is protracted, the "spirit fails," the mind breaks down. Or if this is not the case, callousness comes on; we grow stupid and insensible. Affliction loses its power by being too heavy or too long.

The highest mountain has its summit; the deepest mine-shaft has its lowest level. Nor, in general, are these long in being reached. So even when there is sorrow upon sorrow, there is respite between, or gladness at the close of the dark series. The outer and the inner world have, to some extent, the same laws of alternation and relief. Tides and variations seem needful in both. Thus it was in the life of David. At one time he stood with gladness in the courts of his God; at another he bemoaned himself, saying, "When shall I come and appear before God?" At one time he went with the multitude; at another he wandered in solitude and exile. At one time he kept holy day with the thousands of Israel, joining in the voice of joy and praise; at another his tears were his meat day and night. At one time his soul was cast down and disquieted within him; at another he praised Jehovah as the health of his countenance. At one time he could look with open eye upon the glory of Jehovah in his house; at another he could only remember him from the land of Jordan and of the Hermonites from the hill Mizar. At one time deep called unto deep, all God's waves went over him; at another the Lord commanded his lovingkindness and opened his mouth in song. Such were the tides of David's history—the vicissitudes of day and night in his varying course. True type of every saint's history, not only in the old age of shadows, but in our own! True example of the changes and tossings marked out for the church in her course on earth from shame to glory! What else are we to look for until the Lord come? In the first age of the church, in the time of righteous Abel, it was so. "The evening and the morning were the first day." In the last age of the church, just are the second Adam is brought in, it shall be no less so. "The evening and the morning were the sixth day." Then comes the world's seventh and brightest day—a day of cloudless splendor, unbroken and unending.

How wise, how gracious that it should be so! One firmament of gloom, spanning our whole life-time, would be intolerable. One long heavy chain of grief, with which we could never get familiar, and on which we could never learn to look calmly; or one linked succession of griefs, ever tearing open old wounds and adding new ones, would wither up existence and blight life before its prime. Man's nature could not bear it; man's heart would sink under it, unless made totally callous by some unnatural process, or sustained by daily miracle; in which case grief would cease to be grief, and there could be no such thing as trial or chastisement at all.

Hence, he who "knoweth our frame and remembereth that we are dust," not only "stayeth his rough wind in the day of his east wind;" but often, for a season, bids both be still, and breathes on us only with the freshness of the mild south. For thus has he spoken, "I will not contend for ever, neither will I always be wroth; for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made."—Isa. lvii. 16. Such then is God's purpose concerning us, and such his reasons for it. The purpose is a gracious and a tender one: no less so are the reasons for it. He tells us, that though he does at seasons, contend with us, yet he will not prolong the contest beyond a certain time or limit; for in such a strife, who could stand before the Mighty One? "In measure when it shooteth forth thou wilt debate with it," (Isa. xxvii. 8); that is, he will set bounds to the sorrow and the smiting which cannot be over-passed; he will say to them, even in their fiercest course, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." For were he to allow that tide to roll on unhindered, who, even of his own chosen and beloved ones, could withstand its rush, or sustain themselves amid its deepening waters?

Yet let us not forget what the sorrow has done for us while it lasted; and what the night has been, though dark and sad.

It has been a night of grief, yet a night of blessing; a night in which there may have been many things which we could wish forgotten, yet many more which we should wish to be remembered for ever. Often, during its gloom, we called it "wearisome," and said, "When shall I arise and the night be gone?"—Job vii. 4. Yet how much was there to reconcile us to it; nay, to fill us with praise because of it! It was then that the Lord drew near, and the world was displaced, and self was smitten, and our will conquered, and faith grew space, and hope became brighter and more eager, and the things that are unseen are felt to be the real and the true: Jerusalem that is above was seen by us as our proper home.

It was then that we had "songs in the night"—Psa. xlii. 8. Our "reins instructed us in the night seasons."—Psa. xvi. 7. It was "in the night that we remembered the name" of our God, (Psa. cxix. 55,) and "desired him with our souls" (Isa. xxvi. 9); "meditating on him in the night-watches."—Psa. lxiii. 6. It was "in the night" that "he led us with a light of fire."—Psa. lxxviii. 14. It was in the night that "the dew lay upon our branch," (Job xxix. 19,) and with the dew there came down the manna; for the manna and the dew fell together, (Num. xi. 9,) so that out of the bosom of the darkness there came at once nourishment and freshness. It was then that we were taught sympathy with a groaning creation, taking part in its "earnest expectation," and waiting for resurrection even as it is looking out for restitution; it was then that we were taught to know our high office, as those who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, "to lead (as one has written) the choir of all-complaining nature;" for it was then that the Spirit's power came forth upon us to tune the chords of our manifold being, that they might give forth the true note of mingled hope and sadness, peculiar to creation in its present low estate; and when we were fretting under the touch, and perhaps, with sentimental weakness, talking of broken strings and a blighted life, the hand of the great Master-tuner was upon us: giving to each rebellious chord its proper tension, that from the re-tuned instrument there might come forth that special harmony which he desires to draw from it in this present age—that special harmony by which he is to be glorified on earth, until Eden comes again and the wilderness blossoms as the rose.†

It was then that we could make the utterance of Jacob's patient faith our own, "I have waited thy salvation, O Lord;" subscribing ourselves to our fellow-saints as "your companion in tribulation and in the kingdom and patience of Christ," (that is, in patient waiting for his kingdom). It was then that these words of blessed cheer fell so sweetly on our ears, "He who testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly," drawing forth from our lips the glad response, "Even so, come Lord Jesus." And it was then that, while learning thus to plead "make haste", we also learned to say with the Bride, "A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me, he shall lie all night in my bosom."—Sol. Song i. 13.

Blessed and profitable, however, as we have found the night with its still seclusion and solemn teachings, it is not the morning nor the day. And its very darkness makes us long the more for the anticipated sunrise—for "the flight of shadows and the eternal daybreak."

Nor are we hindered from desiring the day. Impatience is forbidden, but not desire. Let us possess our souls in patience, for he is neither the brave nor the believing man who says, "Let me die, for the cup is bitterer than I can drink;" but he who under the sorest grief can say, "Let me live on and be useful, whatever may be the bitterness of the cup." But still we may long for the ending of the night. As in sickness we may long for health, and put forth all fit means for its attainment; so in darkness we may cry earnestly for the dawning, especially because we know that God has a day in store for us after the night is done—a day which is to be far more than a compensation for all previous sorrow. For every night God has provided a morning, so that as we have many nights, we have also many mornings even here. They are not indeed "mornings without clouds," but still they are mornings whose cheering light lifts up the heavy spirit and brightens the faded eye.

But for the world, the children of the night, the heedless, pleasure-loving world, what morning is there, or what earnests of the morning? None: Or at least it deserves not the name of morning. Their "sorrows are multiplied," because they have hastened after other gods. Their joy is but a moment. Their consolation is no better than a dream. They serve a god that cannot save, and that cannot comfort. Their portion here at the best is emptiness; and the end is the eternal blackness and the infinite despair. The tidings of God's free love they heed not: but the tidings of his wrath they shall ere long be made to heed; if now they turn not to him who is entreating of them this one favor, that they would bring their sins to him for pardon, and let him bear all their griefs and carry all their sorrows.—H. Bonar.

*Job xlii. 9-12. Yet even here there seems an allusion to the true morning yet to come, and an intimation that all this restored fulness was but an "earnest." For, as has been remarked, while Job lost all his sheep, oxen, etc., exactly doubled to him; his children are not doubled. He had lost seven, and he gets back but seven; for he must look to the resurrection-morning for the restoration of his seven lost ones, and not till then is he to get the double.

†There even the philosophic Germans could express the apostolic thought respecting creation, and give utterance to its sympathies: "When I stand all alone at night in open nature, I feel as though it were a spirit and begged redemption of me. Often have I had the sensation as if nature, in wailing sadness, entreated something of me, as that, not to understand what the longed for, cut through my very heart."—Goethe, quoted by Olshausen on the Romans. And another has thus written: "Even in the things of the world around us there is an element of life, a yearning of what is bound, which, like that Memnon statue, unconsciously makes symphony when the ray touches it from above."—Schubert, cited by the same.

The Uplifted Hands.—Ex. xvii. 8-16.

When the Amalekites appeared in force, and manifested their intention to engage the Israelites, Moses, reserving to himself a more important post, directed Joshua—a young man personally attached to him, and who had already probably evinced the courage and conduct proper to a commander—to choose out a number of men from the general body and give the enemy battle on the morrow. And what did Moses purpose to do himself? "I will stand on the hill with the rod of God in my hand." And so it was done. Joshua led forth his men to the field, and Moses mounted the hill accompanied by Aaron his brother, and by Hur, who is supposed to have been his brother-in-law. Here Moses stood and held up his hand on high, with the wonder-working rod therein. It was, no doubt, held up in the first instance as a kind of banner, or signal, to be seen by the warring host below, and designed to operate as a continual incentive to their valor and prowess while engaged in the contest; and the sight of this symbol and instrument of the power which had worked so wondrously on their behalf, could not fail to nerve their arms with new vigor every time their eyes were turned towards it. Yet it needs but little reflection to assure them, as it assures us, that there was no intuitive virtue in the rod to produce this effect; and that it derived all its efficacy from the Divine appointment, as a visible symbol of that unseen succor and strength which God was pleased to minister to his militant servants fighting his battle, and maintaining the high glory of his name.

Moses was eminently an intercessor with God for the people committed to his charge, and there can be no question that, in connection with these external appliances, fervent prayer for the Divine aid was offered, and we have every reason to believe that the uplifting of the rod was merely an accompaniment of the earnest intercessions which breathed from the lips and heart of the venerable man upon the mountain. And even if this were not the case, the circumstances and the result are strikingly suggestive of the circumstances and analogies of intercessory prayer. It was soon seen that while the hand of Moses was uplifted, Israel prevailed over Amalek; but when the prophet's hand was no longer raised, Amalek was stronger than Israel. Perceiving that Moses could not longer maintain a standing posture, his friends took a stone and put it under him for a seat; and that his hands might no longer fail, they placed themselves on each side of him and sustained his hands until the victory of Israel was achieved. In performing this office, we are not to suppose that both his hands were held up on either side at the same time; for in that case the hands of Aaron and Hur would soon have become as weary as those of Moses had been. The main object of sustaining his arms was, that the rod might be held up. This he doubtless shifted at times from one hand to the other, and thus Aaron and Hur upheld the hand which was next to him, and thus successively relieved this and each other. The view of the prayerful tenor of this action is not new; it is more or less hinted at by every commentator on Scripture, though less made the subject of pulpit illustration than might have been supposed. It is taken by the Jews themselves, in whose Targumim we read, that "when Moses held up his hands in prayer, the house of Israel prevailed, and when he let down his hands from prayer, the house of Amalek prevailed."

Let us then observe, that we notice here grouped together, the hallowed combination of agencies which ought never to be separated—the dependence upon Heaven, with the use of appointed means; the rod in the hand of Moses, and the sword in that of Joshua; the combattled host in the valley below, and the praying hand in the Mount above—all were necessary in the Divine economy to the victory of Israel over his foes. So it must be in our own conflict with the Amalek which lies ambushed within, to hinder our progress to the Mount of God. We may expect no manifestation of the Lord's power, no interference of his goodness, but as the result of a blessing upon our own zealous conflict with temptation. "Prayer without active duty is mockery of God. He who entreats deliverance from the onset and power of evil, yet never makes an effort in his own behalf, nor strives against the sin that wars within him, draws nigh to God with his lips, but is wholly estranged from the fervor of application that issues from the depths of the heart." Yet it was intended to be taught, and was most effectually taught, by this example, that the uplifted hand of Moses contributed more to their safety than their own hands; his rod, more than their weapons of war; and accordingly their success fluctuates as he rises up or lets down his hands. In like manner will the Christian warfare be attended with little success, unless it be waged in the practice of unceasing earnest prayer. It will never be known on this side the Lord's second coming, how much his cause, and the work of individual salvation, have been advanced by the effectual prayer of righteous men. And it is surely a cheering reflection, in the heat and burden of the day of battle, that while we are contending below, faithful servants of God have ascended the hill of spiritual prayer, and are imploring blessings upon our efforts.

And if we are tempted at any time to faint in the discharge of this duty, or to find too little enjoyment in the exercise of this privilege, let us take to ourselves all the encouragement derivable from the assured knowledge, that he who marshals the sacramental hosts, leads them to battle, and fights in their behalf, sustains another office equally important. He has ascended to the summit of the everlasting hill, and is there employed in prevalent intercession for their success; and we may well be consoled with the assurance, that a greater than Moses is mediating for us in the Mount above; and his hand is never weary, his love never faint, his voice never silent.—Kitto's Bible Illustrations.

Abd-ul-Hamid.

His Majesty the Sultan of the Ottoman Empire is a most high and puissant monarch. His will is law, and his nod is death. He has many palaces; he rules despotically over a vast empire; he makes quantities of pashas cross their fawning hands whenever he looks at them; he has the power to do anything to any one of his faithful subjects—except recall him to life after he has killed him. But social power he has none. His life is passed in an endless round of official drudgery, nay, positive servitude. Each minutest detail of business, from the highest visions of diplomacy down to the opening of a new coffee house on the shores of the Bosphorus, passes through his august hands: and each incident of every transaction forms a focus of intrigues which, in their conglomerate mass, it would take twenty sultans with a hundred times Abd-ul-Hamid's power to disarm and defeat. What time, therefore, can he have to spare for society? The Commander of the Faithful may be seen any week as he goes to his Friday's prayer. Then, before the gaze of an adoring populace, through lines of splendid troops, crowds of brilliant aides-de-camp and pashas; fair veiled ladies, braying brass bands, and screaming dogs, there passes a thin-faced, long-nosed, grizzled-bearded, pale man in a half-closed carriage, nervously fluttering his hands before his face by way of salute, and receiving the low salaams of all in return. He hurries into the mosque, scarce giving himself time to throw a half-frightened glance round, and so is lost to view before he can well be seen. When one considers why that face is so worn and pale, why those hands are so nervous, how the heart behind that blue military coat must be beating like a roll of drums, one feels grateful that one is but a private individual, and not his imperial Majesty the Sultan Abd-ul-Hamid II, living as he does in perpetual fear of assassination. The head of the State neither caring nor daring to assume his position in society, no other Turk essays the role of social leadership. Not only might such an attempt cause Him to be unfavorably regarded by his sovereign, but the Turk has neither by temperament nor custom any inclination to mix in European society. It is too gay, too animated for him. He is a quiet, sober, reflective creature, who, after his day's work, likes to return to his home, put on his old slippers and his old coat, and, after his evening meal, devote himself to contemplative smoking among his women folk and his children. Or, if he is in a more social mood, he will perhaps invite some of his intimates to smoke, and chuckle over childish stories with them in the outer chamber. Again, he cannot return hospitality; the harem system puts that out of the question. Finally, he likes to go to bed and to rise early—habits incompatible with social duties.—The Fortnightly Review.

Walking with God.

To be the disciples of any eminent and good man is a privilege. To be his daily companion, and walk with him, and be taken into his confidence, is a privilege that any one of us might covet. What fellowship there must have been between God and Enoch! Who can tell it? What high and holy converse must have passed between them! No doubt the theme of creation and redemption made up a large part of the matter of their conversation. For three hundred years the fellowship continued on the earth, and, without doubt, it has not been suspended in Heaven. Nor was the pleasure on Enoch's side alone; for we read that the patriarch had this testimony: that "he pleased God." God was a delight to his soul, and he was a pleasure to God. In later times we have the story of Abraham, who was styled the "friend of God." Abraham was taken into God's confidence to such an extent that when God was about to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah, he paused and said: "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" That, indeed, was a testimony to the high regard in which he was held by the Lord. Among other of the patriarchs this same kind of intimacy existed. Noah, Daniel and Job are mentioned as being intimate in their fellowship with God; so intimate, indeed, that he said even their prayers would not avail in a certain case. It is a great thought that man should be the friend of God; but that he should be the intimate and confidant of Jehovah is a truth that, but for the Word of God, which bears witness to the truth of it, no man would for a moment presume to think. God as our Creator, Redeemer, and even our Father, is not so striking a fact. In all these relations there is a certain something that suggests awe and reverence, rather than close companionship. Even the filial relation, when God is the Father, is one in which a certain reverential distance is proper. But when God takes us into close fellowship with himself, and calls us friends, it is a thought that may well call out from us the greatest wonder.

If God revealed himself as the friend of his people in Old Testament times, it is much more freely set forth in the New Testament. Just before Jesus went away he said to his disciples: "Henceforth I call you no more servants, but friends." He had, earlier in his ministry, distinguished John the Baptist by calling him "the friend of the Bridegroom." "Ye are my friends." Certainly this is the highest title he could bestow upon them. Do we receive it? Have we appropriated it, and do we rejoice in it? And are we striving to be worthy of it? To have fellowship with the Father and with the Son is the saints' highest privilege. Few, we fear, get beyond the apprehension of mere redemption relation to God, and fewer still get into the comfort of an experimental knowledge of the fatherhood of God. And yet this is for all of us. Alas! that we do not press into it.—N. Y. Witness.

Exegetical.

The expression in John xii. 42; xviii. 13, "high priest that year," used to be looked upon as a great puzzle, and to be interpreted (against the fact) as showing that the high-priesthood in the time of Christ was an annual office. Later commentators, however, have held the view, in substance, that the expression ἐφ' ἑνὸς τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ ἐκείνου marks the fact that the office of Caiaphas included the momentous year in which Jesus suffered, and thus bore a tremendous distinction in the succession of high priests. A pretty close parallel to the expression is to be found in the apocryphal book of Susanna, verse five, which confirms the later interpretation. It reads: "And there were shown two elders of the people, judges in that year (ἐφ' ἑνὸς τῶν ἐνιαυτῶν ἐκείνων) concerning whom the Lord had said: Lawlessness went forth from Babylon, from the elders (that were) judges, who seemed to govern the people." The context implies, and the Syriac version expressly shows, that these elders were not judges for that year alone, but had served a long time. Their mention as judges in that year seems to mark them as the ones during whose judgeship the year came in which the iniquity of the Jewish ruling elders in Babylon was detected and avenged, to the relief of the faithful and the glory of God (compare verse 60). The peculiarity of the expression, in each case, lies not in the use of ἐνιαυτός, for that is frequently used in a note of time, but in the use of ἐκείνος instead of a more general word. If the expression were "in these days," or "at that time," no difficulty would have been experienced. Caiaphas was high-priest for a long period, as the elder-judges were advanced in years.—*N. Y. # The Restitution.

E. A. Chaplin, Editor.

Plymouth, Indiana, November 18, 1885.

Thursday, November 26, has been appointed as a day of thanksgiving and prayer.

Circumstances have prevented replies to several letters received. As soon as we have a little more leisure we will try to respond to our friends.

At the late meeting, the Executive Board decided to confide the Editorial management of The Restitution for the coming year to its present Editor. An experience of nine years has taught us that the place is not only one of great responsibility, but also one of many vexing cares and perplexities. We look to God for his blessing and aid and sincerely desire the prayers of all our readers.

Our Conference Meeting was held according to appointment. To fond memory, retrospecting the pilgrimage journey through this vale of tears, we have no doubt it will be regarded as a waymark in the wilderness by each one who participated in its enjoyments. The preaching was both instructive and practical—reaching the understanding and the heart. While the future glories of God's Everlasting Kingdom, and eternal life through the Redeemer alone, were set before the people, present duties pertaining to the obedience of faith and the formation of Christian character were forcibly impressed upon all who attended. As a result five persons made the good confession and were baptized by Brother Woodward on Monday.

We leave to the Secretary to give a more circumstantial report. We are glad to state that Brother R. S. Dwiggins was able to be with us once more; as it will be recollected that for a year or two past his health has been quite poor. He contemplates spending the winter in Florida. Brother and sister Woodward from Michigan were in attendance during the entire Conference. Their visit will be held in grateful remembrance, not only in Plymouth but in several other localities in Indiana where their labors of love have been a special blessing to the people through the goodness of God our Heavenly Father.

In addition to personal attendance we had several letter from brethren and sisters from abroad who were unable to be present. We hope to give some or all of these in a subsequent number.

War at last has broken out both in South Eastern Europe and in South Eastern Asia. The State of affairs has not been settled by diplomacy and the appeal has been made to the sword. The formation of each part of the Great Image has been the result of war and revolution, from the head of gold down to the clay and iron feet. So far as the war in South-Eastern Europe is concerned, its importance is to be estimated from what its bearing and result may be in bringing out distinctly the toes of the Eastern foot. After the toes the Stone.

We subjoin the following account of the countries, and their present relations to each other, and to European powers generally, from the Voice, an excellent paper published in New York.

THE BROIL IN BULGARIA.

The Bulgarians were originally of Finno stock, though from centuries of residence among the Slavonian races, they have come to be classed in the great Pauslavic brotherhood. They take their name from the town Bolgaria, on the river Volga, where they settled in early days. About the middle of the sixth century they spread over their present territory, and, indeed, have ever since occupied, not only the land which bears the name of Bulgaria, but nearly all the country between the Danube, the Ægean and Black seas, and as far west as the Albanis. The Roumelians, with whom they have recently made alliance, are as much Bulgarians as those who bear the name, their country having been arbitrarily divided by the European powers. These people have always shown a strong tendency toward organic union among themselves. Neither conquest by the Turks, nor forced subjection of their Church to the Greek, nor yet the ceaseless influence of Russian agents, has obliterated the strictly Bulgarian sentiment. This is shown in the revival of the use of Bulgarian language and literature in their schools and churches, and by the recent independence of their ecclesiastical institutions from the control of the Greek patriarch. But in 1878, by the treaty of Berlin, the Bulgarian lands were divided into five parts, one of which was given to Servia, one to Roumelia, one to Turkey, one remaining nominally independent with the name of Bulgaria, and the remaining section, Roumelia, put under a governor-general nominated by the Sultan. The separation of these fragments is unnatural and strained. Two of the pieces have gravitated into an organic union—viz., Bulgaria proper and Eastern Roumelia. Prince Alexander, of the former, crossing the Balkans, was received cordially by the Roumelians with an ovation at Philippopolis as enthusiastic as if he were entering his own capital, Sofia.

The attitude of neighboring countries toward this union is easily explained. Servia makes war because she knows that the union, if permitted, will in time draw away the piece of Bulgaria which fell to her share, and thus destroy her prospect of ever dominating the countries between the Adriatic and the Black seas. Greece has recently felt the bee of empire buzzing in her bonnet. The recent restoration of the name of King Con of Greece to the Peloponnesus and adjacent islands, has revived the memory of her ancient glories, and intoxicated her with the notion of again becoming the Greek Empire. From Athens she desires to shadow all the Macedonian hills, and in time to reinstate herself in ancient Byzantium. This reunion of Bulgaria and Roumelia is a prophetic menace to this ambition. So Greece is ready for war.

The Turk is displeased with the union, as it deprives him of the control of Roumelia, and makes the western boundary of his empire almost the walls of Constantinople instead of the Balkan Mountains. Russia is dissatisfied because the union was brought about without her consent, and in spite of her machinations, and builds a barrier to her aggressions against the Turk. Indeed, nobody seems satisfied with the union, except the contracting parties themselves, a mere handful of people compared with the great powers about them. Whether it will be permitted to stand or not depends upon the Governments represented in the Berlin Conference. If the Bulgarians give promise of sufficient strength to maintain their independence, they will doubtless become the proteges of the European powers, and be encouraged to build a kingdom which, with proper alliance, shall resist Russia in her attempt to get to Constantinople. There should be, for the peace of Europe, a strong and staple empire covering the entire peninsula between Italy and Asia Minor. Will Greece, or Servia, or Bulgaria be at the head of it?

News Items.

Servian outposts continue to attack Bulgarian frontier posts.

In the frontier skirmish at Trn today eight Servians and one Bulgarian were killed.

Nessa, Nov. 18.—It is reported that all the powers, except England, have suspended official relations with Bulgaria.

Athens, November 18.—Advices from Epirus say that the country is in a deplorable condition. Albanians are deserting by wholesale from the Turkish army, owing to privations, and are marauding and pillaging Christian villages, and killing all the inhabitants who resist them. The Turks, fearing a revolt, are sending their harems to Macedonia.

Constantinople, Nov. 13.—The Turkish Government has forbidden the importation of grain from Albania.

Calcutta, Nov. 13.—Lord Dufferin, Viceroy of India, has ordered Gen. Prendergast, commander of the Burmah expeditionary force, to invade Burmah forthwith and proceed with all haste to capture Mandalay. The British forces will now cross the frontier immediately.

Recent dispatches from the Rangoon state that the inhabitants of districts in British Burmah where no large garrisons are maintained are greatly alarmed over reports that King Thebaw has subsidized 15,000 Dacoits to cross the frontier and begin plundering and murdering at the first note of war. Dacoits are robbers who work in large gangs and are noted for their bold exploits. Having neither baggage nor a commissariat, these bands travel with marvellous speed, and it will be hard for the British troops to catch them.

Rangoon, Nov. 13.—The British troops will mass at Thayetmyo, and will thence make an attack on Minhla, where Burmese troops are arriving. Re-enforcements have been sent to Youngbue, which is menaced by a force of 6,000 Burmese.

The British authorities have issued a proclamation to natives of Burmah assuring them that none will be molested in their trading, religious, and other privileges, and that all native chiefs, and military officers will be retained as long as they remain loyal; but will be punished if they maltreat Englishmen.

District officers are ordered to disregard orders from Mandalay, as Thebaw will never be King again. Gen. Prendergast has arrived at Thayetmyo.

Athens, November 16.—The Greek Government has contracted for sixty mitrailleuse and Nordenfelt guns and 140,000 rounds of ammunition, at a cost of $100,000. The Government has also contracted with the National bank for a loan of $380,000.

Rangoon, November 15.—Armed steam launches from the British steamers Kathleen and Irrawaddy have captured King Thebaw's war vessels.

Rangoon, November 16.—In the fight with the war vessels belonging to King Thebaw, yesterday, the fire from the British caused 200 of the crew of the Burmese vessel to jump overboard. The British then boarded the vessel and proceeded up the river with her.

It is reported that 3,000 troops are stockaded at Fort Kuligon, which occupies a high dominating position overhanging the river at Minhla.

Constantinople, November 16.—A Cabinet Council is now discussing Prince Alexander's appeal for assistance.

Belgrade, November 16.—After desperate fighting yesterday the Servian troops occupied positions at Raptcha. The losses on both sides were heavy. This victory enabled the Servians to turn the very difficult and rocky gorge of Dragoman Pass, and the Bulgarians, after a gallant resistance retreated to Slivnitza, where an important engagement is expected to take place today, which will probably decide the fate of Sofia.

Louis Riel, the Canada rebel, was hanged at Regina, the capital of Northwest Territory, this morning. The French Canadians of the Eastern provinces of the Dominion have threatened revolutionary trouble in the event of Riel's execution, and it now remains to be seen what they will do about it.

Conference Report.

The First Quarterly Conference of the Church of God in Indiana, convened as per notice given, at Plymouth, Friday, Nov. 13, 1885, and continued over the following Sunday. A good number of friends from different parts of the State were present, and a very enjoyable and profitable meeting together was the result. The little hall where the brethren at Plymouth meet, was closely packed at each session, and good attention was given to the word spoken.

Brother and Sister Woodward, who have been doing such noble work for the Master at Argos, Mentone and Macy the past five weeks, were with us, and endeared themselves to the friends here by the earnest and loving way in which they presented the blessed promise of God's love to man.

Brother and Sister R. S. Dwiggins, and Sister A. Thompson of Rensselaer, attended this meeting, and as it has been two years since many of the friends had seen their kind faces, they were gladly welcomed by God's little band of waiting ones here.

Brother and Sister H. L. Lehman of Ohio, came to this gathering, and we hope they will come again. It does us good to meet these earnest followers of the Lord.

Interesting letters from different isolated brethren and sisters were read. Such letters from brethren who do not have the privilege of meeting with those of like faith, we hope will be continued; they add interest to the Conference and encourage all who listen to them.

As a direct result of this meeting, on Monday morning we witnessed the baptism by Brother Woodward of five dear sisters. Three of these have been scholars in our Sunday School for some years, and having learned well the way of life, see the glories just a little way ahead, and have determined to give their lives while in youth to the cause of their Redeemer. We pray the Lord Jesus to keep them faithful and guide them, with all his loved ones into his bright happy home.

This report would be incomplete were we to stop without saying that some of the friends gathered on Monday at the home of Brother Nathan Macey for a prayer meeting. Father Macey, as we all call him, is suffering from paralysis, and cannot attend meetings any more, and this evidence that he was still remembered by the brethren and sisters, together with the fact that three of the five sisters who had just been immersed were his grand-daughters, filled the heart of the old pilgrim to overflowing. Though weak in body, his faith is strong in the Lord and the power of his might.

Brother and Sister Woodward went to Argos and held meeting Monday evening, at Mentone Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, and will then return to their work in Michigan.

Editor Restitution:

I received a letter yesterday from Sister Abby A. Howard, that some of the Brotherhood thought it might do good to have published as Brother and Sister H. had but recently joined the Primitive brethren. I was requested to send it to you and ask you to publish it if you think proper.

Yours in the Hope of the Gospel, Drucilla Warbritton.

Winchester, Va.

Sister Warbritton:

I have been requested by the House of the Lord to write to you, as I have lately joined the Brethren and Sisters here with my husband and expect to remain. (D. V.)

I have been a reader of The Restitution for many years, and have seen your name in its columns, which assures me we are of "One Faith and Hope," members of one family, and it certainly is our duty to love one another, and we shall if we are what we profess to be.

My name was Perry (Abby A.), for 36 years, but last June, I took the name of Howard. You will remember the name of Daniel Howard who went to Palestine two years ago, and returned the next summer after. Well, in the Providence of God we have been led to this place, where we find some congenial spirits and feel that the Lord has led us here, and we propose to abide here till the Master comes unless something not seen by us, shall in the future prevent.

Dr. Way, (the scribe of the House of the Brethren), received your letter about the time I arrived here from Ct. and read it to me, and I was much pleased with the idea of your coming here, and we have been waiting to hear from you again. We are happy in each others society, trying to build each other up in the most Holy Faith, and also in works.

That is the chief aim of Brothers and Sisters, here, to be a help to one another in every way possible, and to add to their numbers persons of like minds. Bro. N. J. Morgan is the instigator of this movement here in Va. I think he has lived here 16 years, is a thorough Bible man, without "fair chance," or any of those speculative ideas being gathered up by many in these days, and brought in to distract and divide the body of Christ. He and his beloved companion are self-sacrificing godly people; and they have found in Dr. Way, and his amiable companion help-meets truly in this great work or trying to gather a people to this place who shall carry out the principles of Primitive Christianity, viz. "To do to others as they would have others do to them." The Dr. and wife, and three children, have not been here but a few months, he has been a practising physician in Baltimore and other cities for years, and has much experience in the world, and many honors conferred upon him from the world, but like Paul "counts it all loss and dross" for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord." They live in the house with Bro. M., but in separate families, as we all do. I could not come into a community where all lived in one house, and had one table like many communities now in existence, and many that have existed for a short time in the past. We live in a tenement that was vacated the day after I arrived here. (It seemed on purpose for us.) I was here two weeks before my husband came. We were married at Hot Springs Ark.; and two months after. I left there alone for my old home in Ct, and he was calculating when he had settled up his business there to go to Asheville N. C., to live, and I was to return to that place.

He went there according to the arrangement, but did not like it well enough to make our home there, and having in the meantime read the article on "Primitive Christianity" in The Restitution, inviting correspondence or a visit of the Brethren to this place, he wrote to the Brethren here, and then to me to come here, and see the country and the people. So I came and received a hearty welcome from the Brethren and Sisters. They have shown us much respect and honor since we come among them, (much more than we deserve). They have a Chapel built by Bro. M. for the preaching of the Word, and we have both been urged to speak many times. Tho' the brethren are far ahead of me in

The church of God at Cleveland, O., will hold meetings at 10:30 a. m. every Sunday (D. V.) in Bland and Heller's Block, Rooms 36, 37½ Ontario Street, Corner of Bolivar, north of Central Market. Brethren from abroad of like faith and all searchers after truth are welcome redeemed and ability they humble themselves to pray and listen to a weak man. We all have our place in the building. "There is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, for ye are all one in Christ Jesus, and if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." There are several living our a few miles (near the mountains), who are interested in the Word, and also in the movement. There have been three brothers here the past week, intelligent and smart men who have just broken the shackles of the Pres. Ch. of them, having gotten disgusted with creeds, and elect-distinctions, and having heard the Dr. speak in their place, become very much interested. I had the privilege of presenting the Word to them in the Chapel one evening by request, and they spent a part of a day with us at our own home, and seemed very anxious to hear the word expounded, as they have just got their eyes open concerning "Man's nature," and reward in the kingdom at the coming of our King and Lord. The Dr. and wife, will go to their place this week, (D. V.) to spend some time with them, and to instruct them in the Word, and hold meetings there. I received a cordial invitation from them to come with my husband, and hold meetings in their place.

Well, dear sister, I shall weary your patience, and will close hoping we may see you here with us, if you think you would enjoy our society. We are quite sure we would yours, if you choose to come.

Let us hear from you soon, whether you come or not we can love one another, and confer together upon these great Bible subjects. With love from all the Household of Faith. Your Sister. Abby A. Howard.

"Sound an Alarm."

"Christianity: not Communism," by Rev. Robert A. Watson M.A., Dundee, is the heading of a recent leading article in the Christian Leader. The writer points out the evils that threaten us as a nation, the defects and danger of Communism as a means of relief, and concludes that to "Christianity alone must we look for the remedy for our social ills." His opening paragraph reads as follows:—

"Christians should not be alarmists: yet we cannot doubt the approach of a serious crisis in our history. In many quarters there are distinct signs of a purpose to alter the whole course of legislation, to urge communistic measures, and practically to set aside religion as the remedy of social ills. The belief is spreading that by means of legislation we may do all that Christianity has attempted, and a great deal more. My purpose at present is to show that the lines of progress hitherto followed point to Christianity—and Christianity alone—as the hope of our future, and that Communism, or anything resembling it, would be a reversal of the aims by which under the providence of God our nation has been guided in the past."

But if there is a "serious crisis" before us, whether it be a national crisis or the coming of a terrible day of the Lord, we ask, What should Christians do? Fold their hands supinely, seal their lips, for fear of being called fanatics, bolt their feet fast in the stocks of tradition and worldly policy? Is this the work of the people of God? If so, who is to send the message when God commands, "Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in the holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the Lord cometh, for it is nigh at hand." To the earnest cry, "Watchman, what of the night?" the watchman is to keep silent, especially if danger is near.

We do not believe in false alarms, hap-hazard interpretation of prophecy, or the running with uncertain messages; Satan has done much in this way to prejudice many. But when signs predicted centuries ago by the prophets and the Inspirer of the prophets, the Son of God, are being so clearly fulfilled before our very eyes, are we to remain silent? Verily, no! God's cause needs alarmists today—those who will lift up their "voice like a trumpet;" those who will "cry aloud and spare not;" those who know from the word whether it is a day of peace or a night of trouble that lies just before us; those who cleave to the word of God instead of the heavy traditions of the past or the pleasing phantasies of the future; those who can faithfully "show my (God's) people their transgressions" and "sins,"—such men—alarmists let them be called—are wanted. "The Lord God hath spoken, who can but prophesy?" —Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

We Know It All.

Can you tell me how many starlets
Are twinkling and gleaming on high?
Can you tell me how many cloudlets
Are speeding white sails through the sky?
One there is who has numbered them all,
Who knows every star, whether great or small.
He knows them all, he knows them all.

Can you tell me how many birdlets
Are finding bright wings through the trees?
Can you tell me how many flowerets
Are nodding their heads in the breeze?
One there is who has numbered them all,
'Gainst whose will not a sparrow can fall.
Nor a floweret fade, nor a floweret fade.

Can you tell me how many children
Are sleeping serenely to-night?
Like lambs in the fold of their Shepherd
Kept safe through His power and might.
One there is who has numbered you all.
Who knows each dear child, whether great or small.
And loves you too, and loves you too.

A Mother's Mistake.

A correspondent at a distance tell this sad story: "There is now living in this country an octogenarian who relates the following circumstance. She was called to attend the last illness of her son, who died within two miles of her. He had been a prosperous man in worldly matters—married the daughter of a prominent judge, and had accumulated considerable means. He had, however, never been concerned much about religious matters. He was racked and tormented with pain and realized that the end was nigh. 'Mother,' he said, 'you taught me how to live and get on in the world, but you did not teach me how to die; now I am lost.' 'Oh! how it wrung my heart,' she would add with bitter tears. They buried him with no ground for hope, so far as I know.—N. Y. Observer.

Rum-Bought Gewgaws.

I have a loathing, I have a thorough disgust for the gewgaws of rum-bought wealth. When I get into the horse-cars and smell the stench of liquor, when I get into the streets and find the same, I see behind me that brown-stone mansion on our Nook, built of rum, and behind that again I see the pallid faces, shivering forms, and flattering rags of a numberless host. And I would have had one of the daughters of that mansion stand at the door, and watch her father's victims as they march into the dock of the police court every day. I would take another child, and the police should lead her through all the dark alleys and passages where broken-hearted mothers, and children without parents or food, attest to the manner in which her parent made his money. Intemperance cannot be cured by legislation or by sermons. The rumseller is the root of all evil, and until it is made a crime to sell intoxicating beverages, intemperance will continue to exist.—Wendell Phillips.

Skating Rinks.

Keep out of the skating rinks. I could mention a number of cities—four at least—where I have labored and found the same lamentation from the lips of mothers and fathers, who would say to me, "I wish you would talk to my daughter." "I wish you would talk to my boys. I have said all that I can to keep them from going to such places, but they will go."

I have heard from the lips of three physicians the statement that a large proportion of the girls from twelve to sixteen years old who attend these rinks have, as a result, blasted lives before them. Many a heart-broken mother would give all she ever possessed could she place her daughters and sons where they were before they attended the rink. People may call skating rinks places of innocent amusement, and perhaps they might be made so, but they are not. I consider them, next to intemperance, the greatest curse of our land to the young.

I was at the home for the fallen the other day, and the matron told me that the skating rinks were the greatest curse to the city and to the young, and that the majority of young girls under her charge were girls who were once pure and good, but had been allowed to attend the rinks and now see their folly when it is too late. The following from the Minneapolis Tribune will give some idea of what men in authority think of those things:

"The rapidly shortening days are bringing us nearer the season when an effort will be made to revive the skating-rink craze; and in view of the fact the following statement made by the chief of police of Coney Island, N. Y., is worth noticing: 'My private books,' so says Captain McKane, 'will substantiate the fact that nine out of ten girls between the ages of fourteen and sixteen arrested by officers on the island late at night, during the past summer, have upon private questioning by me, dated their fall from the time when they commenced to frequent skating Rinks. This is no exaggeration,' he continues. 'I used to think, when I read of clergymen denouncing the rinks for the immorality that was bred there, that the rinks were harmless, and that those gentlemen were inclined to sensationalism. Now, from the stories told me by these young girls right here in my private office, I can appreciate the truth of their remarks, and realize the danger that surrounds the young female in such resorts. I esteem this fact of such importance that I think it ought to be known.'"

Keep out of these death traps.—Mrs. H. L. Hastings, in Christian.

A Shot at Profanity.

In number 104 of a pocket series of tracts, published by Phillips & Hunt, New York, Rev. R. H. Howard treats profanity in a very incisive manner. The tract is short and striking and ought to be circulated widely among those given to that most pointless of sins. He writes as follows:

"Man's name," says Goethe, the great German poet, "is not like a mantle which merely hangs about him, and which, perchance, may be safely twitched and pulled; but is a perfectly fitting garment which has grown over and over him like his very skin, at which one may not rake and scrape without wounding the man himself."

This reflection was suggested by the fact that his friend Herder had once allowed himself the liberty of indifferently to him (private) a piquant epigram the point of which turned on an ingenious, yet rude, play on Goethe's name: certainly a very impolite, not to say an unpardonable thing to do.

Meantime, for the same reason that no man takes amiably any such liberties as those above mentioned with his own name, we keenly feel and vigorously resent, withal, any such liberty when taken with the name of a dear friend. The name may be an unfortunate one in itself, yet so intimately is it associated with the person and character of one whom we respect and love, that, homely as it may be, it partakes of so much of the sacredness of the precious personality to which it belongs, and of the friendship that has been cemented by years of good-will and kindly service, that we can in no wise consent to its being, in any way, made light of, much less to its being made to serve as the butt of a vulgar jest.

In the light of this natural, instinctive repugnance to any trifling with a precious name, we come to understand the deep, unconquerable aversion and prejudice which every devout and refined mind cherishes against everything like profanity. We never cease to be shocked at any light and trifling handling of the name of the Supreme Being. With feelings of intense and unutterable loathing and disgust we turn from the man who habitually takes the name of God in vain.

It is difficult to name or to conceive of a viler social pest than a profane man. Vulgarity is bad enough. Blasphemy is vastly worse. Vulgarity is disgusting. Blasphemy is both disgusting and shocking. Not only is profanity more wicked than merely vulgarity, it is more material in its effects, blunting, as it does, not only the blasphemer's own religious sensibilities, but withal those of all such as habitually hear him.

The vilest, cheapest, most senseless and utterly irrational of all vices is the vice of profanity. It affords no pleasure, yields no profit, gratifies no natural appetite, commands no man's respect, betrays an ignorant, vulgar, poverty-stricken mind, as well as an utter lack of good-breeding, and paves the way to sure and irremediable demoralization of character.

But while self-respect should prevent every one claiming to be a gentleman from the use of profane language, it should be especially remembered that such language is a deadly, damning sin. Yea, remember God's own most solemn words of admonition relative to this matter: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for God will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain."

Galesburgh, Mich.

Editor Restitution:

If my little contribution is interesting, please publish; if not throw in the waste basket. You remember me at the conference in Watson as the Sister that led the social meeting. Well, three weeks from that time, by request of the church there, I preached to them morning and evening to an attentive congregation. Had a blessed time. Shall visit them again if the Lord will. Please speak of this, so that Bro. O. C. Ramsey, where ever he is, will know of our whereabouts as he reads the paper. I do thank the Lord for the light received at the conference.

Bro. Chaplin, God bless you, restore you to health, and give you strength to preach the Word.

Poetry.

THE NIGHT IS FAR SPENT.

Come saints, one and all, awake at the call,
The night is far spent, the day dawn is near;
No time for reposing, for earth's nearer arresting,
And soon in his glory the Lord will appear.

Then watch his returning with lamps trimmed and burning.
Gird on the whole armor, stand firm on the rock;
Send the glad proclamation from nation to nation,
The Shepherd is coming to gather his flock.

God's blanket of old hath events long foretold,
And now in the grave the prophet doth rest;
But the days soon will end, when he will ascend,
And stand in his lot with the good and the blest.

JERUSALEM.

Many persons who visit Jerusalem are no doubt disappointed because the actual city which they behold is so unlike the ideal one which they have pictured to themselves. With a few this disappointment arises from sheer ignorance of what they had a right to expect, and for this they have no one but themselves to blame. Jerusalem is not a city of broad streets, beautiful gardens, fine houses, elegant suburbs with lovely promenades, grand hotels, theaters and attractive places of entertainment. Travelers who expect to find any of these things in Jerusalem simply show that they have read nothing about the place; and if their subject in coming here is chiefly to enjoy them as they would do at a pleasure resort in Europe, they certainly ought never to come. Strange as it may seem, such travelers appear from time to time in the Holy City; but fortunately for the reputation of the countries from which they come, the number is small. Having seen thousands of travelers to the Holy Land, it gives me pleasure to testify that the large majority of them come with an earnest desire to learn all they can of this wonderful country. At the same time, many of these persons do themselves an injustice, because they have failed to study carefully, before coming here, at least one of the many books descriptive of the place and scenes which they intend to visit.

Formerly, before so many buildings were erected on the west of the city, Jerusalem presented a very imposing aspect to those who approached it from that direction. Now, to one coming on the Jaffa Road, at the very point, about a mile out, where otherwise the walls and minarets would begin to be seen, a row of modern houses on either side of the street mostly occupied by Jews, here and there a few dirty shops kept by Jews, and the lofty Russian buildings in the foreground, are the chief objects that meet the eye; and these certainly do not awaken any wonderful emotions, perhaps not even the slightest degree of enthusiasm.

The case would be different were one to approach the city from the north, that is, from the direction of Nablous or Shechem. New buildings are being erected north-west and north of the city; but because the ground in that quarter is comparatively low, they can never obstruct the view of Jerusalem itself. From this direction Titus, at the head of the fifth, twelfth and fifteenth legions, approached the city. These encamped on Scopus, which is directly north of Jerusalem, and looked down upon the massive walls which they had come to overthrow and the proud structure of the Temple which they had come to destroy.

If ever a railroad is built between Jaffa and Jerusalem, it will be a pity if the Jerusalem depot cannot be located at this point, since, although it is a mile from the city, it commands such a splendid view of the town that even those who are not subject to impressions would find themselves deeply moved, were they to have this scene brought suddenly before them. Soon after Titus reached Scopus, the tenth legion came up by way of Jericho, and camped on the Mount of Olives. From this direction the view, although unlike that from the north, is still very imposing. Coming from the south, or Bethlehem, the aspect of the city is wholly changed,—grandeur has given place to the picturesque.

What is the advantage in coming to Jerusalem? Very few things can be pointed out as having actually existed in the time of Christ. We have the rock beneath the Mosque of Omar, where the Temple actually stood. We can certainly point to the location of the Castle of Antonia, where Paul was confined before taken to Cæsarea-on-the-Sea. We can point out the old stones of Herod's Temple, where the Jews wail over the sanctuary fallen in the dust and trodden down. We can show the pillars of the double and triple gates of the Temple area, through which our Lord must have passed. Moreover we can point out the site and some of the stones of the "Tower of Herod, which was called "Hippicus," in the castle near the Jaffa gate. Perhaps, besides these, a few other objects of minor importance can be shown as genuine relics of nineteen centuries ago; but all else is changed. Everything is unreal, unsatisfactory, disappointing, and often disgusting, and leads us away from the Master, rather than brings us into closer communion with him. Simply as a city, Jerusalem is not worth a trip across an ocean and a continent to visit it. But in its sacred and historical associations, for which chiefly it should be visited, no other city on earth can be compared with it. Even the dinginess and filth of its narrow streets, the wretchedness of its modern houses, and the misery, ignorance, and degradation of its present inhabitants, are not looked upon in vain by the devout traveler, since these forbidding objects teach what a mighty moral and physical purification is needed before this city can become again the "joy of the whole earth."

I have referred to the view from Scopus, and I am sure that the most satisfactory thing the traveler can do is to go entirely around the walls of the city, and later to make a wider circuit, and view Jerusalem from all the hill tops, north, east, south and west from which it is visible. Hinnom, Kedron, the Valley of Jehoshaphat, the Mount of Olives, the Plain of Rephaim, the home of the prophet Samuel, the camps of the Roman legions, the camps of the crusading armies, the site of the Temple, the place of our Lord's crucifixion, the burial place of Herod the Great, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, the Plain of Jericho, the mountains of Moab, Nebo, the River Jabbok, the Gilead Hills,—these names bring before the reader's mind but a portion of the places and scenes of historical events that are brought under the eye as one looks abroad, say from the top of Olivet. What a place are the slopes and summit of this mountain for re-reading the Bible! It becomes a "new version," more vivid and impressive than any that the choicest and most devout scholarship can possibly produce.

These remarks will indicate the direction to which the Christian will find his chief advantage in visiting Jerusalem.

It is true that one may have special tastes which he wishes to cultivate, or to gratify, by a visit to Jerusalem and the Holy Land. He may wish to study the manners and customs, the dress and daily life of the present inhabitants, in order to illustrate those of Bible times. He may wish to study the habits of the birds and animals which enliven the dead hillsides and plains, or to collect the flowers which in the spring literally carpet the fields. He may wish to study languages, and as there are no less than thirty-five spoken here, his opportunity, in this respect, is of the rarest kind. He may wish to study the site and structure of the Temple, and the topography of the ancient city, and in this line, we will find a multitude of problems that will try his patience and vex his soul. Again, he may be wasting his mental energies on the question whether Oriental Christianity and the Oriental churches may not be wonderfully fine things, if only they could be subjected to slight modifications and improvements; here he would be brought face to face with those Oriental churches and Christians, and it is more than probable that a few weeks or months of actual contact would suffice to restore him to his right mind on this plausible but delusive subject. When one can pick up a dry bone in the street, and by his breath clothe it with flesh and life, then he may think of undertaking to reform these Oriental churches.

Questions are frequently asked as to the population of Jerusalem at the present time. No definite answer can be given as might be done in the case of an American city or town, still it is possible to arrive at the approximate number. In some American papers which reach me from time to time, I see the wildest statements as to the inhabitants of this city, the number varying from 50,000 to 150,000 Jews alone.

It belongs to the duties of the Consulate to report to Washington the number of inhabitants in Jerusalem, and for this purpose we take the greatest care to ascertain the facts of the case within a reasonable degree of certainty; but, as there is no census, exact results cannot be obtained.

The present population we place at about 42,000; of this number one-half are Jews, one-fourth Christians, and one-fourth Moslems. Probably the Christians, including Protestants and all the nominal Christian sects, are a little less than one-fourth, the Moslems nearly one-fourth, and the Jews a little more than one-half. During the past five years there has been a great increase in the Jewish population, no less than ten thousand having arrived in Palestine. Not all of this number remain, nor do they all settle in Jerusalem. Hebron, Safed and Tiberias, because they are sacred cities, and Jaffa, because it has business and commerce, receive each their share, although by far the larger number crowd into the Holy City.

Although the city is small, the habits of Orientals are such that a limited amount of house room will accommodate a large number of people. A single family, numbering from four to eight persons, will manage to live in a single room. It will be understood that such rooms are not crowded with all kinds of furniture. There will be a large divan, a miniature table (possibly), and a hole in the wall, where the quilts are stuffed out of sight during the day. These are spread on the divan and floor at night, for the family to sleep upon. In a corner of the court outside, the family will do its cooking. This describes the way in which hundreds of families exist; at the same time, there are many families that have two or three small rooms which they can call their own.

A large number of houses in Jerusalem are only one story high. Could the houses throughout the city be raised to two stories in height, they would accommodate twice the present number of inhabitants. Again, there must be within the walls as many as forty and perhaps more than forty acres of ground, not including, of course, the vacant spaces in the Temple area around the Mosque of Omar, that are not occupied by houses and not built upon in any way; so that, were all the ground covered with houses, and these raised to a height of two or three stories each, Jerusalem, small as it is, could easily accommodate 100,000 or 150,000 people. The convents,—Latin or Roman Catholic, Greek, Russian, and the Armenian,—seem to occupy but a very small space, compared with the entire extent of the city; but, together, I think they can stow away 15,000 or 20,000 pilgrims, without special discomfort. It happens that the largest number of Christian pilgrims are in the city at Easter, and about that time, on account of the Neby Musa festival, the largest number of Mohammedan pilgrims are also here. The number of the latter varies, from year to year, from 6,000 to 12,000. At that season, the streets during the day are crowded, because they are narrow and everybody is on the go; but at night all this throng disappears, and it is to be supposed that they find sufficient food and shelter.

There are no rules by which one can judge the capacity of an Oriental city. A standing puzzle to Josephus is in regard to the number of people present in Jerusalem at the time of the siege under Titus, and in my judgment it is a question that can never be decided.

But even if these 42,000 or 45,000 people who live in Jerusalem find sleeping places, how do they obtain sufficient food to eat? This is the great wonder, when one reflects upon the means and character of the inhabitants, taking both Jews and Gentiles together. There are no manufactories here, and no productive industries of any kind. The people, for the most part, are poor. Old Moslem families that two or three generations ago had ample means, have now nearly exhausted their inherited wealth, and are obliged to economize in the most rigid manner, in order to live. Half the Jewish population merely exist on the verge of starvation and beggary. They go about the streets filthy, haggard, and wretched in the extreme. Most of the Christian families are either poor, or have little means at their command.

That there is some wealth in Jerusalem no one can deny; but I mean to be understood as saying that a larger number of the inhabitants of Jerusalem are in a condition of extremer poverty than of any other city of equal size in the Eastern world.

Many of the Jews who come here are aged, or are in feeble health, and can only be a burden while they live. Very many die every year, and it is noticeable how the broad fields on the slopes of Olivet, where the Jews are buried, are being widened and extended in every direction year by year.

Notwithstanding the poverty of the people and of the place, there is a constant increase in the number of the inhabitants, and a constant growth in the extent of the city. Twenty years ago there were but three or four buildings outside the walls, while at present they are numbered by hundreds. Were a stranger to visit the city this very year, he would be struck with the amount of building that is going on. But this apparent growth is not a healthy one. We are accustomed to judge of the growth of a place by the results of its productive industries, and by wealth accumulated in other natural ways; but this is not true of Jerusalem. That which we see here is due entirely to foreign capital, and in reality the inhabitants of the city are kept alive by money that comes from abroad.

In this respect, as in many others, Jerusalem is unlike any other city on the globe. Every Jewish family receives public aid. The Jews are divided into national communities, or what is equivalent to that, over which committees preside; and all funds raised in any given country, say, for example, Germany or Russia, are sent to Jerusalem to be divided among the members of the German and Russian community of Jews. In this way every person receives aid which is called "Haluka." Poor Jews in Europe know that, if once they can get to Jerusalem, they will receive something, and, although it be a mere pittance, they think that, by living meanly, it will go a long way towards their maintenance, and perhaps some lucky chance will throw in their way what is needed to make up the actual amount necessary for their support. Hence they come here to live in wretchedness and poverty. As there is no work for them, they live in idleness. Whatever may have been the origin of this Haluka, it has been degraded so that now every dollar contributed in this manner is a positive curse to Jerusalem, and especially to the Jews. What I say now are not the exaggerated statements of a Christian, but the testimony of intelligent Jews themselves. Were this vast amount of money withdrawn, the poor Jews would suffer temporarily, but it would result in driving them into the world, where they could earn a living. This, however, they do not wish to do. These people are willing to have it so. The sentiment of "living in the Holy City" seems to outweigh any discomforts or hardships that may arise from filth, poverty, and want. The Jews throughout the world ought to be ashamed to foster such a spirit, or to perpetuate such a state of things.

If we turn to the Christian population of Jerusalem, we find that matters are not much better than they are among the Jews, although there is not among them so much desperate poverty. The Protestants form only a very small community, and for a very significant reason,—namely, a reason which expresses a radical difference between Protestantism and the various forms of nominal Christianity. Protestantism teaches independence and self-reliance; the Catholic and Greek churches teach exactly the opposite. Protestants are taught that they must earn their own living, and pay for what they receive. The Latin and Greek convents have vast properties in their possession, and every family belonging to either of these communities has its house rent free. It frequently happens that a family belonging, say to the Greek community, owns a house, but, instead of living in it, they rent it, and get of the Greek convent a house free of rent. This is not done secretly, as might be supposed, but with the full knowledge of the convent authorities. Every family, in like manner, receives a gift of bread twice a week. Occasionally soup is given out in the same way. These simple, or rather characterless Oriental people, reason as follows: "House rent and bread free. Ah! This is a beautiful religion!" Hence they become "Greeks" or "Latins," it is all the same to them which.

The worst of it is that priests and patriarchs foster this pernicious system. Consequently, how can Protestantism, which is directly opposed to its spirit and methods in such a system, gain any foothold on such ground. I frequently say to intelligent travelers that, were I to be a missionary, I would much prefer to go to Stanley's country, the Congo, and labor with the savages, than to attempt to do anything in Jerusalem or Palestine.

It is no exaggeration to say that, taking the Jews and nominal Christians together, two-thirds of the inhabitants of the city are beggars, either actual beggars or polite beggars. By the latter phrase I mean a large class of people who prefer to accept their living, or a great part of it, as a gift, rather than earn it themselves. This state of things which I describe is becoming worse every year. Tens of thousands of pounds are sent here each year, and spent in these so-called charities, thus fostering qualities the very opposite of those in which industrious, enterprising, and prosperous people take pride.

I desire to say something further in connection with this and kindred topics, but, as my letter is already long, I will reserve other material for other occasions.—Selah Merrill, in Old Testament Student.

THE MINOR PROPHETS.

"Each prophet had a gift of his own. His natural talents were not superseded, but were used by the Spirit who inspired him; and men of every grade, and of every turn of mind, found themselves suitably addressed: O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would he have gathered thee under his wing! Joel is chronologically the first of the minor prophets, ministering about 865 years B. C. Hear his words.—They pour forth a flood of desolation on the land, but at the same time, declare what might be gotten instead. As he is the first, the very first prophet since David, whose words were committed to writing, how interesting it is to find in him the prediction of the 'outpouring of the Holy Spirit.' Jonah then appears, B. C. 810. In him we see a prophet who shrank from his awfully solemn burden; but we also see in him, how the Lord can use whom he will, and effect what he will. He is the prophet of Nineveh, blessed to awaken a mighty metropolis, by few and feeble words. He is himself a monument of grace to the rebellious, and his success is not the less so. Amos, a few years later, lifts his voice suddenly among the Ten Tribes; while Jonah is sent from Galilee to Nineveh, Amos is sent from Judah to the kingdom of Israel. And there appears, a shepherd and a stranger, yet a man of power, speaking to Israel in words all tinged with rural glow, while his theme is the Lord's righteous judgments. Soon is he followed by Hosea, whose blasts against the backslider are like notes of Sinai's trumpet, waxing louder and louder, ever abrupt and startling. He, too, traversed the Ten Tribes, and exhibited to them their God unwilling to punish, but by no means clearing the guilty. About 730 B. C., Micah appeared in Judah, contemporary with Isaiah, and possessing much of his texture of mind, with even more sensitive tenderness. Mercy, as well as judgment, are his theme, and we leave him in the attitude of one wrapt in adoring love at the view of the God whom he proclaims to his fellow-sinners: 'Who is a God like unto thee?' Nahum, whom some have fancied a dweller in Capernaum, and it all events a Galilean, prophesied B. C. 710. In him we see how men of Galilee—how James and John—might be truly 'sons of thunder.' He is the prophet that announces' Nineveh's doom; and never were thunder-claps heard more terrific than in his message. No Greek tragedian ever approached his sublimity of style. Let us stay for a moment, and hear him describing the entering in of the foe at the breach in the wall:—

"They are fleeing!
Stop! stop! but none turneth back.
Plunder the silver, plunder the gold,
There is no end to the store!
There is abundance of all coveitable ——
Emptiness, and emptiedness, and void!
Heart-melting, and buttering of knees,
There is intense pain in all loins,
And all faces withdraw their color."
—Dr. Henderson's trans. of chap. ii. 10, &c.

Or stay one moment longer, to see him painting the besiegers pouring into the city. His language so attracted Jerome, that he despaired of translating it, and every critic has spoken of it as unrivalled:—

"The sound of the whip, and the sound of the rattling of the wheels:
The horses prancing, and the chariots bounding:
The mounting of horsemen, the gleaming of swords;
The lightning of spears,
The multitude of slain,
And the mass of corpses:
There is no end to the carcasses—
They stumble over their carcasses." Nah. ii. 3.

It is probable that Nahum uttered his prophecies among the Ten Tribes. It was some comfort to the godly there to know that God would glorify himself on his proud enemies. About 630 B. C., in Judah, Zephaniah arose, a man of God in spirit like Jeremiah, and contemporary with him. Both he and Jeremiah begin to prophesy (if is thought) in the reign of tender-hearted king Josiah. This prophet points out the moral causes of Jerusalem's ruin. It would add interest to his history, if it could be proved, from chap. i. 1, that he was great-grandson to good king Hezekiah. But seldom has a more rapt prophet appeared, than the next we meet—Habakkuk. It is likely he was a Levite, if not even one of the singers of Israel (iii. 1, 19); and it may have been in one of his watchings by night in the house of the Lord (ii. 1), that he received his message. We feel him to be a prophet in the position of watchfulness and expectation—his loins girt, his lamp burning, his soul calm and happy. His magnificent strains set before us, God our guidance, in time of sin, and trial, and judgment. It was about his time, or somewhere, probably, about 590 B. C., that Obadiah was heard, perhaps in the temple, denouncing Edom's doom.—He is the prophet of Edom, soaring, like the eagle, above the rocky dwellings, and darting down upon them with his message of woe. Sin against the brethren is the burden of his prophesy.

After this the seventy years captivity hung on. And at the return from Babylon, Haggai appeared, with his five messages, delivered with interrogatory vehemence to selfish men. Zechariah, like another Ezekiel, full of both clear and dark sayings, stands beside him, dealing with the destiny of Israel, and exhibiting them at last under the happy booths of the Feast of Tabernacles. Malachi closed the whole. He is the prophet who gives 'a last lingering look at the Mosaic dispensation.' The sins of Israel and their future hopes are set before them, and then we are suddenly left by the prophet, in expectation of some scene yet to arise. The Jews call him 'the seal of the prophets,' because with him ends the line of prophets, until the Baptist arose, breaking the silence of four centuries, and ushering in 'the prophet like unto Moses!'"

Editor Restitution:

Knowing from the letters I receive from the supporters of THE RESTITUTION, that many are anxious to know if I have laid aside my pen, and given up my much-loved work—preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, therefore I write.

July 31st, I left my own pilgrim tavern, being accompanied by Mrs. Lyon to the depot, and after taking my leave of her, and others who went with us, I entered the chariots of Nahum, for the city of Auburn. Reached Rochester at 10 a. m., where I had to stop over until 8 p. m., taking rest and dinner at a German hotel. Reached Auburn at 8 p. m., where I was warmly received by Mrs. Lyon's relatives, who are in unison with me in faith.

On Sunday, by the permission of the Mayor of the City, granted by the request made to him, by Mrs. L. Now, I preached to a large audience of intelligent men and women, in Seward's Park, being seated with chairs, who gave undivided attention for an hour and a half. Subject, Will Israel be restored? Is their restoration and conversion necessary to the setting up of the kingdom of God, foretold or predicted by the prophets, and preached by Jesus and the apostles? When will it be set up? And where is it to be set up? And what will be the result of the setting up of the kingdom of God?

Monday spent the day in visiting loved ones, conversing upon truths, that some ignore.

Tuesday, I bid adieu to them, and took the chariot of Nahum for Syracuse. Upon my arrival I found my true yoke-fellow, Bro. Finn, at the Station, ready to take me to his beautiful home, where I was made welcome, as I always have been for the past 28 years. Our faith on all the great truths of revelation is a unit. When I left this city with Mrs. L. to make my first missionary visit in the west, 28 years ago last June, there was a flourishing body of believers. But at present, in the midst of a population of some 55,000, Bro. and Sister Finn and Sister M. are the only ones now living in the city that have not bowed the knee to Orthodoxy.

Joyfully did I spend my time with these loved ones until Thursday morning; when I took my leave of them, but not empty, and started for Canada, by the Rome and Watertown and Ogdensburgh R. R. Crossing the St. Lawrence River at Ogdensburg into Canada, called on one old friend in Prescott. At 4:30 p. m. I took the train for Kemptville, where I arrived at 8 p. m. Found my good Bro. McDonald, formerly a R. C., but embraced the gospel under my labors, waiting to take me to his pilgrim home, where I met with a warm reception, by his household.

On Friday we rode up to the Street of Brotherly Love, where I gave a discourse to a house full of attentive hearers, a warm greeting from all, I received. I stopped over three Sundays in this locality, gave ten public discourses to attentive congregations.

Visited the Brethren at their own homes, conversing upon vital truths, with deep interest and pleasure. Some fell in love with the truth. This gave me much joy. On the last Sunday we ate the memorial supper.—It was a season not to be forgotten while memory lasts. Spent three days with Mrs. Lyon, in visiting her mother, brothers, and sisters, with pleasure.

I spent a week in Ventnor, visiting loved ones, and on Sunday I gave two discourses, to a house of full earnest listeners. It was truly a solemn, yet joyful time.

In 1861 I commenced my labors in these places. And this visit in some respects was the best of all. But one thing caused me grief, death had laid its cold grasp upon two, sisters, the first fruits of my labors, 24 years ago, since my visit last year. But they sleep in redemption's plan, therefore they will have a resurrection to life, whilst the wicked will remain eternally in the empire of death. To the glory of God be it said, the lovers of truth did their duty in aiding me in my mission, in each of these places.

On Monday the last day of August, I bid adieu to the loved ones of V., being conveyed to the Station at Spencerville, where I took the chariot of Nahum for Prescott. And at 1:30 p. m. started for Bowmanville, where I arrived at 9 p.m., safe and sound, but tired.

Here I found Bro. D. Hogarth's son, waiting to take me to his father's, a distance of eight miles; where I received a warm reception, as I always have during the past 28 years. After taking a good supper, and a social chat, I retired to my old place of rest, rose at 9 a. m., found myself rested, and ready for work. Called on most of the friends during the week. Visits rightly made, are calculated to do the brethren and friends as much good, sometimes as public labor.

On Sunday, there was a good rally so that our Chapel was well filled, in the a. m. and p. m. I presented the same subject that I presented in Auburn, we had a joyful meeting, closed by eating the memorial supper. Brethren did not let me go home empty, with a God bless you, and a come again.

Monday I was conveyed to Oshawa Station, I took the chariot of Nahum for home being accompanied by a daughter of Bro. D. H., and a daughter of Bro. S. H. Stopped over one train at Toronto, called on some of the loved ones. Reached our station, 7:30. Found Mrs. Lyon waiting to take us to our own lovely home, where a good supper was soon in readiness for us. More anon. From thy pilgrim Brother,

RALPH V. LYON.

The Hebrew enumerates some of the greatest changes that time has wrought in Jewish affairs. It is but a few years ago that Rome was a sort of penitentiary for the Jewish inhabitants, and the priests were the lords of the city. Today the Pope complains that he is a prisoner in the Vatican, and the Jews occupy prominent places in the City Council, in the Italian Parliament, in the Municipal and State offices, in the schools of science and art, and the Foreign Office of that young kingdom is de facto under the control of the Jew, Signor Giacomo Malvano, who is Secretary General of Foreign Affairs. "A few years ago the British Parliament insisted upon keeping the Jews out of its almighty sphere; today the same conservative element must see a Lord Rothschild among the Peers of the Realm, who would not even change his name, much less his religion, and Baron De Worms occupying a high position in the Salisbury Cabinet. The same is the case in Hungary, notwithstanding the anti-Semitism of the rabble, in France and in Holland. In Germany and Austria, where the Jews are still kept down politically, they rise so much more rapidly and numerously in science and art, so that there is hardly a university in those two countries where Jewish professors are not among the most prominent teachers and authors. Only in America the Jew is nobody yet, and here it is not the fault of our institutions or our people; it is the Jew's own fault.

I SAW THEE.

"When thou wast under the fig tree I saw thee."

I saw thee when, as twilight fell
And evening lit her fairest star,
Thy footsteps sought yon quiet dell,
The world's confusion left afar.

I saw thee when thou stood'st alone
Where drooping branches thick o'erhung,
Thy still retreat to all unknown
Hid in deep shadows darkly flung.

I saw thee when, as died each sound
Of blasting flock or woodland bird,
Kneeling as if on holy ground,
Thy voice the listening silence heard.

I saw thy calm, uplifted eyes,
And marked the bearing of thy breast,
When rose to heaven thy heartfelt sighs
For purer life, for perfect rest.

I saw the light that o'er thy face
Stole with a soft subduing glow,
As if within celestial grace
Breathed the same bliss that angels know.

I saw—what thou didst not—above
Thy lonely head an open heaven,
And tokens of the Father's love
With smiles to thy rapt spirit given.

I saw thee from that sacred spot,
With firm and peaceful soul depart;
I, Jesus, saw thee,—doubt it not—,
And read thy secrets of thy heart.

Editor Restitution:

I herewith send you a short report of an event transpiring in this portion of our state.

Some weeks ago as Elder John Foore was filling one of his appointments at the Grady school house in the northern part of Neosho Co., he was challenged by a Baptist to defend the doctrine he taught, in a public discussion. No alternative seeming to be left, Elder Foore accepted the challenge, and after some delay, the time, place and propositions, were agreed upon. The time, October 10. the place, the Grady school house, but as the school house was small, it was finally agreed to move to the Methodist chapel two and one-half miles from the school house. Elder A. H. Scott of Girard, was chosen by the Baptists, and had the wording of the propositions.

First proposition. Do the Scriptures teach that there is an intelligent moral entity in man that survives in a conscious state between death and the resurrection? Affirmative, Elder A. H. Scott. Negative, Elder John Foore.

Second proposition. Do the Scriptures teach that the Kingdom of God, or of heaven, or of Christ, will be set up on the earth when Christ comes again? Affirmative, Elder John Foore. Negative, A. H. Scott.

The first challenge was to discuss the propositions until one or the other cried quit, but Elder Scott declined to stay longer than eight meetings of two hours each, and so it was arranged to have five meetings for the discussion of the first proposition and three for the second. Mr. James Ellis, an honest and honorable man, not connected with any denomination, but holding with the Christian or Campbellites more than any other, was chosen presiding moderator, and I must here say, that the best of order was maintained throughout the entire discussion. Although there was an unusual amount of feeling and interest manifested and the house was crowded throughout the whole time, some parties coming ten miles almost every meeting.

Elder Scott, in his opening speech, read almost every passage of Scripture from Genesis to Revelation, which referred to soul, or spirit, or mind of man, and asserted that these proved the conscious existence of the intelligent entity of the proposition, after death.

Elder Foore admitted, in his first speech, that there was a soul, or spirit, or mind in man, both in the primary, and secondary meaning of the words, and also that the same was true of all the animal creation that live by breathing, and Elder Scott, not having brought any proof of the conscious existence of any such entity or real being after death, Elder Foore proceeded to show that the Scriptures teach, "that the dead know not anything." That in death there is no remembrance of God, etc., and that the doctrine of inherent immortality of the soul was,

1. Satanic in its origin,
2. That it was the basis of spiritism,
3. That it was the foundation of prayer for the dead and to the dead,
4. It joins the heathen doctrine with the doctrine of the Bible.
5. It destroys the Christian's only hope.
6. It robs God,
7. It denies the record that God gave of his Son.
8. It lays the foundation of eternal misery.

By thus laying the foundation of his argument and assuming that they were true, or spirit, or mind, in man, he at once placed his opponent on the defensive, and instead of having to follow, Elder Foore led the discussion, and challenged his opponent to bring a single direct witness in proof of his affirmation, and the nearest he could come to that was, the rich man and Lazarus, of Luke xvi., and the souls under the altar, of Rev. vi. 9.

This was my first attendance on an occasion of public discussion of the Scripture. I was not in favor of them, but this one has changed my mind, and I believe that the minds of others have been changed also, as this little incident will show. A good Baptist sister came upon the stand weeping, and saying, "she was so sorry this discussion ever happened, because so many good honest people were going to believe it." And such expressions as this from others, "I went into the meeting with an immortal soul, and came out without one."

One lady, formerly a Christian, asked Elder Scott to explain how "this mortal was to put on immortality." He told her to ask God.

So I cannot but think that much good may be accomplished by such opportunities of getting the truth before professedly Christian people who have had the doctrine of the Church of God so fearfully, and possibly ignorantly, misrepresented by the under shepherds of the creed, or penning system of religious teaching. In the discussion of the second proposition, Elder Foore made his affirmations so plain, being based on the apostles, prophets, and Christ's teaching, that Elder Scott could not deny, and I am sorry to say, used his time in misrepresentation, abusive and insulting insinuations.

But as one gentleman expressed it, Elder Scott had a case in court, and when called upon to produce his testimony, had not a single living witness. His witnesses were all dead, and his, Scott's, assertions were good for nothing, and his case was thrown out of court, and his clients had to pay the cost, which was stipulated beforehand to be, for himself as chief counsel, fifty dollars cash in hand, assistant counsel, five dollars cash in hand, and all the other necessaries and accessories, together with the best living the country could afford, etc.

Thus it is that Elder Foore, and all those also who will stand up for the truth, must meet the combined influence of wealth, position in society, numbers—1 to 1000—with all the conceivably machinations of the Evil One himself.

By request of the few worthy brethren in attendance, I make the above report, hoping it will be acceptable to them and you.

Respectfully your brother in Christ.
S. TROWBRIDGE.

[We leave out a few of the low, undignified expressions reported to have been uttered by the challenging party. Billings-Gate and argument are two distinct things.—ED.]

In relation to the rejection—by the Presbytery of West Jersey, at its recent session—of the Overture proposed by L. O. Baker, looking to a revision of its creed, touching its teachings on the doom of the finally impenitent, I beg leave to say, that viewing the question from the stand point of those composing the Presbytery; it can in my opinion be shown that those opposing the Overture have good reason for their action. For while it is true as argued by the advocate of the Overture that "the Presbyterian church has practically abandoned" her former views in matters of eschatology as touching the fate of the finally impenitent; it seems to me there is a disposition to hold fast at one end, and let loose at the other; or in other words it still adheres to the doctrine of the eternal existence of the wicked, but has abandoned its former teaching regarding the nature, and severity of the punishment to be inflicted on them.

Now I think a careful examination of the Scriptures will show that the doctrines of the creed on these two points must stand or fall together.

If it be conceded that the wicked exist eternally; if "The soul immortal as its Sire can never die," then there is much warrant in the Scriptures for what is often now a days termed the old fashioned doctrine of "Hell fire." Smoke, and fire, and burning, are often mentioned in the Scriptures in connection with the fate of the wicked. There is also some mention of brimstone in the same connection as the following citations will show.

"The wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume, into smoke shall they consume away" Ps. xxxvii. 20.

"The day cometh that shall burn them up, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv. 1.

"As thorns cut up shall they be burned in fire," Isa. xxxiii. 12.

"Be turned into hell," Psa. ixxxix. 8.

"Cast into a furnace of fire, and there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth," Matt. xiii. 42.

"Be cast into hell fire where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." Mark ix. 47, 48.

"Their end is to be burned" Heb. lxviii. "Be cast into a lake of fire" Rev. xx. 15. "Shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone," Rev. xxi. 8.

Other passages might be cited but I think these are sufficient to show that the fate of the finally impenitent is to be burned; some kind of burning awaits the evil doer.

We also learn from the Scriptures, that the doom that awaits those who persist in wickedness, whatever it may be, will be everlasting.

"Those that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord," 2 Thess. i. 9.

"And these (on the left hand) shall go away into everlasting punishment." If it be conceded that all men are immortal, if they never ceased to exist, then this doctrine of everlasting burning rests on a Scriptural foundation; and the harrowing and blood-curdling pictures "of sinners in the hands of an angry God" drawn by Jonathan Edwards will be found to be more Scriptural than much of the modern teaching, in relation to the future awaiting impenitent men. Says the advocate of the Overture, "Can any one doubt that Edwards was more fully in harmony with the doctrine of the Confession than our modern preachers," and I contend that the natural immortality of all men conceded both Mr. Edwards and the Confession are more in harmony with the Bible than are the "modern preachers."

But says Mr. Baker, sermons like those preached by Jonathan Edwards if preached now would empty our churches." Is it then what people like to hear, that is to furnish the criteria, to guide us in our preaching? Now let us face these questions squarely, and if we speak let us at least endeavor to "speak as the oracles of God speak." "The prophet that hath a dream let him tell a dream; and he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully."

If the church adheres to the dogma of the immortality of all men, I see no way of escape from giving her assent at least to the dogma of the everlasting misery and torment in fire, of the wicked. In fact it was not until after the former dogma had gained a place in the minds of those then composing the church, that the latter was brought in, in order to reconcile the teachings of Scripture with the former. As before stated these dogmas must stand or fall together. But must they stand. In it so. Must sin and sorrow and suffering go on forever?

Must this fair universe of God be forever marred by so foul a blot as a vast lake of fire and brimstone into which the great majority of the teeming millions of the men and women who have lived and died on this fair earth, are to be hurled to endure indescribable torments;—the laughing-stock of devils, who will delight in their misery and suffering: where the gnashing of teeth and the wailings of the damned will never cease?

Is evil as well as good to be eternal? If there is a place where sin and sorrow and suffering are to be perpetuated it must be in the earth; for we read that the wicked and the sinner as well as the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth. Then what becomes of God's promise? "As truly as I live all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord," and what of his declaration that "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away?" and what then becomes of the victory promised to the seed of the woman over the arch deceiver, the great adversary of the human race? If the great majority of those who shall be assembled at the great assizes shall be given over to him for all eternity will he not have ground for boasting?

"But thanks be to God who giveth us the victory (over death) it is not true. Immortality is only attainable through our Lord Jesus the Christ; and we are not forced to the dire conclusions which a belief in the dogma of the inherent immortality of all men, would compel us.

From this stand point then let us examine again some of the declarations of Scripture in relation to the destiny awaiting the finally impenitent. They are to be burned but they are to be burned up: to be consumed away into smoke, to be reduced to ashes: "to be as though they had not been" to be, "For yet a little while and the wicked shall not be; yea thou shalt diligently consider his place and it shall not be," to die, to be "cut off, to be destroyed. The Bible teaching on this point has recently been ably summarized by James Mill of Edinburgh, Scotland, in an address on "The end of evil," from it I quote. "Those whose names are not found in the book of life, are cast into the lake of fire and die the second death, a death that from which there is no resurrection, a death eternal.

Deprived of neverending joys and happiness unalloyed, God's wrath abideth on them. However long or short the period of their sufferings may be; however many or few their stripes, the end is death. "The soul that sinneth it shall die," "The wages of sin is death," "if ye live after the flesh ye shall die." The wicked are to be "cut off;" they are to be "consumed;" to be "burned up root and branch" to be "cast into the furnace" to be "destroyed" they shall "perish;" "into smoke shall they consume away," in every variety of phrase and figure of speech, till language seems completely exhausted, their utter destruction is declared; and at last God is all in all.

It is only with this view of the case, that the final and complete victory of the Seed of the woman over the adversary; the end of evil; and the universal reign of righteousness, joy and peace, can be harmonized, and as bearing on this part I subjoin an extract from "The Life Everlasting" by J. H. Pettingell.

"As we read the Word of God, the victory of Christ is to be no partial or uncertain victory. The conflict between Christ and this arch enemy of God and man is to be complete and final. It is to issue in nothing short of the utter and everlasting destruction of Satan and all his hosts. They are to be burned up with fire, to be absolutely and forever exterminated. This earth, which he has claimed for his own, and over which he has tyrannized with such fearful power, is to be reclaimed and restored to more than its original purity and glory. It is to be purified by (pur) fire, which shall consume, as chaff, every unclean thing. And in that new heaven and new earth that shall be, "the tabernacle of God shall be with men. And God shall dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and he shall be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes: and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are past away.

But this philosophy we are opposing, cannot consent to any such complete victory as this. It teaches that Satan shall indeed be overthrown, and subjected, and tormented; but he will not be destroyed. He cannot be. He has as good a claim to an eternal existance as Christ himself, and so have all his followers. This earth, which has been the theatre of the conflict shall never witness the end. The scene is to be adjourned over into the world to come. The kingdom of Christ shall never become a universal kingdom. But he must needs partition off a portion of his kingdom for the special residence of his enemies, whom he cannot destroy. He can indeed torment them, and give to the hosts of the heavenly world the awful and perpetual exhibition of his power, and his wrath in heaping torments upon his prostrate enemies; but they can still blaspheme his name, and defy his power to harm them farther." One more Scripture and I have done. Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life, Ezc. xiii. 22.

Could any thing cause more sorrow and sadness in the heart of a humane and righteous person, than the doctrine of eternal torment as once taught, and is not the doctrine of natural immortality, with a general disposition to ignore a condition of suffering hereafter, as now taught, well calculated to produce apathy and indifference to the minds of men regarding the future life?

J. T. SMITH.

In Jer. xxiii. 28, we have a word of good counsel truly applicable to the days in which we live. It reads thus: He that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully. As much as to say that dreams, revelations, visions, and fanciful ideas, and the living word of God would be so mixed up together, that many an weary one would not be able to distinguish between them, and so fail to understand the will of God concerning them. Go where you will, we hear the word of God misrepresented, and he who would dare to tell the people just what God says, no more or less, is very unpopular, entirely a one-sided affair; bringing an unwelcome message.

Well I do rejoice in the blessed word, for it is the power of God unto salvation to all that believeth it, and just so soon as we conclude with the religious teaching of the day, which declares death to be the doorkeeper of heaven, instead of the great enemy of the human race, and the last one, too, that shall be destroyed. The word declares the time of reward at Christ's coming and kingdom. Popular theology say, the race receive their reward at death, one by one, turning the cold shoulder to, and finding fault with those that speak the word just as it reads, instead of settling the matter with the one that inspired the apostles and prophets to write it.

Well, we can afford to suffer reproach for the blessed word's sake, and we do well if we heed the words of Jesus and do them, and so build on a sure foundation that will stand the flood and descending rain. Why, we are children of a King, royal robes are in waiting though not yet permitted to put them on. Let us, dear brethren and sisters, stand up for the word, study it faithfully, that we may be able, to rightly divide the word of truth.

Yours in the vineyard.

Current History Corroborating Prophecy.

In recounting the signs which were to precede his second advent, our Lord utters the following significant words: "And upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; . . . men's hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." To us, the present attitude of our world furnishes a remarkable fulfilment of this inspired prediction; one which merits the most serious consideration of every Christian man.

But we are most profoundly convinced that the general features of our time, the aggregate of the startling events of our present history, taken in connection with the unmistakable fulfilment of the prophetic word, furnish overwhelming evidence that the end of human history is at hand. A mere glance at the political, social, and moral status of the great nations of modern civilization of which men are so proud, is sufficient to convince the most sceptical of the serious state into which the affairs of the world have fallen.

The great powers, as we call them, maintain towards each other the attitude of most profound distrust, each watching with a jealous eye the advancement of its own peculiar ambition, and aggrandizement of its power and authority. In the accomplishment of these objects, the only rule of action seems to be the measure of power with which each may support and enforce its individual claim. The most sacred friendships and alliances, the most sacred rights of others even, are unhesitatingly sacrificed on the altar of national ambition. The maintenance of peace demands the providing of enormous preparations for war, the expenditures for which are exhausting the resources of the people and burdening them with a weight of debt or taxation well-nigh unsupportable. The minister of war and finance, if they may find time from their herculean task of providing for these enormous budgets to consider the future, can but ask themselves the question where will all this end?

And our most astute politicians and statesmen have before them, in the light of the history of the past quarter of a century, the alarming and unheard-of spectacle of a bankrupt world. The continuance of the present regime can result in nothing short of this, and it is useless to deny that the prospect occasions the gravest apprehension in the minds of the most candid, and impartial, and discerning men.

The social and moral aspect is not more encouraging. The Nihilists of Russia, with their frequent attempts on the life of the highest dignitaries of the government; the Fenians of Great Britain, with their startling dynamite outrages involving the imminent destruction of property and endangering the lives of the innocent equally with that of the class against whom they would manifest their vengeful spite; the Socialists in Germany, making decided progress in spite of the efforts of the government for their suppression; the hosts of unemployed workmen in France, Spain, England and elsewhere, who, from their unfortunate situation of actual want and distress, make through the representatives of their organizations most piteous appeals to their respective governments for some measures of relief from their sufferings,—all these deplorable conditions which exist in our society of today, present the social question in a manner well calculated to involve the well defined feeling of distrust to manifest on the part of all those who occupy themselves with thoughts of the future.

And what of the morals of our times? Crimes of most unheard-of malignity abound on every hand. Intemperance, always on the increase despite the many noble efforts for its suppression, sweeps the earth with a destruction of life and happiness more frightful than war itself, strewing its path with thousand of victims. Licentious immorality abounds every where, especially in our large cities, where this flood of evil is so great as to cause one to wonder what must have been the sins of the ancient cities of the plains, to have brought upon them such a fearful retribution, while our modern Sodoms stand unvisited. Licentious literature abounds, corrupting the morals of the young, and degrading all who come under the influence of its loathsome contamination. Suicides multiply, and the evidence of the existence of a flood of evil in all its multitudious details is not wanting.

Good men stand aghast at the terrible picture they see before them, and inquire with anxious concern, "Is this the best that our boasted nineteenth century civilization and progress can give us?

And we ask ourselves the question, what is lacking to complete the fulfilment of the predictions of the Word of God concerning the last days? Why will not men heed what God has spoken, and prepare for the day of wrath which is fast approaching? As said the Lord to the incredulous Jews of his day, so might he say to the men of our time, "Ye can discern the face of the sky, but can ye not discern the signs of the times?"—T. J. Malyon, in Prophetic News, and Israel's Watchman.

MUSINGS ON THE LOVE OF GOD.

All subjects relative to the All-wise Creator of heaven and earth, more especially those treating of his character or attributes, ought to be approached with the greatest caution, reverence, and sincerity, tempered with true humility of heart and mind and spirit. The importance and solemnity of such a subject as the love of God demands for its consideration the entire submission of thought and feeling. To approach it carelessly or with levity of manner, as an everyday topic, would betoken, to say the least of it, a boldness unbecoming the greatest mind, if not an entire ignorance and inability to apprehend or appreciate the true nature of the subject, and unfitting any one to speak with any degree of truth on such a theme. All our sentiments ought, therefore, to bear the impress of sincerity and truth; endeavoring first of all to get our minds into a frame suited to the subject, then to think nothing we would be loth to express, and to express nothing the truth of which we do not actually feel. Insincere speech, or the expression of sentiments to which the heart beats no assent, are at all times and upon all subjects to be deprecated; how immeasurably more so upon a subject such as that we have taken in hand to discuss!

I have thus far prefaced my remarks because of the feelings of responsibility and reverence which have impressed me; and also to indicate what has been my endeavor while my attention has been directed to one or two aspects of this, perhaps the grandest attribute of Divine Nature.

We consider the subject under three heads—First, Love in itself considered; second, Love as an attribute of God; third, Love as manifested by God.

We discard altogether the shallow idea that love is a mere feeling or sentiment, a simple expression of the heart or mind, and having no practical bearing upon the lives of those who profess it. Many of the Christian graces are summed up in love. Kindness, tenderness, charitableness, compassion, mercy, and such virtues, all come under its benign sway: all are subject to its sovereign rule. It may be said also to partake of two great distinctive qualities, developing or manifesting itself in two directions, which may be termed the practical and the contemplative. Practical love shows itself in rendering willing assistance and in doing good to one another. All works of benevolence, all kind actions, the willing offerings of heart and hand for the benefit of others, are but the outward expression of practical love. Contemplative love, again, shows itself where practical love is impossible. It can show itself only in an inferior who feels himself in the presence of a superior. Thus all worship, all silent adoration, prayer, and other feelings of awe and veneration, as well as feelings of admiration, are the expressions, silent or audible, of contemplative love. The love of the Creator towards the creature must therefore be of a practical kind. The love of the creature towards the Creator, in so far as it can be directly shown, must be of the contemplative form—although the apostle John shows very clearly how practical love is indirectly manifested towards God by man in the love which he bears and manifests towards his brother. So the love of man towards his neighbor must consist both of the practical and the contemplative. And here I would indicate what seems to me to be the true nature of the development of the love of God in man. "Love begets love" is a trite saying; and the love of God towards man, being of a practical kind and of a nature of which man has nowhere else any experience, when properly apprehended, must beget in him that silent adoration and worship, in other words contemplative love: everywhere and in all ages displayed by all true Christian men—again begetting in him practical love towards his neighbor; and the two combining consummates the perfection of the Christian life in the present world, and ensures his acceptance in the world to come. For love is the beginning, the consummation, and the chief factor of all true Christian labor and existence.

The love of God in the abstract, or love as an abstract attribute of the Divine Nature, is a term beyond the range of human capability to define, or fully to understand what it implies. It is an inconceivable supposition that the human or finite mind can grasp or comprehend the Divine, the Universal, the Infinite. It is therefore impossible, whatever relation there may be existing between that which is Divine and that which is human, for the greatest created intelligence to understand any abstract attribute of the Creator. This is amply demonstrated in Scripture. Thus one of the friends of Job exclaims.—"Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? Deeper than sheol; what canst thou know?" And, as bearing directly upon our subject, the apostle Paul declares that "the love of God passeth knowledge." Thus, however perfect a revelation of the love of God his workings in nature or his written word may present to us, think and study them as we may, we will always be impressed with the truth that "His love passeth knowledge:" that it is far too great for our feeble comprehension.

But the inconceivable nature of the love of God rests not simply on its unparalleled greatness, the illimitable sphere of its operations, or the incomprehensible difference between the Being who extends it and those who are its recipients: it goes much further than this. It is incomprehensible in the very nature of its display; and a brief study of the greatest manifestation of love the world ever experienced will convince us of this.

"Scarcely," says Paul, "for a righteous man will one die; yet, peradventure, for a good man one would even dare to die. But God commendeth his love towards us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." Herein lies the real kernel of the incomprehensible nature of that manifestation, in the fact that the All-righteous was sacrificed for the unrighteous. It was because of God's love for the world that he freely gave up to death the Son of his love who was holy, harmless, and undefiled; the very perfection of goodness and truth; the ideal of the Father himself. Such a sacrifice would not have been so incomprehensible if those for whom it was made had borne the character which the Son of God displayed—if the sacrifice had then been necessary. But they bore, and still bear, a character the very opposite. Not the sacrifice was not for those who were pure and spotless, whose life and actions were well-pleasing in the sight of God, but for those who had brought themselves under a curse, who were sunk in sin and misery. Yet so great, so incomprehensible was his love for such that he sent his beloved Son into the world, and freely gave him up to die, that he might redeem them from their sin, and bring them back to himself. Such love is altogether different from that which man experiences from man. We fail to conceive man's ability to manifest such love. If we bring it home to ourselves and endeavor to realize it, we shall see the impossibility. Suppose, for instance, that any one of us had a great friend who was our very ideal of goodness, one whom we looked up to, revered and honored, whom to know was to love with our whole heart; and that, on the other hand, we had an enemy whose conduct we abhorred, his whole existence being passed in trying to harm us. Were it placed in our power to save such an enemy by the sacrifice of such a friend, would any of us be capable of manifesting such love? Every feeling of our nature would rise in revolt against such an action. Our love for the one would be too weak, our love for the other too strong by far, to make a sacrifice so great. It would seem the sacrificing of our ideal of perfection and virtue for that which was vile and worthless. Man shows his love by defending his friend; and the very highest point of perfection is "that a man should lay down his life for his friend."

Here a thought suggests itself springing naturally from our endeavor to compare a great with a lesser truth; that is, how difficult, nay, how impossible, it is for a good person to love a wicked person. We must remember that there is no man perfect, none who is all-righteous, and I believe that there are few, if any, amongst the most wicked, but have some redeeming quality. Yet, to the most godly men the wickedness of an evil person seems exactly to take the evil-inclined person's place, and he is loathed, because of his actions, as if he was the embodiment of his own unrighteousness.

Now, it must be different with God, because, while he hates all unrighteousness, he loves unrighteous man. It was for the sinner that the Savior was sent to die. And what do the Scriptures emphatically enjoin upon us? To love our enemies; to bless them that curse us; to do good to them that hate us; and pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us. And to what conclusion have we been led by our comparison of the love of God and the love of man? That the love of God is constant and sure, universal and everlasting, unlimited by time or circumstances; and that the love of man is fitting and uncertain, altogether dependent on and limited by circumstances, and very often summed up in selfishness.

That the love of God agrees with the requirements of the conclusion just arrived at, is amply testified in the records of his dealings with the children of Israel. We have but to glance over their checkered history to see God's efforts for their national exaltation and development, and his desire for their everlasting welfare frustrated by their wickedness, backsliding, and idolatrous practises, for we must remember that, though ruled over by God, they were left to the freedom of their own will. Yet he is constantly expostulating with them, sending his prophets early and late with words of warning and counsel, pleading with all the compassion of a father's love, threatening them with the punishment which justice demanded, and anon renewing his promises of blessing if they should turn again to his service. Had not these constant and everlasting qualities of love and mercy tempered the justice of God's established laws, that people, and the whole world besides, would have been cast away for ever from his sight. Thus the very existence of the people of Israel (may we not say that of all the peoples of the earth?) proves the constancy of the love of God.

Again, its universality beams forth demonstrated beyond controversy in his covenant with Abraham: "For in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." The great purpose which God had in calling Abraham from Ur, of the Chaldees, was not simply to make of him a great nation and a "peculiar people" to himself; but that in his "seed," which Paul declares to the Galatians "is Christ," all the nations of the earth might be blessed. Neither is its constancy diminished, or its universality limited through the Jews being cast away and scattered after they had rejected the Messiah. For we know by promise that the casting away of the Jews will ultimately result in blessings to them and to the world far more abundant. If the casting away of them "be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be but life from the dead!" And it shall come to pass "that in the place where it was said unto them 'Ye are thy people,' there shall they be called the children of the living God."

Let us now look at another aspect of the love of God. I think that we may safely assert that God must have made this world as an object upon which to bestow his love; and we should therefore expect to find some evidence of it outside of revelation, though possibly dependent on revelation to a certain extent for our full understanding of it. And what better evidence of the love of God could we get than is afforded by the present season of the year? The great Preserver of all has blessed the fruitful fields, irrigating them with "the early and the latter rain," while the warm glow of summer sunshine has not been wanting to burst the bud and ripen the produce. And now, behold, our granaries filled, or being filled, with an abundance, aye! with a superabundance, of the increase he hath given".

But here a question starts up in the mind. How is it that, in the midst of such abundance, thousands are at the point of starvation, or find it extremely difficult to obtain the bare necessaries of life? Is it not because man is left to himself to regulate that bountiful supply? God made nature subordinate to man, and just as he uses her so will she bless him. If her laws were to fail; or any terrible phenomenon render a large part of the earth less productive than usual; or some calamity destroy, beyond repair, one or two of the staple foods of mankind; then we might have grave concern even for the preservation of the race. But it is consoling to know that all these things are controlled by a good and wise Benefactor who showers down his blessings, "enough for great and small;" but man is entirely unable or unwilling to so reflect that Divine love by regulating the bountiful supply to the wants of every living creature, so that each may receive a fair and honest share.

But nature supplies us with many more illustrations of the love of God, than in those wonderful arrangements for the sustenance of his creatures. It would be impossible to enumerate the multiform and manifold beauties, the harmonious sights and sounds which fill the heavens, the air, and the wide world, all displayed to gratify and charm, to fascinate and enchant with feelings of indescribable delight. The slightest contemplation of nature affords a perfect feast to every sense we possess. Here one thing and there another rivets the attention. Here it is the beauty and fragility of flowers, or the waving yellow corn; there it is the light and shade of some forest. Here it is the music of the rippling brook, or the sighing of the wind; there it is the humming of the bee at its busy toil, or the warbling of the feathered choir. There it is the spangled heavens with their shining lights and ever-changing scenery of cloud and sunshine; here it is the wide expanse of ocean reflecting every shade the heavens can produce. Thus does nature speak of the love and the goodness of God; but she gives us no real data whereon to lay the foundation of the knowledge of any of his attributes: her evidence is rather of an inferential kind. But there is reserved for man a more wonderful manifestation of the love of God than he has ever yet received, or has been capable of realizing; and with a few words on this point we shall conclude.

We are told that eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, what God has promised to them that love him; and if we can now, with our imperfect vision, realise and declare that "we know and are assured of the love of God," what words can describe the time when the tabernacle of God shall be with men, and he shall dwell with men, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them and be their God, and shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away." "And the redeemed of the Lord shall return and come with singing unto Zion, and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads. They shall obtain gladness and joy; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away." Then shall that glorious prophetic anthem, which was sung by the angels at the birth of Christ, be taken up by that great multitude which no man can number, and echoed from shore to shore, and from the isles unto the uttermost ends of the earth: "Glory to God in the highest; and on earth, peace; good will toward men!"—Robert Hill, in Messenger.

Literally there are countless millions to be provided in the hereafter of the earth, but looking always over and above world the writer's statement stands good for all time. We just notice that the American Maize Crop in this year so abundant that it is estimated it will yield several pounds weight to each man, woman and child in the world.—Ed. Messenger.

New Zealand, with a population of only half a million, supports 100 newspapers, thirty of which are published daily.

NATURAL IMMORTALITY AGAIN.

Men who have believed this doctrine have tried to prove it by almost every method except that of quoting plain Scripture in its support. President Bascom, in his Philosophy of Religion says, "The foundations of a faith in a future life lie outside of revelation, and ought, therefore, to be disclosed independently of it.....It is immortality which gives promise of revelation, not revelation which lays in our own constitution and in the government of God the foundation of immortality." We think that we could have no solid ground for belief in a future life were it not for the teachings of revelation. It is only in Revelation that God speaks to us in definite terms on this subject, and his word is the foundation of our faith. Independent of God's word, or outside of Revelation, there can be no sufficient ground for faith.

The "faith of immortality," says Dr. Bushnell, "depends on a sense of it begotten, not on an argument for it concluded." To this we reply, that the faith of immortality depends on God having made known his purpose to bestow immortality on all who believe in his Son. And we conclude an argument for it from the fact that God has promised it. And what can beget a sense of it but the divine promise? But this is not natural immortality, but God's gift through his Son to believers.

A work by Theodore T. Munger, called "The Freedom of Faith," has been lately published, and has created some sensation in the theological world. In some things the writer departs from the old lines of thought, and all that he says is said with such vigor and freshness, that his book has already found thousands of readers. But we are sorry that on several important doctrines he is in great error. One of these is the doctrine we are now discussing. He holds the common view of natural immortality, yet makes some concessions which are inconsistent with that view. In defending the doctrine he says, "Christianity asserts that man is an immortal person." This statement we meet with a positive denial. Christianity asserts no such thing, and we demand of any preacher or writer making that statement the book, and the chapter and the verse, in the New Testament where that assertion is to be found. Though we have read all through the New Testament many times, we have never found it ourselves.

"I think, therefore I am," was the reasoning of Descartes. Remarking on this, Mr. Munger says, "Had he continued, 'I am, therefore I shall continue to be,' he would have uttered as cogent logic." Any one may see that Mr. Munger's logic is here at fault. The fact that we think, we admit is proof that we do exist, as Descartes well argued; but the fact that we exist is not a proof that we shall always exist; much less is the one as clear as the other. Of this we ask for other and better evidence.

Mr. Munger says, "We cannot conceive of the annihilation of an ultimate atom. We can conceive of an organism being resolved into ultimate atoms, but not of their destruction; science and reason agree in this. But man is conscious of himself as an unity,—a moral unit,—a non-fluctuating, unresolvable, and hence indestructible thing." Here is what seems to us deception in the use of the words destruction and indestructible. He first uses the word annihilation; then he evidently uses the word destruction in the sense of annihilation, and the word indestructible as something which cannot be annihilated. Now he knows a thing may be destroyed, yet not annihilated. He knows that when a sheep is killed, when its life is taken away, and the carcass is cut up for food, it is destroyed; it is no longer a sheep; but it is not annihilated.

Now we believe that the man who does not answer the end of his existence, but abuses his life to the end, will have it taken from him at the judgment,—will be destroyed, both body and soul, as Jesus teaches; but we say nothing of the ultimate atoms of his organism being annihilated. To us these words are interchangeable, and to make it appear that believers in conditional immortality, because they teach the destruction of the wicked, therefore teach that the ultimate atoms of their organism will be annihilated, is, to say the least, very much like an attempt to deceive the people with regard to our teaching. Many people seem almost scared at the mention of the word annihilation, as applied to the doom of the wicked; and some preachers and writers knowing this, take particular care to represent our belief by that false word. On this subject we go as far as Christ went, but no further.

"It is a strange fact," remarks Mr. Munger, "that the human mind has always held to the immortality of the soul, and yet has always doubted it; always believing, but always haunted by doubt. Yet this throws no discredit upon the truth; rather otherwise. A belief that remains persistently rooted in the minds of the race, generation after generation, yet ever beset by an adverse influence, must have a vitality drawn from truth itself: were the belief not true, the doubt would long since have vanquished it, for nothing but truth can endure constant questioning.

We deny that this belief has been rooted in the mind of the race, since there are hundreds of millions of the race who never held that belief. It may have been rooted in the mind of a large portion of the race; but that is not an evidence of the truth. Mohammedanism has been rooted in the mind of 250,000,000 of the race, but that does not prove that Mohammedanism is true. Romanism has been rooted in the mind of 200,000,000 of the race, but that is not evidence that Romanism is true. Confucianism has been rooted in the mind of 300,000,000 of the race, but none of us things conclude that Confucian doctrines are true doctrines. Similar statements might be made respecting other great religious systems; but we must judge of the truth of a system by a higher authority than that of the number of its adherents. And it is contrary to fact to say that if the belief of the immortality of the soul were not true, the doubt would long since have vanquished it,—that nothing but truth can endure constant questioning.

Many false beliefs have come down to us through the ages; there have been good men in every age who have doubted them; they are still doubted,—doubted by tens of thousands of persons; but the doubt has not vanquished them. Error is so strong and subtle that it endures constant questioning. Popery has existed nearly 1,800 years; it has been doubted and questioned from its rise until now; but it still endures. So other great systems of error have existed for many centuries; there never was a time when some did not doubt and question them; yet they still endure. It is not sound logic therefore to argue that because the doctrine of natural immortality has endured doubt and constant questioning, it is therefore true. In the end nothing will endure or remain but truth, but in this age error continues.—Silas Hons in World's Crisis.

A Faithful God.

The Bible repeatedly assures us that "God is faithful." This is a most precious thought. We cannot rightly appreciate it until we have dwelt upon it a great deal. And not only is it necessary for us to thoroughly ponder this grand truth in order to form a proper estimate of its value, but we need to meet much of such experience as grows out of the unfaithfulness of our fellow-men. The sad and bitter experiences, which we have been frequently subjected to by the insincerity and treachery of supposed friends must supplement our thoughts of God's faithfulness, if we would sweetly and deeply appreciate the profound fidelity of our divine Father. When our hearts have been saddened and sickened by the stunning shocks which have come upon us through a revelation of the inconsistency of trusted supporters, it has been an unspeakable relief to look toward God, and feel that in him we had a friend whose faithfulness never falters. Oh, what a deep and ecstatic joy has throbbed every fibre of the soul as we have thus contemplated the immovable fidelity of God towards us! He has kept every promise which he ever made. Some of his promises were made thousands of years ago. All of them have stood on record for many centuries, and yet they are always as fresh and firm as though they were given but yesterday. They have been constantly renewed by their uninterrupted and complete fulfillment. God never gets tired of fulfilling the same promises, over and over again to the same person; and hence he never grows weary of being faithful to the same individual. But how different it is with us! We sometimes feel that it is rather monotonous and wearisome to keep making promises to the same person and fulfill them without deviation. And after we have made certain promises we rather hesitate to have them put on record because we want to reserve the privilege of making some alterations. But it is not so with God. Every promise that he ever made, he has been perfectly willing to have it recorded just as he uttered it. And there he has been glad to have it stand, during all coming ages. He has never seen any reason why he should alter or amend any promise or declaration that he made thousands of years ago. Hence he is just as willing to fulfill his pledges today as he was when he gave them. He takes nothing back nor adds anything to what he has already said. There is a solid and eternal permanence to all that he has said. O faithful Father! we adore thee for the constancy of thy grace and the fidelity of thy love!—Christian Secretary.

Words that Stain.

A small brush of camel's hair had been dipped into a field in which was some nitrate of silver, caustic, as it is sometimes called. The brush was wiped upon a white sheet. Pretty soon there appeared a black stain upon a white surface. It did not look very dark at first, but the action of the light seemed to deepen the color until it was an ugly spot that could not be washed out nor bleached out in a whole summer's sunshine.

A bright boy heard a vile word and an impure story. He thought them over. They became fixed in his memory, and they left a stain which could not be washed out by all the waters of the great round earth.

Do not allow yourself to think of vile stories, or unclean words. There are persons who seem to take an evil delight in repeating such things. And those who willingly listen to them receive a stain upon their memory. To give ear to filthy talkers is to share in their sin. Don't lend your ears to be filled and defiled with shameful words and vile stories.

In these days of evil speech and bad books, it is our duty to take care what we listen to and what we read. A bad story scorches and defiles the heart, pollutes the memory and inflames the fancy.

Shun these things as you would poison vipers. Draw back from hearing them. If by chance you have heard any obscene words or vile stories, drive them from your thoughts, as you would the black-winged bats from your face at night. Ask God to help you. Think of the true things he has said, and study the pure and beautiful things he has made.

In the last number of the Geological Magazine, London, the Rev. Canon Ingram describes the human bones and ornaments in a cave in the great Ormes Head. In the silt and breccia of this cave, fragments of human skeletons are found irregularly distributed, as if carelessly buried or thrown in. With these bones there are many teeth of swine, each marked on the ring with from four to six transverse lines, and perforated at the extremity in such a manner as to indicate that they were strung to form a necklace. Several teeth of bears, with perforations, have likewise been dug up, and are supposed to have been used for earrings or ornaments. It is suggested that this cave was the burial-place for some Iberian tribe, or the habitation of a race of cave-men akin to the Eskimos, whom Prof. Boyd Dawkins, in his "Early Man in Britain," describes as so indifferent to the sepulture of their deceased relatives that they sometimes cover up their bodies with snow, and leave them to be eaten by the dogs or foxes.

HAVING been absent from home attending to the duties of our ministry for two or three days past, there is no time left for us to write much Editorial this week. Furthermore, conferences and some other cares have demanded much of our time for a few weeks past.

THE latest news from the Servian and Bulgarian war is to the effect that preparations have been made for a great battle near Slivnitza. We cannot forecast the future but must await the progress and outcome of events. An exchange says: "The flame of war has been kindled in the Balkans. We see the beginning, but no human intelligence can pretend to set the limits of its area nor foresee the intensity of its fire."

BROTHER and Sister Woodward have returned to Michigan after their somewhat protracted visit in Indiana. We learned that one was baptized at Mentone at their last meeting there. This was a son of Brother R. C. Railsback. As a result of their visit in this State, fourteen persons yielded the obedience of faith in the different localities where they labored. In addition to this a church was organized near Macy, Ind., of fourteen members. May God bless them in all their future labors and bless those who have so recently come into the faith.

BRETHREN and Sisters, we wish you to read the communication by Brother R. S. Driggins in this paper. We know many of our brethren can very well spare a dollar or two when sending their renewals, and we think you will gladly do so if you can only see the great need and hear the earnest cry, of many who are hungry for the bread of life. Brethren, the time is very short that is left us for work. Will we use that time as our Lord would have us use it—will we extend the blessings he has bestowed on us to other needy ones?

---

We have made arrangements to sell Bro. J. P. Westbee's book, "The Coming Age, its Nature and Proximity," and are now ready to receive your orders. See advertisement in another column. Remember, also, we still have on hand a good supply of Bro. Wiley Jones' works, which are offered at only one-half the original price. Bro. Jones is in financial distress, and takes this method of obtaining relief. His "Gospel of the Kingdom, advocated in a series of Ten Discourses," is by far the best and most comprehensive work on the subject that has ever been written. The subjects of the different discourses will give some idea of the scope of this book: 1. How to Study the Bible, 2 What must I do to be saved, 3. The promises made unto the fathers, or the covenant with Abraham, 4. The sure mercies, or the covenant with David, 5. The eternal inheritance, 6. Immortality and how it may be obtained, 7. The subject, nature, design, and importance of Christian baptism, 8. Christian duties and graces to be obtained and cultivated after baptism, 9. The Kingdom as distinguished from the Church, and a few prominent signs that the Kingdom is near, 10. The Second Advent, the Millennium, and the state beyond, making a complete and exhaustive work that every brother should have to read almself and lead to unbelief. "Key Words, or the Englishman's Hebrew and Greek Concordance to certain words which throw light on Great Doctrines," is better than a large Concordance, in that it gives just what you want to know about such subjects as Faith, hope, repentance, baptism, conversion, adoption, righteousness or justification, the soul, the spirit, the death state, the grave, hades, Sheol and Gehenna, future and endless duration, the second advent, resurrection, immortality, regeneration, the kingdom of God, and like subjects, without being compelled to search through a vast amount of matter until lost in the magnitude of the work. "Thanatopsis" or the subject of the first and second death Scripturally considered, is a complete digest of this topic. The name of Wiley Jones attached to it is a guarantee that the subject is well handled. We furnish these works at one-half the original price. See advertisement elsewhere.

TO THE FRIENDS OF "THE RESTITUTION."

For the information of the brethren and friends who have not been able to attend the Annual Meetings of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, I submit the following statement: THE RESTITUTION has been published eleven years by this Association. During that time we have published and sent to subscribers and given away one hundred and six thousand copies of THE RESTITUTION each year, making in all, one million one hundred and sixty-six thousand copies. We have during the same time circulated as near as we can determine, three millions two hundred thousand pages of books and tracts. The reading matter contained in THE RESTITUTION, books and tracts which have been sent out into the world as "silent preachers," by the Association, would make more than two hundred thousand books that sell in the market at one dollar per volume. In other words the reading matter that has been put in circulation by the Association, if in the form of books and sold at the usual retail price, would have cost the readers thereof two hundred thousand dollars. The average receipts of the Association have been a little less than three thousand dollars per annum, or in round numbers thirty-three thousand dollars for the eleven years; which is only one sixth of what the reading matter would have cost had it been in books, at the usual retail price. From the foregoing, it will appear that the money which the brethren have furnished to enable the Association to publish THE RESTITUTION and send out books and tracts, has been faithfully and economically expended. To enable the Association to do so much with so little, personal sacrifices have been made by those connected with editing and publishing the paper. They will have their reward; if not in this life, certainly in the next. The Association is now three hundred and seventy dollars in debt. The expenses for the fiscal year just closed, exceed the receipts one hundred and seventy dollars. The receipts from subscriptions for the paper for the last year exceeded the subscriptions for the previous year two hundred and forty-four dollars, but the free-will offerings almost all dropped off last year, hence the deficiency.

What we owe must be paid; and we must not contract liabilities beyond our ability to pay. What shall be done? Will the brethren put their shoulders to the wheel and help the matter along? I know I am met at the very threshold with the statement that times are hard and money is difficult to obtain. It may be that the Lord has caused the times to be hard, in these last days, for the very purpose of trying us, to see what kind of metal we are made of. Be this as it may, I am persuaded that the good Master has placed us in this financial strait to compel us to send THE RESTITUTION to those who are unable to pay for it. If the brethren could read the letters sent to THE RESTITUTION office, containing the thanks and prayers of those to whom the paper has been sent and paid for by some one else, it would be sufficient to induce them to contribute liberally for this purpose. I will give one case, which will illustrate many others. Not long since the writer with some brethren and sisters, called on a good old brother, who, by reason of illhealth has been confined to his room for two years. A chapter was read, prayer offered, and words of comfort and consolation spoken. It was truly consoling to listen to the good old brother, who has served the Master so long, and having been so severely tried by long affliction, speak of the goodness of God and of his hopes of the future. With warm tears trickling down each haggard cheek, he said to us, that he knew the good Lord would soon take him home. That he intended, God helping him to hold out faithful to the end. After we had said good bye, and all retired except one brother, he said to him, "I realize how hard it is to keep THE RESTITUTION going, and I thank you for sending it to me so long after I have been unable to pay for it. So just erase my name and send it to some one else. I will live on what the good brethren have said today and my Bible. Dearly as I love to read the paper and know what the brethren are doing in other places, and to know what the nations are doing in fulfilment of prophecy, yet I don't want to burden any one." Will such an appeal go unheeded? I answer most emphatically No. There are many just such cases. Will the brethren contribute of their means, with which the Lord has blessed them, to enable the Association to put the paper into the hands of all such, and at the same time in this manner render such aid to THE RESTITUTION as to keep it on a sound financial basis. Send in your free-will offerings brethren, the Lord will repay you an hundred fold, and those to whom the paper is sent will bless and pray for you. The plan heretofore adopted be continued, viz: Any one who desires to send the paper to a friend can send the money to the "free-will" fund and direct the Business Agent to send paper to person named. Should you desire to contribute and have no one to whom you wish to send the paper, send in your contribution, and direct the paper to be sent to some worthy poor brother that may be known to the Editor or Business Agent. May the Lord bless all who shall in any way assist in the spread of the Gospel.

E. S. DWIGGINS.
President C. P. Association.

Editor Restitution:

The time is not yet up for our subscription, but we send the enclosed three dollars.—Two dollars for the paper, and use the other dollar as you see fit. After reading the last RESTITUTION, we know you want to hear from us all.

We have never been behindhand very much, and would much rather pay in advance. We cannot see how any one can pay so little attention to the wants of a paper that they think enough of to take, and to read. There are so many papers printed now, that all kinds of minds can have their choice, and be fed with the kind of food they enjoy, and one would think Christians would feel it a privilege to cheerfully support the paper they prize the highest.

There is no paper we read that we enjoy so much as THE RESTITUTION, each copy brings to our home, "Apples of gold in pictures of silver." We learn by it to understand better the precious word of God that is able to make us wise unto salvation. We would be so happy to meet with those who are of like Precious Faith, but are unable to do so. But we are rejoiced to know that the subject of the Lord's return is being more freely discussed, more fully believed in, and more generally loved here in our own little town, and there are some who see signs in the sun, in the moon and in the stars that proclaim Messiah nigh. And when we behold the crimson glory that lights up the heavens in the red sunrise and sunset, we feel that he is surely coming in our day. Pray that we may be accounted worthy to escape the tribulation that is coming upon the earth, and stand before the Son of man.

May the God of peace be with all who work for THE RESTITUTION, is the prayer of your sister.

MRS. J. A. LOWRY.

EDINBORO, PA.

Editor Restitution:

I thank you for continuing to send THE RESTITUTION to me, and for the extra numbers containing the account of the death of Mrs. Walk. Since she died another believer in this place has fallen asleep. Mrs. Jane Anderson who was immersed Oct. 26, 1884, and died Oct. 26, 1885. Her husband was sick when she was baptized, and died shortly afterwards. His name was Miss Anderson. He confessed faith in Jesus in the spring of 1884, but neglected baptism till it was too late. When I found that he was inclined to turn his feet into the narrow way, I took pains to go to his house, and instruct him in the things of the Kingdom of God and the name of Jesus; but for some reason unknown to me he put off his baptism until the disease which was then preying upon him, prostrated him upon the bed of death. His father and mother had both been obedient believers in the good news of the Kingdom, and had fallen asleep in the blessed hope. One of his brothers who still lives has for a long time been a believer. But to return. Miss's wife, who survived him nearly a year, was an excellent woman in her life, and now I trust sleeps in Jesus. She was buried on the afternoon of Oct. 27, by the side of her husband. The funeral discourse was delivered by the writer of this to a large and attentive audience in the Adventist Chapel. The subject chosen was the promised life in Christ Jesus, 2 Tim. i. 1. The following is the subject of the discourse.

The life was promised in the promise of the land to Abraham and his seed; and in the promise to David concerning his throne and kingdom. The life was manifested in Jesus, the promised seed of Abraham and of David, when he was raised from the dead to die no more. This life was communicated to him from the one only who hath immortality, the King eternal, invisible, the only wise God; and is to be given to the true disciples of Jesus when he comes again with the keys of death, and unlocks the grave and brings them forth into the new, the endless life. This is the only hope. To this hope the mourners were pointed for consolation. Two of the clergy were present. Sister Anderson has left five children, three grown up or nearly so, two quite small. The two small ones have found a home with their aunt Mary, who is an excellent Christian woman, baptized at the same time their mother was. The Lord will provide.

Editor Restitution:

We are called upon to chronicle the death of Dr. Hicklin, well and favorably known, to many of the old readers of THE RESTITUTION. Bro. Hicklin died Nov. 4, near Cairo, Neb., after an illness of several weeks. He suffered extremely, yet he bore his sufferings faithfully. Dr. Hicklin was for many years engaged in the practice of medicine, and was a minister for over fifty years. He has practiced medicine and preached in Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and other states. He was in the 73d year of his age, the last one of a family of ten children, and an own uncle of J. M. Stephenson. Our brother sleeps the calm and sleep of death. His life work has closed, and his works follow him. He leaves a kind intelligent companion, and three children to mourn his loss, yet they sorrow not without hope. Job's Redeemer and hope is theirs, and in due time will stand upon the earth. Our dear Sister Hicklin and children have our Christian sympathy, in their and bereavement. May the Lord reward her for the patient and watchful care she bestowed upon her husband during his entire illness. Words of comfort were spoken by the writer, who explained to the audience the faith, hope and doctrine of the deceased. Bro Hicklin had not lived in this place quite two years, but he had made many friends, and was highly respected by all who knew him. Your Brother in the Hope.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed find $3.00 on my subscription, and please explain how my account stands, as I have lost all track of it, my mind has been so occupied with the afflictions of earth. I have had sickness in my family for seven years, which has cost me about eleven hundred dollars. My wife was taken, seven years ago this fall, with spinal complaint, and had been a constant sufferer until about eighteen months ago she was taken with cancer in the stomach, dying July 21, 1885, leaving the evidence behind that she sleeps in Jesus, and as we believe will soon come forth clothed in immortal beauty. Though it severs the dearest ties of earth, yet we sorrow not as those who have no hope. We are longing for that time to come when our King shall come and bind him that has the power of death, when we can clasp our loved ones in an eternal embrace, as it were, for those that shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and a resurrection out from among the dead ones, cannot die any more. Oh! what a blessed hope the true child of God possesses, to read in the Word the promises left to his children, with the evidence that it is so soon to be realized. I will not weary you with my troubles farther. I remain your true Brother in Hope of Eternal Life when Jesus comes.

Youth's Column.

Mother, Watch the Little Feet.

Mother, watch the little feet
Climbing o'er the garden wall,
Bounding through the busy street,
Ranging cellar, shed and hall.
Never count the moments lost,
Never mind the time it may cost,
Little feet will go astray;
Guide them mother, while you may.

Mother, watch the little hand
Picking berries by the way,
Making houses in the sand,
Tossing on the fragrant hay.
Never deem the question rash,
"Why to me this weary task?"
These same little hands may prove
Messengers of light and love.

Mother, watch the little tongue
Prattling eloquent and wild,
What is said and what is sung
By the happy, joyous child.
Catch the word while yet unspoken,
Stop the vow before 'tis broken!
That same tongue may yet proclaim
Blessings in a Savior's name.

Mother, watch the little heart
Beating warm and soft for you,
Whole-some lessons now impart,
Keep, oh, keep that young heart true;
Entwining every word,
Sowing good and precious seed,
Harvest rich you then may see,
Ripening for eternity.

Loving One Another.

Two little twin boys, looking as near alike as two peas—so near that their grandmother living at a little distance, can not tell them apart—are always tied to each other. One cannot enjoy a good thing without the other shares it. They were in the grocery store the other day, and the merchant, just to toss them—there were several looking on—gave one of them a stick of candy. He waited a moment, thinking the man would give him one for little Gordie. He did not do it. So the little fellow turned away to his brother, looked at the candy, broke it as nearly in the middle as he could, but found one piece a little larger. This he gave to Gordie. Gordie took it, looked at the other piece and said: "That isn't right; you give off a piece."

There is a beautiful lesson for brothers and sisters, as well as other, and for grown up children.

Drunkard Making.

Men do not now start beer shops with their own money. The brewers of Cincinnati, Toledo, Milwaukee, and Rochester, the great brewing points in the country, use their millions, first in making beer, and second in establishing places in which to sell it. The brewers rent the premises, they supply the fixtures, they furnish the stock, and find the man to run the concern, the stipulation being that an agreed number of kegs of his swash are to be sold each day. The poor degraded fool who runs the shop cannot sit down and wait for customers to come in. He goes out to find them, and he does find them, for his continuance in business depends upon it. He makes it a business to entice men into his place, and he does not stop with men. The money of a boy is just as good to him, and he makes boys his special prey, because they are more easily captured than men. In every city of any size there are hundreds upon hundreds of these dens that cater especially to boys, teaching them not only the beer habit, but showing them the way to the pawn-brokers, where goods stolen from fathers and mothers may be converted into money to pay their bills. This debauching of boys is just as much a part of the business as selling beer to working men. It is all a part of the horrible trade.—Toledo Blade

An Unseen Savior.

"Absence, we have often been told, cannot conquer love. The victory of love over absence, when that love was once grounded in presence, is no strange thing. It is part of every family history, and concentrates all our griefs.

"But to love one we have never seen, known to us only by his biography and by a spiritual power we cannot explain, is one of the mysteries of the grace of God. And yet it is a fact. Christianity is not the adoption of a principle, but the love of a Person. Children who know nothing of principles, philosophers weary of theories which yielded only shelf under the skill of logic, have found in the love of a personal Lord the answer to every longing of their hearts. Here is one of the greatest facts of human history: there once lived and died and ascended from earth a Man who, though never seen on earth again, has commanded the hearts of millions of men with an attachment whose bonds, like those of gravitation, are at once invisible and almighty.

"Christians sometimes say, 'If I could only see my Savior and hear his voice, it would help me to a sense of his love and friendship. He would be to me less an idea and more distinctly a person.' Nor is the remark entirely without foundation in experience. There is danger lest the personal Jesus may become obscured behind his doctrine, and we may think we are loving an invisible Lord when we are rather loving the truths for which he stands, his humility, grace and mercy."

But no mere abstract principle or system of doctrine can take the place of a living personal Christ. The love which Christians feel for him is more than an interest in abstract principles; it is a personal affection, and it is, moreover, an affection which is begotten in us by his spirit. We love him because he first loved us; and the love wherewith we love him is unknown to us until the love of God is shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost.

It is this love which is so incomprehensible to the world and so precious to the church. It is the love of the present Christ; the love of one who hath said, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." And it is when possessed by this affection that the Christian can look up to him, "Whom having not seen we love, and believing, we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory, receiving the end of our faith, even the salvation of our souls."

Miriam.

The character of Miriam has ever possessed for us a peculiar interest, deeper perhaps for the veil of darkness that hangs over her, only raised here and there at some eventful period of her life. But how brilliant are these occasional glimpses! After reading all the history we have of her, four distinct pictures remain before the mind, of the life and character of Miriam. First, we see her as an innocent child, beautiful in her sisterly love and devotion; anxiously watching the perilous cradle of her baby brother. What were the feelings of that young heart, so early learning the lesson of concealment, as she noted the wandering steps of the daughter of the cruel king! What fears and hopes must have struggled in her breast! Sweet young Miriam, early tried, early rewarded! I can see thee now, meekly standing in the distance, bravely hiding all the terror of thy loving heart. I can see thee eagerly hastening forward to secure for the mother her dear and rightful privileges. Beautiful to us, as sister and as daughter seems the child Miriam! It was a strange scene for the young girl to pass through, but it is a fitting commencement to her stirring after-life.

Where do we find Miriam next? No longer a simple child, but a prophetess inspired of the Lord, in the glory of her womanhood, leading the chorus of her sisters to the praise of Jehovah. "And Miriam, the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea!" Gloriously beautiful art thou now, O Miriam, looking around on thy preserved nation, and the destruction of thy foes, with the song of triumph trembling upon thy inspired lips! A prophetess, and a leader of of the people, high was the mission of Miriam. Who can tell what burning thoughts filled her soul? what heavenly aspirations? to what heights her proud ambition soared? or what womanly longings thrilled her heart to escape from all this active life, to the quiet rest of a happy home? Who knows her joys, her griefs, her secret prayers? The inner life of Miriam is a mystery. Looked up to by her sister woman, their comforter, their guide, to whom could she herself go for comfort and guidance, but to the Lord, the great God? O blessed Miriam, sent by his hand before the people, let the air ring with thy triumphant notes: "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously!"

Again we see Miriam, despoiled of her glory, fearfully chastened. Poor Miriam! wert thou also led astray by human ambition? What a lesson is here for those who exalt in the good gifts of the Lord, who in their proud strength would rise above the whole world! O, there is danger in talent, peril in genius, and fearful risk in ambition, if it be not all consecrated to the glory of God. Poor Miriam! this was the hardest lesson of thy life! But surely this fierce fire consumed the dross of her character, and Miriam the lowly, the sad, was yet purer, higher than in her proudest days.

Years went by. A single verse in the Bible brings before us our fourth picture. "Then came the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, into the desert of Zin, in the first month; and the people abode in Kadesh; and Miriam died there and was buried there." Num. xx. 1.

And so it ends. The loving sister, the holy prophetess, the chastened woman, cold and still in death! What record is written on high of that strange, eventful, brilliant life? The volume is closed to us, but one day it shall be opened, and one day, O Miriam, we shall hear thy triumphant voice, chanting again,

"O, sing ye to Jehovah, for he hath triumphed gloriously;
The horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea!"

Is the End of the World at Hand?

The heaven spoken of in the Gospel, the word of God, is now preached throughout the earth. There is scarcely an island where the priests and missionaries are not to be found. So far the word of the Gospel has been filled, and now, it may be, that the end of the world is not remote, said Rev. Nicholas Ballais, pastor of St. Francis' Roman Catholic Church, Putnam Avenue, Brooklyn, yesterday, in briefly commenting upon the gospel of the day. It is not promised that all the people of the earth shall be converted, but that the Gospel shall be preached. This is now being done, and we know not but the end is not far off.—*N. Y. ## LONGING FOR CHRIST.

"Even so, come, Lord Jesus."—Rev. xxii. 20.

The Church has waited long
Her absent Lord to see;
And still in loneliness she waits,
A friendless stranger she.
Age after age has gone,
Son after son has set,
And still, in words of widowhood,
She weeps, a mourner yet,
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

Saint after saint on earth
Has lived, and loved, and died.
And, as they left us, one by one,
We laid them side by side!
We laid them down to sleep,
But not to hope forlorn,—
We laid them but to ripen there
Till the last glorious morn.
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

The serpent's brood increase,
The powers of hell grow bold,
The ranks of thickest faith is low,
And love is waxing cold.
How long, O Lord our God,
Holy, and true, and good,
Will thou not judge thy suffering Church
Her sighs, and tears, and blood?
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

We long to hear thy voice,
To see thee face to face,
To share thy crown and glory then,
As now we share thy grace.
Should not the loving bride,
The absent Bridegroom mourn?
Should she not wear the weeds of grief
Until her Lord return?
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

The whole creation groans,
And waits to hear thy voice
That shall restore her comeliness,
And make her wastes rejoice.
Come, Lord, and wipe away
The curse, the sin, the stain,
And make this blighted world of ours
Thine own fair world again.
Come, then, Lord Jesus, come!

THE EASTERN, OR TURKISH QUESTION.

It is quite natural to look at the Eastern skies as the harbinger of a coming day; the bright tinge of light breaking forth in the clouds gives joy and new energy after a dark and weary night of sorrow and trial; yea, it seems interwoven with our thoughts that the East is the place to which we are drawn as by magic power. There the Sun of Righteousness arose, and enlightens a world lying in sin; and from thence is expected the Coming and the appearance of the King of Israel (Acts i. 11), the hope of glory.

Looking from that standpoint, "The Eastern Question" is an object full of interest and pathos, of observation and scrutiny. A question which occupied the deepest thoughts and consideration of a Bismark, Disraeli, Gladstone, and of every statesman of Europe, and is still the enigma of the age.

The area of country connected with the Eastern Question is but small in comparison with other portions of the globe. "The population of Turkey in Europe is estimated at eight millions, and in Asiatic Turkey thirteen millions" (Zeppfle's Lexikon, Leipsig, 1868). Its area in Europe is scarcely sixty-four thousand square miles, and combined with that of Asia Minor, is only a little larger than the Republic of Mexico. If Syria is taken as a whole, it is one seventh smaller than the State of Minnesota, and the Holy Land being in length only 145 miles by 80 miles in its greatest breadth, is less in area than the principality of Wales—not so large as the State of Massachusetts.

The great obstacle in solving the Eastern Question is not the power of Turkey, neither the area of the Turkish dominion or of the Holy Land; it lies in the natural location of that area—the religious prestige of its people, and the supposed loss of the balance of the political power in Europe and in Asia. It is, indeed, a labyrinth of political entanglement and complication, therefore, to examine this subject, and to study it in the light of prophesy, is the duty of every Christian at the present time.

The true key to unravel the future is not to speculate or to advance our own ideas; it is to study the Word of the Ruler of nations, who has revealed to his prophets and servants of old "the hidden things which lie in the bosom of the ages to come." He changeth the times and the seasons; he removeth kings and setteth up kings; he giveth wisdom unto the wise and knowledge to them that know understanding; he revealeth the deep and secret things; he knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him" (Dan. ii. 21, 22). It is to the law and to the prophets that even kings' rulers and statesmen are directed to get wisdom, and oh, how would the world have been benefited if it had followed the example of Alexander, who inquired at Jerusalem who Daniel the prophet had spoken about the future of Greece and Persia; and, indeed, to that we ought to come, we ought to learn that the times of the nations commenced with Nebuchadnezzer are now in duration, and that they will be in continuance till "He shall come who has a right to reign, and whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."

The Eastern or Turkish Question has a twofold division, and we remark that the so-called "Roman earth or world" has a different character and territory from "the land of Immanuel" (Isa. viii. 8). It is the former that is represented by the metallic image and ferocious beasts whose rule is oppression; the latter, by a disconsolate widow, being left, trodden down and suffering (Lam. i. 4.) We learn that the first or Roman Empire should flourish exceedingly, but should be put down and perish. That the latter should sink in oblivion during a period of ages, and bear the rod of the oppressor; but at last should be re-established and should be called "The first dominion" (Micah iv. 8) a sure evidence that Israel shall return to their own land, and, being the centre or hub of the political wheel, shall have the power over the nations. "The dominion shall come to them" (Micah iv. 7).

We take first, the so-called "Roman earth." To examine this matter, we have to study the map illustrating the geography of the ancient world, and to know the boundaries of the territories of the nation symbolised in the metallic image as the fourth power exercising world-dominion, as they were at the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ (Luke ii. 1), and those which did belong to Rome in the first century of our Christian era. From Britannia to the confines of Mesopotamia, from the Baltic Sea to the great Libyan Desert, were the limits of the Roman earth.

It cannot be denied that the provinces of Thrace, with Byzantium (Constantinople) for its capital, did belong to the dominion of Rome, and is with other parts included in the image of the metallic figure of a human being (Dan. ii. 31–45).

That part of the image which is now under consideration is the fourth metal—namely, "iron, and also iron and clay mixed." When the dominion (iron) commenced, there was no division in the rule, the reign of Julius Cæsar and Augustus had Rome for its centre. The image called for a division of the two legs of iron, and that prophecy had to be fulfilled. The division of the Roman Empire became an established fact at the time of Constantine, the empire was divided into Eastern and Western, and Constantinople and Rome became the two capitals of one mighty empire. They had the same Roman character and rule, and although often in antagonism, yet always united in many respects, and at this very day the student of history and prophesy can see the connecting lines between all the nations belonging to the so-called prophetic earth. The more we study that prophesy of the metallic figure as a unit, and yet a diversity, the more we have to come to the conclusion that only Jehovah could produce and set before us such an exact figure, answering to every development in the political history of the nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa. It must be called "ne plus ultra" of all that is found in the pictorial gallery of Old Testament Prophecies.

We must always keep before our mind that the metallic figure (Dan. ii.) and also the four beasts (Dan. vii.) cover the whole ground, and represent the whole time between Nebuchadnezzar and the ending of "the times of the Gentiles;" there is no interim or hiatus between the end of the ten toes and the beginning of the kingdom of the Son of Man.

The history of Mohammed and the Mohammedan power is not a real part of the image, it is only an additional occurrence, in which an interloper from Arabia becomes connected with it, whose process is that of iron and oppression, but whose end will be destruction and a return to Arabia.

It is a comparatively short period of time that the Turks are possessors of Constantinople. It was in 1453, only forty years before America was discovered, that Constantinople was taken by conquest, and that the potent and aspiring Eastern or Greek Empire came to its end.

The year 1820 will always be known as a year of remembrance. The death-ball of the Turkish power was sounded in the naval battle of Navarino, and the deliverance of Greece and the establishment of a Grecian kingdom were the happy results. From that day and year the power of Islam has been waning; the Crescent has fallen in Europe and Algeria. Tunis, and the northern coast of Africa, has been virtually lost to "the sublime Porte," now satirically called "the Sick Man."

The whole area of old Illyricum, Dacia, and Macedonia has been wrested from Turkey, and that Thrace and Mœsia will become free is only a matter of time. That Constantinople will be conquered is decided by the limbs of nations, and the whole image of Daniel will be eventually restored. Already the tendency toward a reconstruction of the Roman world is witnessed in the changes resulting from the late Prussian war, and by the conference held in Berlin. Truly the study of geography in connection with prophesy is a field worthy the deepest researches of the greatest minds of the age.

The great problem of the age is, Who shall be the owner of Constantinople, and who shall be the ruler? Shall it be England, France or Russia? We maintain that England or France have not the least claim to the possession of Constantinople, the key of the East, and the control of the inland seas. Russia seems to have a better claim, and is eager for conquest. Since the last will of Peter the Great, she has manifested an aggressive spirit, and hopes yet to plant the cross in the church which is now the Mosque of St. Sophia, and to rule as the head of the Russian or Eastern Church in the old Byzantium. But, contemplating the origin of Russia, she being a Slavonic nation, her claim to the title of heir to the Eastern Church cannot be sustained, and her territory does not belong to the territory and people called "the Roman earth." We rather humbly suggest that the most rational solution would be that the king of Greece shall become the owner of Constantinople. Thus, the boundaries of that little kingdom will be increased, and a new Grecian Empire established, which would have the balance of power, and the present king being connected by marriage with the rulers of England and Russia ("the seed of man," Dan. ii. 43), both powers might accept the compromise, and so the image of the prophet shall be seen intact in all its proportions. No doubt Russia will always be an influential factor in this vexed question.

It is not only the territory in Europe which draws our attention, it is also the territory in Asia, which must be considered, and, indeed, is so closely connected with "the Eastern Question" that it has equal weight in the scales of the political complication. Palestine or Canaan, the "land of Immanuel" (Isa. viii. 8) is not like other countries on the globe, the property of the nations; it is a reserved spot for more than four thousand years. The Magna Charta of Israel's property is recorded in Gen. x. 5.; Deut. xxxii. 8, "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he sets the bounds of the people according to the numbers of the children of Israel."

That land is given to the seed of Abraham as a gift for ever. It is a covenant gift, and "a gift cannot be sold." (Gen. xlix. 15; xv. 18; xvii. 7-13). Mohammed was aware of that fact, and acknowledged in his Koran, "That the products of Canaan, not the land of Canaan, should be their property." That land is isolated from all other countries, protected by mountains, by deserts, and by the sea; its geography is unique, and yet it is the centre and focus of three continents. It is of such great importance that the Eastern or Turkish Question never can be settled unless the ownership of Canaan first shall be settled and established.

Jerusalem has always been "the caldron or seething pot" of the nations (Ezek. xi. 8–11); the battle-ground during the ages past, it will be the battle-ground of the ages to come. The first battle and also the first victory on record did happen in that country (Gen. xiv. 1–24), and so the last battle and the last victory will be fought in the land of Immanuel (Rev. xx. 9). No place on earth has such a record of carnage and blood as Palestine. From the times of the judges, the kings of Israel, the kings of Syria, Egypt, and Assyria, Nebuchadnezzar, the Romans, the Caliphs, the Crusaders, Napoleon Bonaparte to Ibrahim Pasha, Mount Tabor and the plains of Judah have been the battle-grounds of the Eastern wars; and as several "Eastern Questions" have already been settled in the ages past, so the great battle to come will be on the confines of the land where the angels sang "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men" (Luke ii. 13). Then shall the language of Paul be understood: "Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" (Rom. xi. 33).

No place on earth has produced such a vexation of spirit as Jerusalem has done. It was a thorn in the eyes of the Samaritans, and an eyesore to the philosophical spirit of Greece and Rome. After Moses, Jerusalem is the next holy city for an Islam believer. It was the goal of the Crusaders, and even at this very day it has an enchanting power. The Jews have there the Via dolorosa, and the graves of their fathers; the Mohammedans their Mosque of Omar, from which their prophet made his night's journey to the seventh heaven; the devout Christians feel that Jerusalem is called the city of the Great King, and so it is the same in regard to the nations abroad. England covets that country as the highway to Hindostan; France, as the representative of the Roman or Western Church, is claiming the right as the eldest son of the Church, and is making great purchases in Jerusalem and in Palestine; and Russia, as the representative of the Eastern Church, asserts her claim for possession, and has already invested great sums of money to establish herself in the holy city. It is the coveted prize, and for that reason "the Eastern Question" is the great dilemma of the age, and is the Gordian knot to be cut by the sharp sword of some modern Alexander.

To try to solve "The Eastern or Turkish Question" without making the Jews the principal factors in the case is lost labor. No nation can ever possess Jerusalem and the land of Canaan but Israel. The land is waiting their return (Ezek. xxxvi. 28), and the heirs are at hand and are coming (Ezek. xxxvi. 8), and when once established in their own country will hold the equilibrium of three continents—Europe, Asia, and Africa. They only can hold the balance of power between France and Russia, between England and Italy, the only nations which will fight for possession and claim pre-eminence. Ten or fifteen millions of Jews concentrated in their "fatherland," schooled by ages of persecution, holding the centres of railroads and also the canal of Suez, and others under their control, must exercise a mighty influence upon all nations far and near, because they will possess the key to Arabia, Persia, and Hindostan; they will open the highways to Egypt and Ethiopia.

When Israel shall return, they shall carry with them "the untold treasures," the wealth of the nations (Isa. lx. 11), and they will make Jerusalem "the great world-exchange," and enterprises will be begun and brought into execution of mining, excavation, archæological researches, and others no man can divine, and everything shall lead to a final solution of the so-called Eastern Question.

It might be said these ideas are a phantasm, they are dreams taken from the Sibylline oracles! Indeed, we say they are no dreams; we speak of realities; we live in a period in which a whole continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, has been settled, cities have been built, and as by magic a nation has been established, such as was never seen before, and this in little more than fourscore years. In America—the great west of the United States of America, a dream, or is it indeed a reality? And why should we not grant to the Jews the same privileges? —Yes, more. They have the promises of him who is the Omnipotent God, "The possessor of heaven and earth" (Gen. xiv. 19), and they shall have "the first dominion."

Already the death-knell of Islam is heard in Jerusalem. Only eighty years ago no Jew could, as a Jew (except by the peril of his life), enter the gate of Jerusalem; now it can be called pre-eminently a city of Jews. Now a Christian church, called "Christ Church," is built upon Mount Zion. It is no dream, it is a reality; the sound of the wheels of the chariot is heard of the coming King of Israel in Jerusalem, "who shall reign upon the throne of David, his father, and whose dominion shall be without end" (Luke i. 32, 33).—*A. ## The Pneumatic Teaching of the Scriptures and the Phantasmal Teaching of Apostasy and a Heathen Philosophy.

The Roman Catholic Church in its apostasy and compromise with heathendom and heathenish philosophy, had so perverted the true "first principles" of the natural and spiritual worlds or cosmos, and this perversion of terms has so permeated and percolated down through all Protestantism and so-called Christian philosophy, that nothing short of a fundamental restatement of these "first principles" and a re-definition of the terminology upon which these first principles rest in man's consciousness, will suffice to stay the flood of modern infidelity which is rapidly sweeping away all rational faith in Christianity and spiritual things.

The nominal Christian Church of today is practically divided into two great wings as the result of this philosophical Babel. The one so far as it has any reason to give for the faith it preaches is nominalistic and "laissez faire" in its philosophy, emotional in its means and instrumentalities, and necessarily unstable in its standing, the other, while stubbornly asserting the postulates of reason as the foundation upon which its faith rests, paradoxically combats reason as a deadly foe to faith, shuts its ears to the plainest and simplest protests of common sense, and ignores equally the legitimate plea of the honest inquirer with the quibbling doubt of the dishonest skeptic, and so to the average intelligence of mankind makes religious faith a synonym for credulity. Honest doubt frankly expressed and more and more boldly asserted by the intelligence of the world at large and shading off into absolute scorn, contempt and apathetic indifference are the phenomena apparent to even the casual observer outside the church of today: "the Broad Church" movement of the west and "the New Theology" movement of the east are the phenomena within the church of today. The issue is at hand, and must be met, and that too fearlessly. The Judge coming crisis has come. The question in its simplicity is, shall the church founder and go down on the rock of apostasy or will it, before it is too late, wisely and expeditiously undergird its ribs of oak with reinvestigation and a restatement of its philosophical first principles. Women may be satisfied with an emotional religion: and a too ready credulity ensnared the first woman, but men are pre-eminently logical, if anything, and the first man even was not duped in the transgression. His plea however, was too much like the quibbling legal make-shifts of today, a dodging of the main question, and an attempt to shift the responsibility of the act by a logically fallacious quibble. I didn't "eat of the tree," but "of the woman whom thou gavest me."

See how a divinely righteous and logical judge sweeps away the flimsy sob-web in the verdict pronounced.

The Scriptures clearly teach, that we are renewed or regenerated in the renewing of our minds, and Paul in recounting the superlative graces of sanctified love or (charity) says with all the rest that it "does not reason badly" (C. V. thinketh no evil"), and why? Because it does not leave out of its logical deduction the tender appeal of the heart. In its syllogism justice and mercy have joined right hands of mutual helpfulness and kissed one another with the hopeful kiss of peace. "Along with the heart man believeth unto righteousness (not with heart alone and reason ignored). In "the natural man" the heart or impulses or emotional nature is too apt to rule. In the regenerated or spiritual man this is reversed. There is a deep significance in the language of John "begotten from below" and "begotten from above." Our first perfection in grace is in becoming "Kings of righteousness," in being able to rule ourselves, to control these "natural inordinate desires" or emotions, to hold them captive to our will: and this can only be done through enlightened reason. The reason divorced from the sympathies of the heart, when the separation is complete, is a self-abnegation of its God-given throne, and suicide is its natural sequence, demoniac possession one of its phenomena. Better vice than the logic of despair or insanity.

There is much to be learned in carefully observing the "Zeitgeist," as the Germans call it, of any age. By this they mean the enlightened consensus or common sense of mankind as it asserts itself outside of the postulates of organic society in any age. For it generally embodies the quiet and judicial protest of truth against the hasty assumptions of prejudices and superficial investigation.

Strange as it may seem to the credulous and thoughtless inasmuch as prejudgment and superficial assumption underlies the whole fabric of modern theology and appears in the terminology of "ghost" and "spirit." In the translation of the Scriptures (C. V.) it is easily assumed that in the original Greek there is only one word with which to express the two English ideas involved in the words "ghost" and "spirit", and therefore the translators, approaching their work of translation with this prejudice or prejudgment in their minds (one of the errors of all mankind, by the way) they have used the English words "ghost" and "spirit" indiscriminately and interchangeably to translate the Greek word pneuma, and that too in the face of the fact that the Greek word in common use to express the true English idea contained in the word ghost is psuchee from which we have the word phantom. An proof of the fact that the writers themselves understood the difference of meaning in these terms see Matthew chap. xiv. 26, where psuchee occurs in the very evident heathenish, superstitious sense of "ghost". Also Luke xxiv. 37 and 39. Ordinary common sense not under the thraldom of heathenish superstition ought to have prevented this confusion of terms in the minds of the English translators, and certainly ought now to have prompted the "Revisers" to decisively correct it. But for some inscrutable reason best known to themselves, they did not, and as a natural result ignorant apostasy still prates its "names of blasphemy" as John calls them in the Apocalypse. Does it seem to you a little thing my readers? Let me see if I cannot open your eyes to see what a river of apostate error has arisen from this little fountain of a "first principle."

Assuming this "ghost" teaching to be correct and Scriptural we have first the assumption (a bold and heathenish assumption too) of natural immortality, man's natural life, the vital force of this natural organism of the body is assumed to be a "ghost" or some sort of an entity that can live independent of the body, and all we have to do is to "shuffle" off this mortal coil" and go down or up according to other theological terminology, an assumption that contradicts the doctrine of Scriptural regeneration. This assumption is followed by the teaching that we have "a soul to save" instead of the Scriptural teaching that we have a natural life to "lay down" or "abnegate" in order to "gain" or "obtain" a spiritual life.

In contrast, one is called the "old man" and the other the "new man." One is called the life we get in Adam, the other the life we get in Christ, both too under the law of heridity and the law of generation.

To fit this first assumption a sky kingdom of ghosts is imagined where the good ghosts go immediately at death, and a heathenish Hades where the bad ghosts go also at death, a teaching that ignores the whole Scriptural doctrine of the resurrection or makes it an absurd "mystery" as these teachers please to call it. The earth as "the inheritance of Christ" and the regenerated saints, or more properly the "new cosmos of the heavens and the earth," the final condition of "the universe" when sin and its effects have been eliminated through the perfect work of the Christ, Man also very naturally ignored as a sequence of this 2nd erratic assumption and the grand result is a purely fictitious and fantastic system of so-called spiritual things, the baseless fabric of an imagination divorced from reason and common sense, and therefore devoid of any practical utility to mankind. It is well exemplified in its first promise of faith as defined, in an utter perversion and mistranslation of what the apostle says faith is in Hebrews xi. 1. The translation (C. V. and R. V.) both make it either metaphysical "bosh" or mere transcendental hypothesis, baseless imagination, everlasting "proving" but never "proof" reached, whereas the apostle makes it "reality" "hypostasis" (ὑποστασις) and "proof reached" or "conviction" of "realities not seen." It is just this very weapon of unreason that the agnosticism of the present day is wielding with such iconoclastic effect against the nineteenth century church. It says to the church, your first promise of faith, by its very definition, is a confession of know-nothingism and credulity, and we accept the first half of it. We too don't know, but we are not fools enough to be credulous. We want to know. Tell us something that you know, not what you have imagined merely. In a word, there is just the difference between this sort of "phantastic" idealism in the apostate teaching of the day and the true "pneumatic" or spiritual teaching of God's word, that there is between the fiction of the novel and a veritable history of facts, and it is high time that the "watchmen in Israel" sounded the alarm and that too "with no uncertain sound." The increase of suicide and murder, the blasphemous rant of jerking red-handed murderers from human condemnation and the scaffold into a heavenly paradise and the society of angels, all the lies and iniquity of modern spiritualism so-called, with its demoniac train of free-love, mormonism, unbridled lust, lunacy and unreasoning skepticism are God's "danger signals," pointing us to the church's apostasy behind and certain death ahead.

As our great exemplar Paul (the apostle to the Gentiles or nations) in another Athens and another Hill of war (Mars Hill) once said to another wonderful civilization, but an apostate one, "moreover one of your own poets saith," etc.

So let me call your attention to the words of one of the poets of this nineteenth century civilization who with much error forcibly emphasized as he sang this great truth.

Life is real, life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal.
Dust thou art, to dust returnest
Was not spoken of the (soul).

Yes it was; but he meant the "Spirit" "the regenerated soul."

What better illustration could I give you of the results of the church's fundamental false teaching? This natural immortality" error is the taproot of the apostasy and is the natural fruit of the seed-lie that Satan planted in the heart and mind of mother Zoe (Life, Eve C. V.), "Ye will not surely be condemned to die." All heathendom and all apostasy however cultivated and civilized has always believed it; and it appears as the major chord of all the philosophy of ancient and modern times outside of God's revealed "first principles." Heathen philosophy has always seized upon the "longing desire" of the heart for immortality and assumed the universality of this desire to be evidence of present possession, and taking this assumed present possession (a purely bold assumption so far as Scripture is concerned) as a first premise of reason, has held a hypothesis as the fiction of Robinson Crusoe, it has solved the old problem of Job's day "if a man die shall he live again" in its own fantastic way, namely, man being already "an immortal soul" and his body but the shell which he shuffles off or glides out of as the snake does out of his skin, goes and gets somewhere after the shuffling or gilding out process, death is not death, only a change of life, or man himself does not die, only his body dies. He himself like the poets little brook "goes on forever."

But then arises the greater difficulty and the greater problem, what to do with him in this "forever state"; and so as a natural result of the first premise of error we have all the other absurdities of imaginary heavens and hells and purgatorys to be bailed or prayed out of "eternal torment" and fiendish perversions of every sense of justice and good government, the general ignoring of the law of all life that every seed "generates after its kind"; the clear apprehension of which law alone would postulate and necessitate a "New Adam" in order to pneumatize or spiritualise the "old psuchikon or natural Adam" or "natural man." The ignoring of this first grand law of life and the substitution of an absurd "spiritual birth" coincident and coextensive with the "the life we now live" are but natural correlations of errors, and if so it might go on to show the illusory nature of this whole fabric of hypothetical reasoning, but I refrain, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life." God has made all clear there for those who sincerely desire to know. But be sure that you have "the Scriptures." "For many false teachers have come into the cosmos," and "try the spirits even, to see whether they be of God."

Beware of hypotheses and phantastic teaching. "For faith is a hypotheasis"—a real state.

THE COMING AGE,

—178—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. Western.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has confounded the most profound thoughts of Christian followers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are inquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprise, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. Indeed largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophesy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophesy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, in shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his unerring hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to serve, preparatory to the Stupendous End to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, discovery and invention, history all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the will of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over two large pages, bound in Cloth Price $1.00. Send to this office for this work.

LET NOT YOUR HEART BE TROUBLED.

When all this world is bright with Spring and morning,
And you alone seemed marked for sorrow's scorning,
Shut in, secure, with desperate pain and sorrow,
And all life's future looks one long, sad morrow—
What saith the Christ, the tender One,
Who shineth in dark chambers as the sun?
"Let not your heart be troubled."

When all the world seems resting in the noon time,
When hearts grow light and glad enough happy June time,
And you must toil and toil for scanty payment,
To gain but meagre food and coarsest raiment,
What saith the pitying Christ, who giveth rest
To every heavy laden soul, oppressed?
"Let not your heart be troubled."

When all the world is gay with merry making,
Nor heeds how many lonely hearts are aching,
And you, shut out from mirth, and sick and faintly
Hear but the Winter wind's hollow plaintive,
What saith the lasting Christ, the outcast's Friend,
Who will be with us "even to the end?"
"Let not your heart be troubled."

Why, must we cry about and question vainly,
Because we cannot see God's reason plainly?
He surely is all wisdom, love and power—
Shall we not trust in him for life's little hour?
For this saith Christ, who notes our every cry,
Who lived a man, to labor, suffer, die,
"Let not your heart be troubled."

BARTIMAEUS.

"And he cried, saying, Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me."—Luke xviii, 38.

This man was a beggar and blind. His persistent cry for mercy causes Jesus to stand and command that he be brought to him.

Peerless Prince! How unlike all the great men with whom we are familiar. Most of us imagine we have done well when we put a few pennies into a poor beggar's hand. Asking them what they would have us to do for them, is an honor Jesus will likely have all to himself. (Most of us hurry by on the other side). We call ourselves heirs of God and joint heirs with his Son. Let us see to it that we are not deceiving ourselves. Jesus said, "What wilt thou that I do unto thee?" and he answered, "Lord, that I may receive my sight."

How swift the growth of this man's faith, just a moment ago it was—"Thou son of David have mercy on me." His faith could not at first call him Lord nor ask for a definite blessing. "Thou Son of David." I suppose that every intelligent Jew knew that Jesus was descended from David. This was not the faith which saved him. No, no, there is a vast difference between,—"Thou Son of David have mercy on me," and "Lord, I would receive my sight." (We may all be merciful). A man may be able to speak and write very clearly about the Son of David who is to reign gloriously in the future: but if he is not our Savior and Lord now, we may hardly expect to participate in the glory attending the revelation of Jesus Christ. Associating and even working with God's people will not secure us a welcome into the kingdom. Noah's carpenters, though helping to build the ark, were swept away by the flood and perished. I trust none of the friends of THE RESTITUTION will make such a mistake as did Noah's carpenters. (There are some workers who receive their reward here—now). "Rabboni," "Good Master," nor "Son of David" will answer for—"Lord thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee," or, "Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God."

When Jesus is recognized by us as Lord, we allow him to control and govern us. Whatsoever he bids us do, we do it; whether agreeable to the flesh or otherwise. We follow him, in such a way that all who know us recognize the genuineness of our changed life, and do like the people who witnessed what had been done for Bartimaeus, give praise unto God.

I think if I could have seen Bartimaeus at his home after his first day with Jesus, it would have been a sight never to be forgotten. I fancy even now I hear old Mr. Timaeus pleading with the people not to suffocate his boy; "Bark, you know is not used to taking such walks as he did this day, besides he is quite hoarse from shouting. Come tomorrow, friends, and he will tell you all about how his eyes were opened. The Jewish maids and matrons are fanning his mother, she too is exhausted from shouting hosannah to Israel's King. (Dear readers, have you ever spent a day with Jesus?) I do hope I shall meet Bartimaeus after resurrection. I would love to have a long talk with him. Mark and Luke have so little to say about him. They simply give us his name and his profession—a beggar. This prompts me to ask, are we not all beggars? receiving from our Father in heaven daily, that for which we give nothing in return, but even Thank you.

Not only are we beggars; but we are most of us,—I should say all of us—blind as well. Born so, and continue so until our Lord says:—"receive thy sight."

"The whole world was lost in the darkness of sin
The light of the world is Jesus!
Like sunshine at noonday his glory shone in,
The light of the world is Jesus.

Come to the light, 'tis shining for thee,
Sweetly the Heart has dawned upon me.
Once I was blind, but now I can see,
The light of the world is Jesus."

There is a kind of blindness that came upon men as it were by stealth. Bartimaeus' blindness was as nothing compared with this. The Laodiceans had this kind of blindness, and knew it not. (See Rev. iii. 17). "Because thou sayest, I am rich and increased with goods, and have need of nothing, and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked, etc."

Not long ago a church brother told me that I spoke too much about God's word. "We know our duty," said he. "We meet to talk of our experience. Sunday School is the place to talk about the Bible." This man is a leader in my church! Where will such a leader land his flock? Jesus says, they will fall into the ditch.

God counsels the Laodiceans in the 18th verse, to anoint their eyes with eye salve that they may see. I know no other way of doing this than by following the example of Bartimaeus, and say with him, "Lord, I would receive my sight." Speaking and writing about the Son of David is very good; but we should not stop here; we need him with us on the voyage, especially when storms arise. It is surely comforting when our sky looks threatening as it often does to many of us, to say to one near us,

"Master the tempest is raging!
The billows are tossing high!
The sky is o'ershadowed with blackness,
No shelter or help is nigh.

Carest thou not that we perish!
How canst thou lie asleep,
When each moment so madly is threatening
A grave in the angry deep!"

Tempest-tossed and sorely tried brother, do you hear his whisper, "peace be still?" If you do I have good hope that you will weather the storm. No water can swallow the ship where lies, the Master of ocean, and earth and skies." In conclusion I would say that my reason for calling attention to present and personal experience is because I think this is my mission. Most all of our writers appear to be chiefly interested in the age or dispensation which is to come.

A man who is continually talking about the future, is to me like a farmer talking and planning about harvesting, when he should be seeding his fields, fertilising, fencing, etc. Our work now is to sow, sow gospel truth, this is the way we may help the blind to see.

ISAAC MCCURRY.

The following letters were read at the Quarterly Conference held in Plymouth, Ind., Nov. 15, 1885.

WATERFORD, Ind.

Dear Brethren in Conference:

Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. When I call to mind the blessings we enjoyed together at Argos, and to say that I would be happy to meet the dear brethren at Plymouth, faintly expresses my feelings. But the affairs of my family prevent me from meeting with you. But you have my sympathies and prayers that the Lord may be with you and that much good may be done in the name of the Lord Jesus. As to our prosperity here, it is not very flattering, for there are very few that sympathize with us. Brother Carter has been with us holding meeting the last twelve days, the interest seemed good, and to increase as the meetings progressed. We had good audiences and the best attention. Brother Carter will continue until he starts for Conference, hence we will leave him to report.

Your brother waiting for the kingdom,
L. FOGLE.

CRAMER, Ill.

To the Church of God, Greeting:

As there was a desire expressed to hear from those who could not personally attend the Conference of 1885, I pen a few lines.

I would like to meet with those friends of the Faith who will meet in session by this week, and listen to the words of faith, hope and love, there so earnestly expressed, and heart-cheering to hear. I often think how edifying and good it would be to hear a sermon preached again, one that you could sympathize with every thought expressed. I hear no such sermons here, for as David writes, "I watch and am as a sparrow alone upon the house-top." There is none of the faith here that I can commune with and confide in, save through our beloved RESTITUTION. Pray that my faith fail not, but that I may overcome the world. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." "The night is far spent, the day is at hand. Knowing the time that now it is high time to awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed, let us put on the armor of light, put on the Lord Jesus Christ.

A fellow servant of the Lord Jesus Christ. E. K. HOLT.

[It was the expressed desire of our brethren and sisters, in Conference assembled, that the Editor should assure Sister Holt that they deeply sympathize with her in her isolation, and earnestly pray that our Heavenly Father may throw around her his loving protecting care through the journey of life, and finally bring her to share in the fellowship of the immortalized and redeemed saints in God's everlasting kingdom.—ED. RESTITUTION.]

MOUNTAIN GROVE, Mo.

To the faithful ones at Plymouth, and all of like precious faith who may meet with you, we send greeting in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and wish that we could be with you. We would encourage you all to go on with your good work. If any are weak, let the strong bear with them. Remember we will be thinking of, and praying for you on Sunday, and not only Sunday, but to the coming of our Leader, who will give to you and me as we deserve; you to rule over ten and us our five cities as we use our talent.

May the Lord of love bless and keep our dear Brother Chaplin, and also you all. Grace mercy and peace be with you all through Him who loved us. Amen.

Hoping to meet you very soon in the kingdom of God, we remain your Brother and Sister.

WALTER L. KILE & WIFE.

COOPERSTOWN, Ill.

A. R. Underwood:

Seeing the announcement of the First Quarterly Conference of the Church of God, together with a request that all brethren who cannot attend should write a short letter. We are glad to know that others enjoy the privileges denied to us, that of assembling together in conference.

We are a small band of brethren in the One Faith, and are scattered through this county. There are none of us wealthy, and as all ministers of our faith live at a distance, we have not been able to have regular preaching. We have occasionally sent for a minister, but they invariably were able to remain only a short time, just long enough to awaken a feeble interest and let people know they were here. We have no Church organization, and no building of our own in this place, but notwithstanding these discouragements, we are still trying to hold up the faith and let your light shine. We think that if we had the right kind of a minister, one who is skillful in building up and organizing a Church, much good might be done in this locality.

We know that if all believers in this and the adjoining township were united and had an organization with a competent leader, we would have no difficulty in raising means to build a house, and maintain a minister who would suit us. Those we have had here were excellent men, but they were men calculated for missionary work, or to carry the faith into new places.

Our faith is well understood here, and believed, or practically so, by many who are connected with other churches or as yet have made no profession, therefore we feel the need of a permanent church so that we may have regular worship, and can say to others, "come and worship with us."

Yours in hope of the kingdom.
Miss ELLEN PETTIBONE.

The Kingdom of All the Ages.

In the great mosque of Damascus, on the upper beam of an ancient portal may still be traced, in faded Greek letters, the inscription,

"Thy kingdom, O Christ, is the kingdom of all ages, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations."

For twelve hundred years have Moslem worshippers gathered beneath the motto, sculptured in old time when the building was a Christian church. And still the inscription calmly looks down upon them, as awaiting its time to be fulfilled, when the banner of the Crescent shall float no more. My brethren, that motto, to the eye of faith, still gleams from every temple of false worship, from every monument of man's ambition. "Thou art the King of Glory, O Christ!" And thy most royal proclamation was made when the shadow of Calvary was gathering darkly about thee; and to thy disciples, as to Receiving Greeks, and to succeeding Jews, and to thy church of all times, thou didst say: 'Now is the judgment of this world, now shall the prince of this world be cast out; and I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself.'"

THE PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS AND ITS LESSON.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh" (Matt xxv. 1-13.)

This parable, like the others in the New Testament, has had various significations assigned to it; and much disputation has, in consequence, followed. Before proceeding to expound, and apply what appears to me to be the lesson which our Lord intended this parable to carry, it is of importance to call the attention to the fact that the parable in itself is simply a description of a marriage procession, such as his hearers were familiar with, and which has been continued to modern times.

The nuptial procession by night, and with lighted torches, or lamps, Dr. Kitto informs us, is still the prevailing custom in the East; and was, in ancient times, also the same among the Greeks and Romans.

The following descriptions by a gentleman who witnessed them will best illustrate the matter:—Mr. R. S. Herschell, himself a Jew, in this "Brief Sketch of the Present State and Future Expectations of the Jews," describing the customs of the Jews in the interior of Poland, where many old usages which have been abandoned in Germany, France, and England, are still kept up, relates the following:—"The night before the celebration of the marriage is called 'the watch night,' and is kept as such by the family of the bride, and by the maidens who attend on her on the occasion. If the bridegroom's residence be at a distance from that of the bride, he usually arrives some time in the course of the night, or very early in the morning. The bridesmaids watch anxiously for his arrival, and, as soon as they are apprised of his approach by the joyful shout set up by some of the members of the family who have been on the lookout to catch the first glimpse of him—'The bridegroom cometh'—they go forth to meet him."

In Mr. Ward's View of the Hindoos, is the following:—"At a marriage procession which I saw some years ago, the bridegroom came from a distance, and the bride lived at Serampore, to which place the bride was to come by water. After waiting two hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of Scripture, 'Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him.' All the persons employed now lighted their lamps, and ran with them in their hands to fill up their stations in the procession. Some of them had lost their lamps, and were unprepared; but it was then too late to seek for them, and the cavalcade moved forward to the house of the bride, at which place the company entered a large and splendidly illuminated area before the house, covered with an awning, where a great multitude of friends, dressed in their best apparel, were seated upon mats. The bridegroom was carried in the arms of a friend, and placed in a superb seat in the midst of the company, where he sat for a short time, and then went into the house, the door of which was guarded by Sepoys. I and others expostulated with the doorkeepers, but in vain. Never was I so struck with our Lord's beautiful parable as at this moment. 'And the door was shut.'"

From these extracts it may be plainly seen that the parable before us is a real description of a common occurrence, familiar to the people to whom our Lord related it. Like all our Lord's parables, it is used to illustrate one particular truth, or enforce one particular lesson. The lesson here is, the importance of being in readiness for the return of the Lord from heaven. The Lord himself makes that application of it, saying: "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." That was the subject of his discourse. See the preceding context, "But of that day and that hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels in heaven, but my Father only. But as the days of Noah was, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come. But know this, that if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up. Therefore, be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh."

To enforce this lesson, the parable of the ten virgins was spoken. Such being the case, the point of significance is not the circumstance that virgins are introduced, or that their number was ten. These are only the details of the picture. The point of significance in the parable is, that when the cry was raised "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him," the wise virgins were ready to enter along with the bridegroom into the marriage, while the others, in consequence of not being ready at the proper time, arrived too late, and "the door was shut."

The lesson of the parable is a solemn and important one to all who profess to be looking for the return of the Lord from heaven. "The Lord is coming!" we say and sing. Were he to come now, are we ready to meet him, and to enter in with him into his joy?

To aid in our self-examination, notice the reason why the foolish virgins were excluded.

1. That reason was not their being asleep when the approach of the bridegroom was announced, "They all slumbered and slept," yet five of them were ready to enter the banqueting-hall at the proper time; and did enter with the bridegroom into the marriage. Had they all been ready to meet the bridegroom when he came, the circumstance of their having fallen asleep would not have hindered any of them from entering along with him. But these five found their lamps were going out; and while they went to buy oil, the bridegroom came, and before they returned, "The door was shut."

2. The cause of the exclusion was not that they did not believe that the bridegoom was coming. They all "took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom" (v. 1).

I call attention to this, because the counterpart of the foolish virgins is sometimes alleged to be those who deny the Lord's pre-millennial advent. A very serious error, indeed; but whatever may be the fate of such, when the Lord does come, they are not among the parties represented in this parable, and, so far as believing is concerned, the virgins are alike.

3. Neither was the lack of knowledge the cause of their exclusion. It has sometimes been said that the "oil," represents knowledge; but that must be a mistake, for the communication of knowledge does not diminish it; and the reason which the wise virgins gave for not giving some of their oil to those whose lamps were going out, was: "Lest there be not enough for us and you." If the oil represents anything, it must be something that one cannot spare to another—something, the whole of which one needs for himself.

4. The cause of exclusion was their not being ready—ready to enter into the marriage-chamber when the bridegroom came; and the lesson of the parable to us is, that, if we are not in a condition of readiness when the Lord comes, it will be too late for us to prepare then.

But what are we to understand by readiness? "Who shall abide the day of his coming? Who shall stand when he appeareth?" Need I say that the readiness referred to is personal character? "Living soberly, righteously, and godly." Doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with our God. Denying ourselves to all ungodliness, and worldly desires. Abstaining from all appearance of evil. Only those so living shall be ready to enter into the joy of the Lord at his coming; and be found of him in peace.

True, it is written that, "Unto them who look for him, will he appear unto salvation;" but this promise, like many others, is conditional. It assumes that those who look, for him, are also ready, prepared to enter with him into the marriage. Doing his will, and carefully avoiding whatever is offensive in his sight.

Most heartily do I believe that we are saved by grace, that nothing we can do, however good in itself, can form the ground of a sinner's acceptance with God; but it is also true that, if we live after the flesh we shall die. Most emphatically does the apostle Paul, after naming a catalogue of evil practices, affirm that, "they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." "Be not deceived, God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. He that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption, but he that soweth to the spirit shall of the spirit reap life everlasting."

Unless ready in this sense, when the Lord comes, we shall find ourselves in a position corresponding to that of the foolish virgins, when "the door was shut."

I find some commentators on this parable holding out the idea that the case of those foolish virgins, and, by consequence, those who will correspond to them at the coming of the Lord, is not hopeless. And this idea is based on the fact that their lamps had not gone, but were going out, according to the Revised New Testament. But surely this is no part of the Lord's teaching in the parable before us. Whether their lamps had gone, or were merely going out, the result was the same. In either case they were unprepared to enter with the bridegroom; and though they tried to prepare themselves then, it was too late. "The door was shut," and knocking and pleading were unavailing. Let us, therefore, be ready—ready now, for we "know neither the day nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh!"

So far, my words have been words of warning to those who are looking for the return of the Lord from heaven. But we have also words of cheer. Those who were ready, went in with the bridegroom into the marriage festival! Oh, what joy and gladness do those words represent! The storms of life all past, and gone for ever. Perfect peace, perfect love, perfect purity, the full enjoyment of the Redeemer's joy. All this, to an extent beyond our conception, is in store for those who are found of the Christ at his coming, walking, "not after the flesh, but after the spirit." Courage, ye faithful ones. The night is far spent, the day is at hand. Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh.—W. Laing, in Rainbow.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, DECEMBER 2, 1885. NO. 45.

THE RESTITUTION,
Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,
Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the "world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the kingdom of God on the earth, with its Christ as king of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel: the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the annihilation of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

THE PARALLELS OF PROPHECY.

There are in the Book of Daniel two symbolic outline visions of the historical sequence of events, extending through the times of the Gentiles to the establishment of the kingdom of Christ. The writings of this prophet are the key to the method of interpretation to be followed in the kindred, but still more highly figurative, Book of the Apocalypse. Prophecy being history foretold, the page of history is where we may expect to discover its fulfilment. The page of prophecy may be called God's cipher; its partial fulfilment in history is his key to that cipher, by means of which we may not merely translate past chapters of its wonderful unfoldings, but may even hope to gain some rays light upon those not fulfilled as yet. It must also be remembered that prophecy partakes both of the literal and the figurative. Many believe that it must be accepted as all the one or the other, though no greater mistake can be made. A chief difficulty in this kind of interpretation lies in the just discrimination between the two. Some portions must be understood exactly as they are read, while, inwoven in the same passage, are, perhaps, some purely symbolic; and the facts historical or otherwise, that may be imagined as appropriately described by such, have to be ascertained by careful analysis and adjustment of both. What do these symbols mean, and how far is the passage symbolic, and how far literal, is the one question! If we are able to decide satisfactorily with regard to those looking back upon the past, we gain the clue to the nature of events still future.

Another important point in interpretation is the consecutive and orderly arrangement of the events predicted. In outline only, with some portions more fully described than others, Daniel and John alike appear to give the order of history from the time in which they themselves wrote, but John in more comprehensive and more lucid than Daniel, giving fuller details of events to come than did the Old Testament seer. They both, however, close at the same point—the possession of the kingdom by the saints. Here, indeed, John goes further than his great predecessor, for the radiance of the Gospel bringing "life and immortality to light," had dawned upon his day. It is this consistent, comprehensive, magnificent outline which, though none can dovetail it in every part, commends itself as stamped with a divine origin, and sealed with the signet of Truth.

The first vision in the Book of Daniel "the image of gold and silver, of brass and iron mixed with clay," seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream—stands in the forefront for examination. It is the simplest of all in its construction and meaning, and deals only with primary events. There can be little question as to its main reference. It gives a very distinct outline of the four great, earthly, universal monarchies of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome; the chief point worthy of note being this, that between Rome and the fifth universal kingdom, which is, undoubtedly, Christ's, there is no other. A second thing also must be marked in the interpretation given by Daniel—viz., that it is in the "days of the kings," or the Roman Empire split up, as represented by the ten toes, "the God of heaven" sets up his kingdom; proving that whatever may be signified by its establishment, the reference is not to its planting by our Lord at the period of the First Advent, which took place long previously in the days of the undivided empire.

The next outline vision is one seen by the prophet himself, representing the same period of time and course of events, but under different symbols and with much more fulness. In the first year of the reign of Belshazzar, he beholds four beasts coming up out of the sea, corresponding to the four metals of which the image was composed. The first is like a lion, shorn of its wings, denoting the Babylonian Empire, whose power was already on the wane; the second resembles a bear, "devouring much flesh," or the Medo-Persian monarchy, so cruel in its conquests; the third is a winged, four-headed leopard, a graphic symbol of the founding of the Grecian kingdom by means of the rapid victories of Alexander the Great, the four heads at once recalling its division, soon after his death, into those four dynasties of which the Seleucidæ of Syria, and the Ptolemies of Egypt, are the only two belonging to Scripture story. Then arises the fourth beast, "great and terrible," whose appearance and actions so disturbed the prophet as to lead him to ask for and obtain added information respecting it, which, however, left him scarcely less troubled and perplexed. This beast corresponds with the great red dragon of Rev. xii. 3, and with the beast rising up out of the sea, in Rev. xiii. 1, which was like a bear, a leopard, and a lion, in one. The seven heads of John's dragon and beast are wanting in Daniel, though the ten horns, akin to the ten toes of the image, are in all three. This omission of the number of the heads by Daniel (for it by no means follows that the seven were invisible to him), is probably due to the fact that he was only giving the bare outline of the Roman Empire, as symbolized by this fourth beast, where it coincided with the three preceding ones as a universal power; but when, from verse eight of the seventh chapter, he not only refers to events of a totally different nature, but to those belonging to the same period as the Apocalyptic predictions, then we discover the symbols of both prophets to be identical. This later vision concludes at the same point as the former one—the giving of the kingdom to the saints—but with many additional particulars. There is the slaying of the beast, or the final overthrow of the latest form of Roman dominion; there is the setting of the judgment, the opening of the books and the giving of the kingdom to the "One like unto the Son of Man." There is, besides, the first appearance of that much controverted date, "the time, times, and dividing of times," distinctly associated with what takes place during the continuance of the ten kings, or kingdoms.

Two years after this vision, in the third of Belshazzar's reign, Daniel has another, not complete, like the two previous ones, including the whole of the times of the Gentiles, but taking up, under fresh symbols, the second and third of the four great universal empires. The figures are a ram with two horns for the Medo-Persian power, and a he-goat, so swift in its rapid progress as seeming scarcely to touch the ground in its pursuit and destruction of the ram. The notable horn between its eyes brings Alexander the Great again before us, as the founder of the Grecian dominion, and its first kingdom; and in the upspringing of the four other horns, after the breaking of this one, we have again represented the fourfold division of his kingdom after his death. The particular value of this prophecy is that the interpretation is given, showing most clearly that the solution of all prophetic symbols is to be found in the page of history, while the three united visions teach us that the same historical events may be prefigured in different ways and under different signs, prominence being given sometimes to one series of events and sometimes to others.—Elizabeth Sopworth, in Christian Herald, and Signs of Our Times.

How Christ Looked.

The following is from the Toledo Blade, a worldly paper. The sculptor, Story, a noted artist, lived in Rome and had access to all old manuscripts of the oldest libraries of the world. The description of Jesus and his followers, taken from Lysias a Roman officer who was at Jerusalem in the time of Christ is wonderfully interesting, and from a worldly standpoint is a truthful picture, corresponding precisely with the Bible account as we could expect from an eye-witness of Jesus who was not a believer.

O, how thin Christ contrasts with the idea held forth by the popular churches. Denouncing hypocrites and siding with the poor against the rich, would today cause all the church rabbis to seek to kill him just as did the Jews of old. There is no existing sect but would put this same Jesus to death for the same reason that the Jews did.

A REMARKABLE PRODUCTION REGARDING CHRIST AND HIS FOLLOWERS.

"Did you ever see that piece of blank verse that Story the sculptor wrote some years ago about Christ and his followers?" asked a literary man of a Blade reporter. "If you come with me I will give you a copy of it. You see Story is not only a sculptor but has literary talent of no mean order. He, it seems, takes great pleasure in looking over ancient manuscripts, of which Rome is prolific, and as he moves in the most aristocratic circles, he has access to the best libraries in the city. Among the most remarkable productions he found, the most interesting, perhaps, was that of a letter written by a Roman lawyer named Marcus, who visited Jerusalem 25 years after the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. At Jerusalem he became acquainted with a man named Lysius, who was an officer in that city. This Lysius was well acquainted with Christ, and gave Marcus a full description of him. Marcus was so much interested in what he heard about Christ that he carefully noted down what Lysius had told him about Christ and his followers, and sent it to a friend named Calus, in Rome. Story took what Marcus had written and from it gave the world in blank verse, a faithful transcript of what Marcus had written to his friend in Rome. It is certainly a most entertaining production." It begins with a view of Christ as he appeared to Lysius;

"Tall, slender, not erect, a little bent;
Brown arched and dark a big-ridged, lofty head;
Thin temples, veined and delicate, large eyes;
Sad, very serious, seeming as it were
To look beyond you, and when he spoke
Illumed by an inner inspiring light—
At times, too, gleaming with a strange, wild fire
When taunted by the rabble in the streets;
A Jewish face, complexion pale but dark;
Thin, high-set nostrils, quivering constantly;
Long nose, full lips, hands tapering full of power;
His movements nervous: as he walked he seemed
Scarcely to heed the persons whom he passed,
And for the most part gazed upon the ground.
As for his followers, I knew them all—
A strange, mad lot, and full of freaks wild—
John, Peter, James, and Judas, best of all—
All seemed to me good men, without offense—
A little crazed—but who is wholly sane?
They went about and cured the sick and halt,
And gave away their money to the poor,
And all their talk was charity and peace,
Of Christ we thought, and said he was a god,
'Twas harmless madness not deserving death.
What most aroused the wealthy Rabbi's rage
Was that he set the poor against the rich,
And cried that all rich men would go to hell,
And worst of all roundly denounced the priests,
With all their rich phylacteries and robes,—
Said they were hypocrites who made long prayers
And robbed poor widows and devoured their substance,
And were as best but whited sepulchres;
And this it was that brought him to the Cross.
Those who went with him and believed in him
Were mostly dull, uneducated men,
Simple and honest, dazed by what he did,
And misconceiving every word he said.
He led them with a spell-bound awe,
And all his cures they called miracles.
They followed him like sheep where'er he went
With feelings mixed of wonder, fear and love,
Yet I suppose they loved him, though they fled Stricken with fear when we arrested him."

—Selected by L. G. Thomas.

LIVE RIGHTEOUSLY.

Righteousness is justice in its largest sense. Not that justice which is content with refraining from gross wrong towards fellow-creatures. This is, of course, included in righteousness, but the Scripture meaning is more definite and specific than this. To live righteously one must live soberly, for a man who is intemperate in his words, or acts, or habits of life is of necessity wronging his fellow-men. He is making everything bend to his own low purpose. He arrogates the paths of others without scruple, and invades their rights without remorse, so that he may accomplish his cherished object. He acknowledges no claims upon him, and respects no obligations which it is convenient to evade or neglect.

Now, the man who lives soberly will be likely to live righteously. He will do the just and right thing towards all those who are in any way related to him. He will entertain, and, if possible, satisfy every just claim. If it is a claim founded on the simple and far-reaching law of doing to others as he would have them do to him, he will respect it, and endeavor to meet it intelligently and liberally. It is a poor sense of justice which stops at the endeavor to pay debts of money. That man has only begun to live righteously who does his best to keep his accounts square, for there are far higher claims than those of creditors and customers. Religion enforces the teaching of nature when it inculcates that justice which accepts as holy and binding the claim for affection, for respect, for kind offices of sympathy and counsel and courtesy and friendly aid in all the conditions of human life.

The righteous man regardeth the cry of the poor, he admits the poor man's brotherhood and the claim which this makes upon him. He even regards the life of the beast, and will not suffer the rights of the brutes to be infringed without a protest. But in higher spheres this righteousness has its beneficent influence. In the house it bears fruit in kind words and unselfish deeds and self-denials for the good of those who make the tenderest and the least exacting claims. It produces reverence for age, care for the young, a cordial sympathy which eases and lightens the burdens of life, and helps to dissipate the clouds of sorrow. It gives of time and thought and labor and service to the great work of alleviating the miseries and reforming the characters, and supplying the imperfections of humanity. It goes about doing good as Christ did, who developed this idea of justice in his life, that every human being had a claim upon every other for some kind office or helpful word or good gift.

This is the sort of Righteousness that gives evidence in God's sight as well as before men that we are partakers of the grace of salvation. How can any be partakers of this grace unless they bear such fruit? The first result of salvation is gratitude, and asks at once, "What can I do to show my appreciation of that which has been done for me?" "Go and do likewise," is the reply. Go, as Christ who brought this salvation went, and fulfil all righteousness. Go to the poor and supply their wants; go to the sorrowing and give them comfort; go to the sick and cheer them; go to the feeble and sustain them; suffer the little children to come to you and bless them by your kindness and care; go to the sinning and the wretched and lead to the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world, and healeth the broken-hearted. Go to the perishing and tell them of the salvation which in its gracious influence has made you a messenger of good tidings, and thus prove that you have felt its power.

If we would look forward with joy to the appearing of our Master we must "do justice and love mercy;" justice, not in the cold, hard, legal sense of the term, but in the gospel sense, which is interpreted and enforced by the law of love, and be merciful "even as our Father in heaven is merciful."

—Augustine, in New York Observer.

What the Liquor Business Is.

It is a business which every merchant and business man hates and detests.

It is a business which is the standing dread of every mother.

It is a business which is the constant fear of every father.

It is a business which is the terror of every wife.

It is a business which makes ninety per cent. of the business of the criminal courts.

It is a business which makes ninety per cent. of the pauperism for which the tax-payer has to pay.

It is a business which keeps employed an army of policemen in the cities.

It is a business which puts out the fire on the hearth, and condemns wives to hunger and rags.

It is a business which fosters vice for profit, and educates in wickedness for gain.

Drunkenness sows the seed of other vices. It is the dictionary of vice, for it includes every vice.

Drunkenness means peculation, theft, arson, forgery, murder—for it leads to all these crimes.

A Lily out of Black Soil.

Like a lily, pure and white, growing up out of a black bog, was Hezekiah, coming of such a father as Ahaz, and springing up amid such influences as surrounded his early home. Abaz was one of the worst kings of those corrupt times. Even Queen Athaliah had not gone so far as he did in desecrating the Lord's house and planting idolatry in the land. The worship of Moloch, the most dreadful form of human sacrifice, had been established, and Hezekiah had beheld his own brother thrown into the red-hot bosom of this idol. The grossest forms of heathenism had supplanted the pure worship of God, and true religion was well-nigh dead. Yet up out of this blackness springs the lily-king. This example is full of encouragement to young persons living in bad homes, whose hearts long for purity. God can help one to be good anywhere. Out of the worst home a child may grow up into saintly beauty and true worth.—Westminster Teacher.

Youth's Column.

Will You be There.

Beyond this life of hope and fears,
Beyond this world of grief and tears,
There is a region fair;
It knows no change and no decay—
No night, but one unending day:
Oh say, will you be there?

Its glorious gates are closed to sin,
Naught that defiles can enter in;
To me its beauty rare;
Upon that bright eternal shore,
Earth's bitter curse is known no more:
Oh, say, will you be there?

No drooping form, no tearful eye,
No heavy head, no weary sigh,
No pain, no grief, no care;
But joys which mortals may not know,
Like a calm river ever flow!
Oh, say, will you be there?

Our Savior, once a mortal child—
As mortal man, by man reviled,
There many crowns doth wear;
While thousand, thousands swell the strain,
Of glory to the Lamb once slain:
Oh, say, will you be there?

Who shall be there? The lowly here,
All those who serve the Lord with fear,
The world's proud mockery dare;
Who by the Holy Spirit led,
Rejoice the narrow way to tread—
These, all these shall be there.

Those who have learned at Jesus's cross
All earthly gain to count but loss,
So that his love they share;
Who, gazing on the Crucified,
By faith can say, "For me He died,"—
These, these shall all be there.

Will you be there? You shall, you must,
If, failing else, in Christ you trust;
Who did that place prepare;
Still doth his voice sound sweetly, "Come,
I am the way, I'll lead you home;
With me you shall be there."

A Word in Season.

Slang is not wit. Neither is the mis-spelling of words, humor. And we may go even further, and say that the prevalent disposition to present everything serious as well as trifling, in a ridiculous light, is also bad as a matter of morals. Yet there are many people whose sole effort in writing and in conversation appears to be in the direction of what they consider "smartness." That constant trifling with the realities of human life; with the serious work of human kind; with the events of the day, and with the facts of history; with the character of the living, and with the memory of the dead, is lowering the tone not only of literature, but of morals. The world itself is not a huge joke, however some people may so affect to consider it.—Telescope.

A Talk to Boys.

We are going to draw a picture of the kind of a boy we should like to be, and trust that some of our readers may find some traces of their own characters, or at least some answer of their own wishes and hopes.

If we were a boy, we should like to be a hard-working boy. All success waits on that. Only fools and gamblers trust to "luck." We will never come to much unless the habit of hard work teaches us the right use of our faculties. As all boys are not especially bright boys, as the rank and file are average sort of boys, with ordinary brains and opportunities, it will be a good thing if we can realize how far hard work will go to make good the lack of gifts and good chances. Sir Walter Scott was called the blockhead of the school at Edinburgh. Perhaps calling him that waked him up, and he put himself to hard work. Isaac Newton was the dull boy at school. The "smart" boy one day kicked this dull boy. He went to work and never let up till the stars were at his feet. Oliver Goldsmith was so stupid that the person who taught him the alphabet was thought to have worked a miracle. So he did. He waked up the boy who could by and by astonish the world by writing "The Traveler" and "The Deserted Village." A friend said to us, pathetically, not long since, "I used to long for a library. Now I have it, and cannot use it." But hard work will give us the use of everything that comes to us.

Again, if we were a boy, we should want to be a thorough boy. If it were only to sharpen a pencil, we would want to bring it to the very best point—not for fine writing, but for the self-discipline. We are all well enough endowed if we only know how to use the endowments. A spirit that is self-exacting, and will permit no slight in any kind of work, will soon get the habit of bringing large and difficult understandings to own its mastery.

Again, we should want to be an obedient boy. Only those are fit to command who have learned how to obey. Grant, after the battle of Shiloh, was disgraced and ordered to report, each morning, to an officer his inferior in worth. He touched his hat to that subaltern every morning as loyally, and waited for his commands as deferentially, as if he were standing before the commander-in-chief. That spirit helped to make him an irresistible commander. The boys who begin life by throwing out flags of independence before they are fairly out of the nursery, are not likely to come to anything. If we were looking for a captain, we should hunt for him among the boys who never disobeyed their mothers.

If we were a boy, we should want to be a boy with a purpose. We should not loaf or drift; we should set our rudder; we should select some aim worthy of our best energies, and then we should stick to it, as Carlyle would say, "work it like Hercules." There will be people who will lecture you against ambition; but the boy without a good ambition will be likely to be the boy without a good record. And only high things are worth living at. As Emerson said, "Hitch your wagon to a star."

We should also like to be a truthful boy. Truth is a cardinal virtue. In Hebrew it means firmness; in Greek it means that which cannot be hid. A boy at once open and firm commands universal respect. And when business men are looking for a boy whom they can advance in their service, their most important question concerns truthfulness. It makes a good foundation. He can build high who has that for a corner-stone.

And, then, as including everything else, if we were a boy, we should like to be a Christian boy. We should be quite sure it would help us in the battle of life. As we look around among the successful men of our acquaintance, we do not know of one whose success was not helped by the Christian principles. But we know of very many failures who are failures because they have no Christian principles.

Great things are going to be done in the life-time of the boys; and if we were a boy we should want to get the best tools for helping to do them. Among them are the things we have named, and, however small our gifts or our privileges, we should feel pretty sure that our small gifts wrought out by hard work and discipline, directed to a great aim and uplifted by a true Christian spirit, would give us a good and successful standing in the lists of the battle.—The Interior.

Grimsey.

Grimsey, a small island twenty-two miles due north of Iceland, is inhabited by eighty-eight human beings, debarred from all communication with the mainland, excepting once or twice every year, when, at a great risk, the natives contrive to visit the mainland in their small open boats.

The pastor of the island, M. Pjetur Guðmundsson, has for many years been engaged in exceedingly careful meteorological observations on behalf of the Meteorological Institute of Copenhagen. This most worthy gentleman, living here in conspicuous poverty, like a hermit divorced from the world, though he has the comfort of a good wife to be thankful for, is not only regarded as a father by his primitive congregation, but enjoys, moreover, the reputation of being in the front rank among sacred poets in modern Iceland.

The inhabitants derive their livelihood for the most part from bird-catching, nest-robbing, and deep-sea fisheries. The precipices that form the eastern face of the island are crowded with myriads of various kinds of sea-fowl. On every ledge the birds are seen thickly packed together; the rocks are white with guano, or green-tufted with scurvy-grass; here everything is in ceaseless movement, stir, and flutter, accompanied by a myriad-voiced concert from screamers on the wing, from chatters on domestic affairs in the rock-ledges, and from brawlers at the parliament of love out at sea, the surface of which beneath the rocks is literally thatched at this time of the year with the wooing multitudes of this happy commonwealth. If the peace is broken by a stone rolled over the precipice or by the report of a gun-shot, the air is suddenly darkened by the rising clouds of the disturbed birds, which, viewed from the rocks, resemble what might be taken for a gigantic swarm of bees or midges.

The method adopted for collecting eggs is the following: Provided with a strong rope, some nine or ten stalwart men go to the precipice, where it is some three hundred feet high, and one of the number volunteers or is singled out by the rest for the perilous sig, that is, "sink" or "drop," over the edge of the rocks. Round his thighs and waist, thickly padded generally with bags stuffed with feathers or hay, the sigamadr, "sinkman" or "dropman," adjusts the rope in such a manner that he may hang, when dropped, in a sitting posture. He is also dressed in a wide smock or sack of coarse sailcloth open at the breast, and tied round the waist with a belt, into the [illegible] of which he slips the [illegible] the capacity of the [illegible] commodation to [illegible] one hundred and [illegible] In one hand [illegible] the result of his [illegible] the purpose of this [illegible] sack is accomplished, [illegible] the dropman is hauled up [illegible] comrades. This, as may be imagined, is a most dangerous [illegible] taking, and many a life has been lost over it in Grimsey from accidents occurring to the rope.

For the pursuit of the fishery, the island possesses small open boats, in which the men will venture out as far as four-to six miles, cod-fishing; but this is a most hazardous industry, owing both to the sudden manner in which the sea will rise, sometimes even a long time in advance of travelling storms, and to the difficulty of effecting a landing on the harborless island.

Now and then the monotony of the life of the inhabitants is broken by visits from foreigners, mostly Icelandic shark-fishers, or English or French fishermen.

Of domestic animals the islanders now possess only a few sheep. Formerly there were five cows in the island; but the hard winter of 1860 necessitated their extermination, and since that time, for twenty-four years, the people have had to do without a cow! Of horses there are only two at present (1884) in the island! Strange to say, the health of the people seems on the whole to bear a fair comparison with more favored localities. Scurvy, which formerly was very prevalent, has now almost disappeared, as has also a disease peculiar to children, which in the form of spasm or convulsive fit, used to be very fatal to infant life in former years.

Inexpressibly solitary must be the life of these people in winter, shut out from all communication with the outer world, and having in view, as far as the eye can reach, nothing but arctic ice. The existence of generation after generation here seems to be spent in one continuous and unavailing arctic expedition. The only diversion afforded by nature consists in the shifting colors of the flickering aurora borealis, in the twinkling of the stars in the heavens, and the fantastic forms of wandering icebergs. No wonder that such surroundings should serve to produce a quiet, serious, devout, and down-hearted race, in which respect the Grimsey men may, perhaps, be said to constitute a typical group among their compatriots. However, to dispel the heavy tedium of the long winter days, they seek their amusements in the reading of the Sagas, in chess-playing, and in such mild dissipations at mutual entertainments at Christmas-time as their slender poverty will allow.—Chamber's Journal.

LATEST dispatches show that the British forces have met with the most complete success in Burmah; and that an armistice has been concluded between Servia and Bulgaria. For details see News Column. The course that may be taken by the Great Powers is the important question.

TYPOGRAPHICAL errors are very annoying to the writer of an article, and no less so to the Editor. At the close of Prof. Gardner's article last week read, "For faith is a hypostasis," instead of "Faith is a hypothesis," as printed. The error was not detected till the paper was nearly all through the press. We notice errors in other papers. For instance in a late Boston Journal we read—speaking of Jesus—[illegible] him afresh in the prisons [illegible] brew brethren," instead of [illegible]," as it should be.

IN enlarging our list for the coming year, some of our subscribers can induce some friend or acquaintance to subscribe. Others can pay, and have it sent to some friend, or to some one too poor to pay. The Editor pledges himself to pay full price for three names he will designate by the first of the year now approximately near. Our income is not large, but we will help in sustaining our paper, and, furthermore, we will expend considerable more in procuring some of the best journals we can—both from abroad and at home—to enable us to keep the readers of THE RESTITUTION fully posted in regard to all passing events in current history.

ON the date of the issue of our last number, Nov. 26, the death of two distinguished individuals occurred. King Alfonso of Spain, died at Madrid, at 8:45 A. M., at the age of nearly 28 years. He was born Nov. 28, 1857, and was proclaimed king Dec. 30, 1874. His wife, Queen Christina, has taken the oath of allegiance to the Constitution as Regent. The Princes Mercedes, the five-year-old daughter of the deceased King, will be Queen under the regency of her mother. At about five P. M. on the same day, Nov. 25, Thomas A. Hendricks, Vice President of the United States, died very suddenly at his home in Indianapolis, Ind., of paralysis of the heart. He was born near Zanesville, Ohio, Sept. 7, 1819. The current year, now so near its close, has been marked by the death of quite a number of persons who have occupied important positions in the world.

CURRENT HISTORY.

WHAT THE BURMESE WAR MEANS.

It is reported by cable that King Theebaw has become thoroughly frightened at the rapid advance of the British forces and is hastily packing up his household goods for flight to China. We have been asked to explain what this Burmese trouble means, how it originated and how it is likely to end. The story is a simple one and also a short one. The Bombay-Burmah Corporation leased large tracts of land from the Burmese Government and began to cut timber for exportation. The business became very extended under English enterprise, and very profitable. King Theebaw, who also has an eye to the main chance, came to the conclusion that the royal income from these leased lands was inadequate. He consulted his avarice only, and forgetful of the fact that Burmah has already had two wars with the British at great cost to herself of money and territory, and that another war would probably have the same result, demanded an extra twenty lacs of rupees, of about a million dollars, adding a very ugly threat unless the cash was at once forthcoming. To pay this large sum would seriously hamper, if not entirely ruin the corporation. The aghast lesseeholders reported to the Viceroy of India, who in turn consulted with the home Government, and in consequence a letter was sent to King Theebaw asking three questions and demanding an immediate answer: Whether he would suspend his decree until the matter was amicably settled; whether he would submit the matter to arbitration, and whether he would abide by the arbitrator's decision. King Theebaw at once grew insolent and England at once grew indignant. The gunboats on the Irrawaddy River headed for Mandalay, the King's residence. On their way they have shelled Minhla, and it is reported that the town caught fire and was burned up. On next Tuesday morning they will come to anchor off Mandalay, but King Theebaw, who is as cowardly as he is insolent, will not probably be there to offer the hospitalities of the occasion. A cruel wretch, he dares not face fire. England may annex Burmah or she may not. That will be decided by her opinion of the value of the property.—Herald, Nov. 21.

BULGARIA AND SERVIA.

The arrest of the Servian march at Slivnitza, mainly, it would appear, owing to the skill and courage of Prince Alexander, has given a new aspect of affairs in the Balkans. The Servians are much depressed and the Bulgarians correspondingly elated. What will happen next it is hard to say, but if the Servians cannot hold their own, we shall probably see Austria's hand in their affairs a little more distinctly. Greece, too, appears to be waiting simply to see "how the cat jumps," before taking a hand in the fray, the whole of her forces being in the meantime under arms, and her finances going to pieces as rapidly as possible. Whether she will try her luck on land or sea now seems somewhat doubtful. She claims all of Thessaly that was not given her by the Treaty of Berlin, and as much of Macedonia as she can get hold of, the claim being based, as that of Servia is, on ethnological, or rather linguistic, grounds; that is, she, like all the small States of the Balkan Peninsula, claims all territory occupied by people speaking her language. How much of Macedonia this would give her of course nobody knows, as the various races are curiously intermixed in the whole of what was to the beginning of this century Turkey in Europe. The capacity of these races in that part of the world, for living side by side for ages, without intermingling, and without losing their respective tongues, or manners, or even costume, is something of which we have in the Western world no idea. If Servia is now badly beaten and compelled to desist from her aggression, and peace is made without the Greeks having struck a blow, it will be a dreadful mortification for them, as this will be the second time since 1876 that they have fretted and fumed and armed without hurting anybody.—Evening Post, Nov. 21.

PAPAL IDOLS.

In my recent extensive tour through Southern and Central Italy I was interested in nothing more than in the superstitious practices preserved in provincial cities or out-of-way places much better than in Rome itself. No religious procession, no carrying about of idols, no exposition of miracle-working bones, is permitted in the city of Rome. About three months ago the Prefect forbade even the carrying in procession of the viaticum to the sick. This was the last relic of religious pomp on the streets remaining to the Papists. The Pontiff is a voluntary prisoner, and his magnificent gilt chariot is idle in the stable of the Vatican. The cardinals hide themselves with their laces and scarlet dresses on the broad back seats of their closed carriages that are drawn by black horses, in sign of mourning, but the priest on his mission to the dying arrayed himself in white silk and gold embroidered vestments, and, carrying the wafer in his hand, walked beneath the white silk gold-fringed umbrella and was followed by a devout procession of men and women bearing lighted candles. Now even that is ended, and whoever would see Papal idolatry and superstition in their ancient forms must go, as I have done, to the country or the smaller cities. Here the noxious night flower blooms still, as in the long night of centuries when its pestilential fragrance poisoned the life of Italy.

Since the railroads have spread like a network over this beautiful land traveling is divested of discomfort. There is little dust and noise on the cars, no coal smoke and no long stretches of tiresome road unless you choose.

Cities two or three thousand years old, rich in monumental churches, arches and columns, and adorned with lovely modern gardens and villas, are within an hour's distance of each other. No more charming road can be imagined than that which connects the Mediterranean and the Adriatic, beginning at Rome and crossing the Apennines at one of the highest points. Our route was by this mountain road to the Adriatic, along the shore of that sea from Chieti to the Ravenna, back through the Apennines again from Ravenna and Bologna to Florence, then Pisa and Rome. Thus we touched both of the Italian seas and crossed the Apennines twice.

Nature could not be more lovely than in these green secluded valleys, where the grass has a richer hue of green, and the berries of the hawthorn hedges tinge the landscape with a brilliant red; where in one valley there are olive trees, and just on the other side of the noisy, fearful tunnel there are none; where in May the violets fill the straightened valley with their rich odor; or where the broad, level mountain table-lands stretch away almost out of sight. There are endless gardens without fence or hedge, with the bunches of purple grapes on low branches almost touching the ground, and with yellow melons and corn. There are few trees except a line of poplars or willows by the streams, and here and there the farmers, men and women, are looking at their fields or heading to the spade.

Not less beautiful, but of another character, is the ride along the Adriatic, with the sea murmuring on one side and almost washing the rails, while villas, gardens, fields, historic cities and towns, frowning castles and spires of cathedrals are on the other. But man is the lord of nature, and what he does and is interests the observer more than the beauties of plain, or mountain, or sea. I venture to say that in no country on the earth is the study of human nature more absorbing at this time than in Italy. The rapid transformation of government in a few years; the scornful flinging away by the majority, of the rusty, broken chains of Papistry, the uncertainty and fear of any other form of religion—since that has proved only a form; the strong desire for truth and justice and mercy; the hidden, unconscious, stream of true religion in many hearts, are worthy of attention. But if the golden light of morning has touched the mountain-tops—as the sunlight touches the bare, gray peak of the "Great Rock," the highest mountain of the Apennines—darkness of the night is still in the low valleys. At Alatri, an ancient city in the Apennines, celebrated for its magnificent remains of Cyclopean walls, there is a life-size image upon the high altar of the cathedral, of Pope Sextus I., who was born there. That figure, dressed in Pontifical robes and seated on a throne, is virtually adored by the population of Alatri. They second the ancient stair-way made of rocks that seem fragments of mountains, and on the high level ground, enclosed by the old walls, find their cathedral. It is the apex of a high mountain, around which the town is built, and San Sisto is the deity of the place. At Subiaco, not many miles distant, another man—dead many centuries ago—is adored. The cell of San Benedetto, cut in the rock, with a reclining statute of the founder of monasticism dimly visible, is the holy place of that town; and as at Alatri no other name is uttered with reverence but that of San Sisto, so at Subiaco no other is heard but San Benedetto. In small country towns statues of the Madonna are frequently carried about; long processions of priests and people preceding and following them. One of these I saw in Tivoli, eighteen miles from Rome. A leader wearing a black three-cornered hat and a large red cloak, with a cape, over a suit of red clothes, walked alone and held a wand of office in his hand. Men and boys followed in costumes of faded red paper-muslin with a black cord at the waist and no cap. Then three strong young men wearing the same costumes, each with a leather strap around the waist and a leather receptacle in which, by turns, they rested a heavy cross, four or five feet high, formed of thick branches of a tree. A master of ceremonies followed, who, with a long stick, kept the couples at equal and long distances from each other. A large crucifix with canopy of faded gold cloth over it was borne along, but not one of the throng of peasantry and citizens in the streets knelt to that; all the devotion of priests in their robes chanting psalms and of the people was reserved for a gigantic statue of the Madonna, which was borne by four grave diggers still attired in their black muslin costumes.

A blue silk mantle covered the crowned head, and fell down to the feet behind, and the pink silk dress was studded with silver stars. The image stood within a temple with four columns; twelve lighted candles were at its feet; a constellation of stars behind its head, and the Child in its arms. As it came in sight the peasant women threw their aprons or handkerchiefs over their heads and knelt in profound devotion. Last of all followed a crowd of women and children singing psalms in unison, all in praise of this Madonna, which had been on a visit of eight days to another church and was returning to its place in the cathedral. Similar scenes in other towns I must reserve for another letter. — Sofia Bompiani, in N. Y. Observer.

The Seething Nationalities.

In the course of his Friday evening talk, Nov. 20, Dr. Talmage said:

A New England paper of this morning in its editorial says: "Altogether it looks as though the blood Dr. Talmage saw on the European moon last summer was not due to any inflammation of the optic nerve." You see that my sanguinary anticipations are being realized. At last the European war opens. The clouds have been gathering for a year, but within the past week the lightning bolts have sped. As the clash between Forts Moultrie and Sumter plunged this American Continent into the strife which had for forty years been fomenting, so the battle between Servia and Bulgaria this week begins the slaughter European. Servia victorious in one battle and defeated in the next, and so the shuttle will swing to and fro, weaving the deep scarlet robe of continental suffering that shall wrap Turkey, and Russia, and Germany, and England, and France, and other nationalities in its horrid folds. They may hold as many conferences as they please, and may make new treaties and re-establish old ones, and the Lord Salisburys, and the Bismarcks, and the Russian and Turkish diplomatists, with unpronounceable names, may put their ingenuity together, but there is so much bad blood over there that nothing but the phlebotomy of the sword can let it out.

The war-dance of nations has begun, but he who attempts to foretell when it will close would be a rash prophet. What a pity it is that nearly 1,900 years after the song of peace and good-will was chanted about Bethlehem the world has nothing to prescribe for the settlement of international strife but such wholesale cut-throatery!

The fact that this Transatlantic Armageddon will rouse our American commerce and augment the tide of financial prosperity already setting in, and put hard times behind all classes of our population, cannot keep merciful and right-minded people from deploring a contest which is to fill Europe with the groan of hospitals and the piercing cry of widowhood and orphanage. No doubt Europe will want all the bayonets we can manufacture, and all our harvests, because they will have no time either to plow or sow or reap, and our factories that run only half time will run day and night, and all our unemployed people will be called into service, at large wages, and we shall have all the commercial prosperities that we had during our own civil war, without any of the carnage. Still it is at a sickening cost to others, and that is a fiendish spirit which would be gleeful at foreign desolations, though they resulted in the reconstruction of our national finance. It never pays for one Continent to deride another, because our own turn might come next.

Many of the European nations rejoiced at our internecine strife of 1861. We were for four years the butt of foreign aristocracies. They cried out in the words of Lord John Russell: "See the bubble-bursting nationality." They said, "Going to pieces as we prophesied; have stuck together longer than we expected. What a farce Republican and Democratic form of government!" Multitudes in Europe got rich on our misfortunes. The more we writhed under our calamities the better they liked it. But our government did not go to pieces, and it is stronger now than it was before the war.

Now, the turn of our Transatlantic neighbors has come, and they are going to be in an awful plight. But let us be more Christian toward them than they were toward us, and instead of exulting over their disaster, let us be sympathetic and pray for their speedy deliverance. The settlement of that quarrel is far beyond the capacity of human politics, and only the God of nations can guide or arrest it. Alas! that ever since Cain slew Abel the blood of contest has trickled down the cheek of the world!

All statistics fail to give any idea of the waste of life and treasure. When Napoleon marched up toward Moscow he burned every house for one hundred and fifty miles. The exorbitant and exhausting taxes of Great Britain and the United States are for the most part resultant from conflicts. When we complain about our taxes we charge the fault upon this administration or that administration, upon this line of policy, or that line of policy, but it is a simple fact that today we are paying for the shot, and the shell, and the ambulances, and exploded fortresses, and the broken bones, and the digging of the grave-trenches, and for four years of national martyrdom. Edmund Burke estimated that the nations of this world had expended $35,000,000,000 in war. But he did his alphering before our great American and European wars were plunged into. Carefal statistics estimate that thirty-five times the present population of the earth have fallen in battle, and yet the grave-trenches are not satisfied, and yet, by the jealousies of potentates and under the inspiration of Satan, the widest and most terrific war of the centuries seems this moment opening.

THE WARNING VOICE.

Give them warning from me.—Ezek. iii: 17.

SIN'S FATAL FASCINATION.

When once a man has done a wrong thing it has an awful power of attracting him and making him to hunger to do it again. Every evil that I do may, indeed, for a moment create in me a revulsion of conscience, but stronger than that revulsion of conscience it exercises a fascination over me which it is hard to resist. It is a great deal easier to fool a man that has never done a wrong thing than to fool a man that has only done it once. If the wall of the dyke is sound it will keep the water out, but if there is the tiniest hole in it, it will all come in. So the evil that you do asserts its power over you, it has a terse, longing desire after you, and it gets you into its clutches.

Beware of the first evils, for as sure as you are living, the first step taken will make the second seem to become necessary. The first drop will be followed by a bigger second, and the second, at a shorter interval, by a more copious third, until the drops become a shower, and a shower becomes a deluge. The course of evil is ever wider and deeper, and more tumultuous. The little sins get in at the window and open the front door for the big housebreakers. One smooths the path for the other. All sin has an awful power of perpetuating and increasing itself. As the prophet says in his awful vision of the doleful creatures that make their sport in the desolate city, "None of them shall want her mate. The wild beasts of the desert shall meet with the beasts of the islands." Every sin tells upon character, and makes the repetition of itself more and more easy. "None is barren among them." And all sin is linked together in a slimy tangle, like a field of sea-weed, so that the man once caught in its ooxy fingers is almost sure to drown.—Dr. Alexander Maclaren.

THE PERILOUS SALOON.

The Christian Home, an able monthly Journal published in the interest of Gospel temperance and, of the New York Christian Home for Intemperate Men, of which Rev. D. Stuart Dodge is president, says: "Dr. Holland said that 'the way not to have any more vessels is not to grow any more vessels.' How many a young man learned his first lesson of dishonesty, which finally led to a bold, criminal life, in a 'first-class' saloon—in one of those 'high-licensed' halls which is the primary school to the Bowery street dives? How many a once happy home has been made desolate by the saloons where drinks are 50 cents a glass? A hundred times more than by the saloon that 'high-license' men call 'glu-holus.' Ask a thousand mothers and wives in this city where their sons and husbands were taught their terrible lessons of cruelty and desertion, and the answer will be at the famous cafe of N—S. And yet there is a certain class, and by no means small in number, standing high in the scale of respectability and social position, with an A 1 mark opposite their names on the church records, who will sanction such dens of human destruction if the proprietors of the same will pay a license of $500. The legislature of the Empire State will be petitioned to endorse this measure. The Governor of this great commonwealth will be asked to give its approval. It will be placed on the statute of the State. Judges, attorneys, policemen, the young man who are preparing for a drunkard's grave, heart-broken wives and mothers, aged fathers and darling sisters will pass these halls of infamy and say to themselves, A church temperance society at least sanctioned these places and advocated these high licenses.' And the poor, tottering, confirmed drunkard will shuffle by, and as he looks at the gilded sign, the marble step, the delicate glasses, and the richly-dressed patrons moving in and out without shame or any compunction of conscience, this this poor outcast will move on and say to himself, I took my drinks there for many a day, and now I have been refused admittance; but never mind, I can get just as good rum at Mike C—'s as at this high-toned affair. Now Mike keeps a saloon on Water street, but as he pays as high a license as that Broadway den he ought most certainly to be classed with its famous proprietor, and he should have the same privileges."

AT JESUS'S FEET.

"As many as touched him were made [illegible]."
—Mark. vi. 56.

At Jesus' feet I took my place;
I touched his garment's hem:
A helpless child in need of grace
My Lord will not condemn.

I have no hope but in his love:
His promise is my plea:
I give myself to him who strove
Even unto death for me.

I only ask that I may know
What he would have me do,
That my obedient life may show
The grace that lives me through.

I've nothing, Lord, to offer thee
But this weak heart of mine:
Oh, take it, Lord, and let it be Thine own, forevermore thine.
—Thomas McKellar.

THE WORK OF FAITH.

This work, when it is genuine, unites the believer directly to Christ. No other connection is saving. There cannot be saving faith in Christ through a church, or a priest, or a moral life or an outward ordinance, or by descent from Christian parents, or by self-righteous works, or by any system of means. In order to the passage of electricity it is necessary that the wires be joined to each other. If they are tied with a string or linked with a chain of lead, or fastened each to a bit of wood, or united with any non-conducting substance between, the current will not flow from the jar further than the end of one wire. And so must faith take hold of Christ personally before it can receive the electric current which flows from him to renew and vitalize the soul.

Physicians are sometimes called upon to unite a finger that has been cut off or that hangs only by a shred of flesh. They bring the wounded parts close together, and bind them so that the union shall be most intimate, and the warmth and life of the body flows into the part which is thus connected, and healing processes go forward. If the wounded parts are covered with a plaster, or wound with rags, and then tied together, there would be no union. The severed portion would soon shrivel and decay; and so must the soul of the believer be united to Christ by a faith which cleaves to the Redeemer with nothing between, in order that Christ's blood may circulate through it. "We are members of his body, and of his flesh, and of his bones," says Paul, writing to the Ephesians, and it is the work of faith thus to unite us to the Savior.

This work of faith, the bond of everlasting union to God in Christ, is a precious thing for the redeemed to remember in their own experience.

"What blissful hours I once enjoyed,
How sweet their memory still!"

sings the Christian poet. Even when doubts and darkness have clouded his spiritual horizon, he remembers with gratitude the days of brightness, and the years of the right hand of the Lord, and there are many Christians who, when removed from Christian company, and in changed scenes, can refer with refreshment and delight to the work of faith which God has wrought in others for whom they have labored. It is a root of joy going down deep, and it will nourish Christian life in a very dry and thirsty time, for it draws water out of the deep wells of salvation.—New York Observer.

GOD IS LOVE.

This is the difference between substance and attribute. It is nowhere said or predicted of God that he is Justice; for God is more than Justice, life is just. That is to say something that is true of God; but it is not to say all that is true of God. So it is not said anywhere that he is Goodness, but that he is good. He is holy, but not Holiness. He is not Power, but power belongeth to him. None of the attributes of God fully describe him or set him forth to us. But this one word does. God is love. That tells the whole story of God. Love is the substance that lies back of all things that are true of God. This is the sublime-est combination of three words ever put together in any language, and makes revelation of the most gracious and glorious truths in the universe. With this definition the believer knows far more of God than the materialist does of matter. The scientist cannot tell you what matter is. He can tell you some things about matter. He can tell you that matter is something which has color, density, extension, and so forth; but he has not by this told you what matter is. Color is not matter. Density is not matter. Extension is not matter. These are but qualities. What matter is, or what is that unknown something which lies back of, and in which all these and other qualities inhere, is totally unknown to the wisest of men. But the believer can tell you what God is back of all its attributes. He is love, pure and simple. All his attributes are only so many different manifestations of his nature, or of love. Love is the sum of all the attributes. If you look out into the day, when the sun is at meridian, and one should ask you what is the color of light, you would answer, "Why, light is white." Or, more strictly speaking, it is colorless, or in the language of the Scriptures, there is no darkness in it all. So it seems to the natural eye, unaided by any mechanical appliance by which light is analyzed. But if I should give you a bit of three-cornered glass, of a prism, and bid you look at the sunlight through that simple instrument, you would exclaim: "Why, there are many colors in light. There is a red and blue and yellow; in fact, all the hues of the rainbow." Well, these colors are the attributes, so to speak, of light; but light itself is colorless.

It is even so with the love of God. As the love comes in contact with substances outside of itself, it takes on color, or is manifested in different attributes. In other words, the attributes of God are but colors proceeding from his love, when in action. But love itself is not an attribute, but rather the sum of all the attributes.—Geo. F. Pentecost, in the Independent.

Selections.

The Called and the Chosen.—The substance of two Bible Readings delivered at Exeter Hall, London.

I will bring this reading to a close by calling your attention to a few passages of Scripture which illustrate, and to my mind, perfectly prove my position, viz., that the "chosen" are a class of pre-eminent Christians in distinction from the "called."

1. The high calling. In Phil. iii. 13, 14, Paul declares: "Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded." It is perfectly clear that the apostle was not striving after salvation. This he had. But there was something more than being saved. There was a "high calling,"—a pre-eminence in the Christian life and service to which special rich and free rewards were attached. Toward the mark for these prizes of the high calling this devoted man was bending every one of his spiritual powers. Moreover, he calls upon all his fellow Christians, who have a mind to step out of the common rank of the mere possessors of salvation, to enter with him in his race and struggle for the higher rank. Those winning the prize of the high calling are the same as "chosen ones." It is not our purpose to speak at any length upon the subject of the prizes and rewards of the Christian life. It is manifest, however, that God has chosen out of his free and electing love to set certain distinguished prizes before the spiritual eyes of his people and urge them by those incentives to press into the "high calling." "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."—Rev. ii. 10. Now this is something more than the gift of eternal life which comes to every believer. It is an added something to those who are especially faithful in their service and testimony for Jesus—the martyr's reward. I do not mean for those only who die, but for those who "count not their lives dear unto themselves" in comparison with faithfulness to Christ; the true and faithful witness and servants of our Lord. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried (proves himself to be choice), he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him."—Jas. i. 23. "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."—Rev. iii. 11. "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord will give me at that day."—1 Tim. iv. 8. "And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear he will give thee a crown of glory that fadeth not away."—1 Peter v. 4. These are not crowns of lordship, but the stephanos, the laurel crowns given to the victors or to those worthy of special honor. The chosen ones shall wear such crowns in glory and cast them down at the feet of their Lord in the day of triumph. Rev. iv. 10. Let no man deceive you; unless you move up out of the ranks of the merely "called" into the ranks of the "chosen," it will not be yours to wear a crown of glory or to have one to cast at the feet of thy Lord in that day. It will be yours to see, and, without doubt, rejoice in the triumph and honors of the chosen, but not to share them otherwise. This truth is worthy your most serious consideration.

2. Concerning the danger of being a castaway. There is a passage of Scripture (1 Cor. ix. 24, 27, which has been the subject of much contention among commentators, and more among simpler Christians. It has bothered the advocates of the false doctrine of election and been a stronghold of the advocates of the equally false doctrine of apostasy, "falling from grace." Both Arminian and Calvinist have stumbled over it. But keeping in mind the difference between the called and the chosen, with a very simple attention to the context, the passage is not only luminous but full of magnificent stimulus to those who are striving for the high calling. Let me quote it in full: "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible. I therefore so run, not as uncertainly, so fight I, not as one that beateth the air; but I keep my body under and bring it into subjection, lest by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should become a castaway." The passage, as I have said, has seemed to be a difficult one, simply because we have held the Calvinistic faith; for, according to the face of it, it appears to teach that the apostle was struggling with might and main for salvation, while at the same time he expresses the fear that it was possible after all that he might prove a castaway. But he is not talking about salvation, nor of the possibility of a true Christian becoming an outcast from God's face. It will be seen, if you look carefully at the whole matter, that he is speaking of "prizes," and not of salvation, as the object of so great an endeavor. He is not speaking to unconverted men, exhorting them to enter the race for salvation, but to Christians who have entered or ought to enter the race or contest for the prize. What the prize is we may be sure from a remembrance of his word to the Philippians, already considered. It is the "prize of the high calling of God." The fear of being a castaway is not the fear of being a lost soul at the end of the race, but the fear of being ruled out from receiving the prize by being so far behind, or by contending for it in some unlawful way. If we bear in mind that it is the prize of the "high calling" here spoken of, and not the prize of salvation, then the whole text becomes luminous and full of suggestion. It fits exactly into the teaching of the Savior as to the "choice ones," as in distinction from the merely called. You will notice that the apostle in the first part of the chapter is urging the Corinthians against a too large indulgence of what may be called Christian liberty, and cites his own practice of self-denial in things which are lawful to him, that he might win a reward, or something better and higher than the thing which he voluntarily gave up, notably, wages for preaching the gospel. He was willing to forego his lawful hire, that by preaching the gospel without charge he might the more surely win men. Then he cites the example of the athlete who voluntarily surrenders many of the delights of the appetite which are lawful in themselves, in order to keep his flesh down, so that he may the better run for the prize. First, he states a contrast. In an earthly race only one can win. "So run that ye may win." So do you run for the heavenly prize as the man runs who wins the earthly one. Imitate his self-denial, and put forth the same intense earnestness. If it is worth the while of an athlete contending for a laurel wreath to exercise temperance and self-denial, how much more is it worth the while of a Christian to keep his body—that is, the flesh, the carnal mind—under, in order that he may become an "elect" soul, one who has run and won the prize of the high calling. For himself he says he is determined to win the prize, and so he runs and so he fights. "Not as uncertainly," for he knows what his goal is and has clearly defined ideas and purposes with reference to it, and his motive is certain. "Not as one that beats the air," as though he were boxing with an imaginary opponent, but he strikes at his lower nature—the flesh that is in him. If a selfish desire come to the front. If carnal ease suggests itself, "he brings it into subjection," he bruises it—smites it down. "What I exhort you to do I am doing myself, for it would be a shame and a humiliation for me, at the end, to be exposed as one who was only running in pretence and not in fact, and be rejected from receiving the prize." Himself was a candidate for the "election," and urging others to seek the high calling, he set them an example and showed the way to "obtain." Alas, how few are thus setting their hearts on this heavenly prize—who are willing to forego things abstractly lawful for the sake of obtaining by voluntary choice an election to higher and better things which God holds out as prizes to those who have chosen his choice.

3. Concerning the necessity of making our election sure. In 2 Peter i. 10, the apostle exhorts his brethren to make their "calling and election sure." Now if election was a thing that God had eternally fixed as to each individual saved, it were the wildest folly for us or you to strive to make it sure, for in that case we have nothing to do with it. It would be, as Augustine says, to try to make our redemption sure, which only Christ can do and has done. But let us look at the suggestive passage. In verse four we are told of "the exceeding great and precious promises" through which we have escaped the corruptions which are in the world through lust." So far, so good. That is salvation away from gross and dominating sin; but this is not enough; there is more for the Christian than a mere escape from the world and its lusts and corruptions. There is a glory of heavenly character to be built up, and there is a splendor of spiritual activity and fruit-bearing to be developed; hence his exhortation: "And beside (this) giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." Now notice: "For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be idle or unfruitful in the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins. Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things ye shall never fall: for so an inheritance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." It is impossible to read with any care this beautiful passage of Scripture without noting two things. First, that there are two distinct types of life brought before us. The Christian who stops on the threshold of salvation, and failing to go on to higher and better things, becomes blind to heavenly possessions and lives a mere saved worldling. The Christian who, not contented alone with making his calling (salvation) sure, presses forward to make sure of his election—that is, his pre-eminence in character, service, fruit-bearing. Such a one is promised success in three things on earth, viz: an unbuilded and fully rounded Christian development, a holy activity in service, and an abundant harvest of fruit; and in the world to come an "abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of Christ." Second, that here the two words with which we began our reading, viz: "called" and "chosen," are brought together again in such significant juxtaposition as to leave no doubt that they are used to define two types of life. It is not enough, says the apostle, to make your calling sure; you should press on and make your election sure, or become a "choice one" as well.

Abraham and Lot must have been in the mind of Peter, as being the types of the two manner of lives which he describes here. Lot was that type of a Christian who, forgetting that he was redeemed from the lusts of the world, got into Sodom and made for the things of this world. Blinded by the things that were near, he became, as it were, near-sighted as to heavenly things. He saw the well watered plain, and he chose it, pitching his tent toward Sodom, no doubt not meaning to go into Sodom; then he saw the social and political advantages of a residence in this city of the world, and he went in, accepted office at the hands of his new friends, and married his daughters to Sodomites. Alas, we know what his fate was. During his residence there, mixed up with the world as he was, he "vexed his righteous soul." And in the end, instead of having "an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom," he was only saved from Sodom as one "Pulled out of the fire." (Jude. 23.) He made his calling sure, through faith, and was a righteous man, but he lost his election through worldly ambition and love of gain. There are hosts of just such near-sighted Christians in the world. Alas, for them. On the other hand, Abraham saw clearly from the beginning that as the friend of God and heir of heaven he had nothing to do with the profits, spoils and advantages of Sodom. Therefore he refused to accept "even from a thread to a shoe latchet" from the kingdom of Sodom, lest it should be said that the king of Sodom had made "the friend of God rich." He had other riches and saw other possessions. A far-sighted man, who looked clean over the wall of Sodom, to that city "whose maker and builder is God," and "which hath foundations." He had his eye fixed on a better country, even an heavenly. An elect soul, who chose God's choice for him rather than the choice of the flesh for the world. Here surely, if any where, the matter is clearly brought out as, between "calling" and "election," and here we see the importance of making both calling and election sure. In the old theological order election stands as being fixed in the eternal decree, and calling follows as a matter of course in due time. In the scriptural order based on the pleading love of God toward all men, calling is at the threshold of the Christian life, while election is the goal aimed at.

4. As concerning receiving rewards and suffering loss.—The same general truth we have been trying to illustrate is beautifully and graphically set forth in the apostolic parable recorded in 1 Cor. iii. 11-15. "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire, and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; so as by fire." Here we have: First—the foundation, Jesus Christ, upon which all alike build, and because they are on that foundation they shall be saved, (justified) no matter how they build. So far they are the "called." Second—we have two manners of buildings, one likened to a structure of gold, silver and precious stones; the other of wood, hay and stubble. Third—we have a trial or testing of every man's work, as if by fire. Fourth—we have the result of that trial both upon the building or life work of the Christian and upon the Christian himself. If the fire shall reveal the fact that a man's life work is as of gold, silver and precious stones, he shall receive a reward, wholly in addition to his salvation, which is secured by his being built on Christ. On the other hand, if a man's work under the searching test of fire (judgment) shall prove to have been of a worthless character—wood, hay, stubble—his work shall be burned up and he shall suffer loss (evidently the loss of reward which the other received) but "he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire." Here is another allusion to the way in which Lot was pulled out of Sodom, suffering loss of everything except his own soul.

It is almost useless to suggest that the "wood, hay and stubble" type of Christian life prevails today. These are the "many who are called." They will be saved for the reason that they have made choice of salvation through Christ. They who build "gold, silver and precious stones," are the "elect" few, who, besides accepting salvation for themselves, have given themselves in whole-hearted consecration to God and are building "themselves up on their most holy faith," as well as building solidly for God in the work of the gospel, whether as preachers or private Christians, in their own place and according to their several talents and opportunities. It is a clear and beautiful picture of the two great classes of men and women who have been called to "work" in the Master's vineyard. It seems to me that no thoughtful Christian can fail to see the significance of the "called" and the "choice ones" in the light of these Biblical illustrations.

5. The Old Guard in the Armies of Heaven. There is one more picture which we cannot forbear pointing out to you. It is found in Rev. xvii. 14. "These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them; for he is Lord of lords and King of kings; and they that are with him are called, and chosen and faithful." This is clearly a description of the last great battle between Antichrist and the saints, which is brought to a close by the final charge of our glorious King and his old guard of "called, chosen, and faithful ones." I do not think that the company who go out with the King of Glory are different orders, such as "the called," "the choice ones," and "the faithful," but that they are a chosen company who represent in themselves every element of Christianity; the men who are each one in himself, "called, chosen and faithful." Here then we have the Christian in his fullness set before us. They are saved by faith in Christ (the called), elect (by the choice of the high calling) and faithful. (In that they have not counted their lives dear to themselves, but have followed him whithersoever he led them.) It is worthy of note that in the Old Testament the "chosen ones" were usually those picked and pre-eminent soldiers in the armies of Israel. In the last book of the New Testament we find the "chosen ones" again in the army of the King of Glory. Once more I may be allowed to say that it seems to me that the Scriptures are clear in their teaching that the elect are the "choice ones," pre-eminent among the saved.

The Savior was asked on one occasion: "Lord, are there few that be saved?" To which our Lord gave no categorical answer, but made his questioner strive to enter in at the straight gate. But we have a categorical answer to the question as to whether there be few who "are chosen." Let it suggest the query to each one of us as to whether we are of that number. In answer to another question put by Peter to Christ: "Who then can be saved?" Matt. xix. 25, the Master again made no direct answer, but simply said that it was possible under God even for a rich man to be saved. Then answered Peter and said: "We have forsaken all and followed thee: what shall we have, therefore?" To which answer was made that no sacrifice made for Christ would go unrewarded. This answer quotable here upon the matter of election, rather than salvation, and it is significant that our Lord closed his answer and promise of exceeding great reward to reach as forth the world for him, with the very words with which he closed his declaration concerning the "laborers in the vineyard" in the parable from which we have started our inquiry concerning the "chosen ones." "But many that are first shall be last, and the last first." Indeed the parable of the householder follows immediately upon this answer and was given to illustrate his meaning. (Read Matt. xix. 26-29, in connection with the text, Matt. xx. 16.)

How few indeed are choice in the sense of our text. Who few have given themselves wholly to the business of "showing forth the virtue of him who hath called them out of darkness into his marvellous light." How few have forsaken houses and land and personal comfort and ease for his sake. How few have laid their wealth on the altar of consecration for Christ's sake and the gospel. How few have given themselves to the ministry of soul-winning, either as preachers or laymen. How few are really "seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," leaving God to fulfill his word of promise to them to supply their need. How few are really going forth as the torch-bearers of heaven to lighten the darkness of this dark world, holding forth the word of life.

I have offered this study as a tentative effort to explain a doctrine which I honestly believe has been greatly misunderstood and used in its misinterpretation to the hurt of many souls. And also in the hope that, by a new study of it, many idle and unfruitful Christians may be aroused out of their sleep and be made to apprehend that their election is something for which they are responsible, and which if they ever attain unto must come to them in the line of consecrated service to Christ.

I leave the matter, dear friends, with you for your further study and consideration. I would not speak too confidently as to the correctness of my exegesis of the passage in question; but of this I am sure, that of the many who are called into the vineyard of the Lord, there are comparatively few who are "choice" in the widest and best sense of whole-hearted consecration to Christ in his work and glory.—George F. Pentecost, D. D., in Words and Weapons.

Extracts from Letters.

Bro. Thomas Churchill, of Toronto, Ont., gives us all encouragement to press on, by his cheerfulness in affliction, as the following from a late letter will show:

I feel very grateful for the continuation of THE RESTITUTION. I thank you very kindly for the letter you sent me last summer declining to take my name off the list. Please accept the enclosed $1.00, being all that I am able to send. I have not earned twenty dollars for the past twenty years. I have got a small donation and this is a part of it, which I think is the last I shall ever be able to send. I have not been able to come down from my room for six weeks, laid up with a congested lung, and do not know yet how it may end, but thank God I am feeling better now, the eighth week since I was first taken ill, although I am thankful that there is no distressing sickness upon me, except the distress of coughing, and no pain of any kind. I feel interested in the paper, being a subscriber to it since 1859, when it was named the Gospel Banner, in the hands of Brother B. Wilson.

Bro. Knos Cox, writing from Tollgate, Ind., under date of Nov. 5, 1885, says:

Dear brethren of the Old Faith, we see our time is about up for which we paid for our paper, THE RESTITUTION. We fully realize the closeness of the times in which we are living, and we also expect others are experiencing the same; especially those who are publishing a religious journal in these last days of Gentile times, which we are so often warned of through the columns of THE RESTITUTION, which has been a weekly visitor at our temporal home for two or three years, and this is the only way we have of hearing from the brethren of the Abrahamic faith, as there is no preacher of the Old Faith in this part of the country that we have any knowledge of. We should be pleased to be at the meeting of the brethren at Plymouth, on the 18th inst., but we don't see any chance at present, but hope the brethren may have a good meeting, and if any preaching brother should pass through here they will find a welcome stopping place at the temporal residence of Knos Cox and family, ten miles west of Indianapolis. We should love to have some one preach in this part of the country, but we could not promise any financial support, as we are only renters here, or that they could get a house to meet in, if the people knew what kind of doctrine they were to hear.

Sister Anna Craft, of Atchinson, Kan., renews her subscription and then adds:

I cannot do without the paper. It is all the preaching I get. I am glad to see THE RESTITUTION every week. It always has some good news to me, that of the dear Redeemer and his goodness and his good promises made to the few that are faithful; and many times I think if I do prove true to the dear Redeemer, it will be partly due to our good paper. How I wish I could help to send it to the poor, for I am one of them, and it does me so much good to read the letters from the dear brethren. My husband and myself are all I know of at this place. I often think I would like to have some good brother to come and preach for us and encourage us in trying to serve the Lord. May we all be found faithful is my prayer.

Bro. Geo. F. Fuller, now of Detroit, Mich., but formerly manager of a newspaper in New York City, says:

THE RESTITUTION is an excellent paper. I picked it up accidentally a year or two ago, and was so much struck by its harmony with my own religious views, that I become a subscriber, and shall continue to be, so long as it is edited with such wise and Christian discrimination. The selections are admirable, and I have not noticed an editorial expression to which I could take exception; or, indeed, that I could not commend. If there are any other subscribers to THE RESTITUTION in Detroit, and I could know their names I would strive to become acquainted with them, for I am isolated from the so-called orthodox societies on account of my belief in the near coming of Christ, unconsciousness of the dead, and the attainment of immortality through Christ alone. Brother Chaplin has endeared himself to me very much through the mediumship of his paper, and I invoke the blessing of God upon him and his valuable labors.

Bro. L. V. Nevil, of Kentucky, says:

Find enclosed subscription for six months. Should I live till that time I hope to send again. THE RESTITUTION assists me much in the study of the prophets, also giving a general knowledge of what is going on in the religious world. I intend to take it as long as I can find means to pay for it.

Bro. W. Somerville of Canada, in a letter lately received says:

I beg to add that THE RESTITUTION has become a necessity; many of its selections are admirable. Its teachings (the writer thinks) having still more sound, and that it may long continue to give forth no uncertain sound, is our hope; for if the trumpet gives an uncertain sound who "shall prepare himself for the battle."

Bro. G. W. Smith, of Kansas, is still strong in the faith once delivered to the saints, as the following will testify:

I drop a few lines to say that we are still firm in the faith of the gospel of the kingdom, and trying to let our light shine that others may not have aught to say against our character, either as a citizen or a Christian. As opportunity offers we try to sow the seeds of truth. We like our much-loved paper, THE RESTITUTION. We read it with much eagerness and profit, though we do not agree with all the written of the different articles. Now Brother Editor, may God grant that you may long be spared to spread the truth to many benighted minds in our vicinity.

Bro. M. Stump, of Kansas, renews his subscription and says:

THE RESTITUTION is better than all the sermons I have heard in Kansas. We have nothing but Orthodox here, and would be very thankful if some able preacher of the Old Faith could call and give us a few discourses. I have not heard from Elder Bloland Corbaley for some time. Is he living yet?

Sister S. Sims of Peoria, Ill., sends pay for one year, and tells of her faith and of the goodness of the Lord, as follows:

Many thanks to you for continuing your valuable paper to us, for it is a welcome visitor, as we are alone here. I promised the Lord if the way was opened for me to earn some money I would do so and send to you, for we knew you needed it, so I got it last night. Blessed are those that trust in the Lord. We have had losses and sickness in the last year, so that we have little left of this world's goods. I have had a cancer on my face for two years, and just got it cured this summer. I thank and praise the Lord Lord through all my afflictions; may they only work out a greater salvation in the world to come.

Bro. T. E. Nichols, of New Jersey, has a few good words for us as follows:

I like THE RESTITUTION very much. I think it sets forth the doctrines of the Scriptures in a clear light, as far as my judgment goes. May the Lord bless your labors and qualify you for all the duties of your office; and may you be faithful therein, that you may win a crown of glory that fadeth not away. We have had Bro. H. V. Reed to speak for us a few times. He was liked very much, as he sets forth the truth in a forcible manner.

Sister Mary A. Ross, of Wisconsin, writes:

I thank you very much for your love and kindness in sending me the much prized paper, THE RESTITUTION, so long without pay. Since you have had a line from me my health has been very poor, but has now so improved so that I am writing you a few lines. I cannot send you any money, but hope to send a little next month. I cannot tell what a help and comfort the paper has been, as it is the only way I can hear from those of gospel faith. Bear with me a little longer, and don't take my name from your list.

Max O'Rell says that London contains more Roman Catholics than Rome, more Jews than the whole of Palestine, more Irish than Dublin, more Scotchmen than Edinburgh, more Welshmen than Cardiff, and more country folks than the counties of Devon, Durham and Warwickshire put together. It has a birth in every five minutes; has seven accidents every day in its 8,000 miles of streets; has an average of 40 miles of streets opened and 16,000 new houses every year. In 1883 there were added 22,110 new houses to the aggregate of dwellings which is called the metropolis, thus forming 368 new streets and one new square, covering a distance of 66 miles and 84 yards.

LIFE.

Life hath its barren years,
When blossoms fall untimely down,
When ripened fruitage fails to crown
The Summer toil, when nature's frown
Looks ugly on our tears.

Life hath its faithless days;
The golden promise of the morn,
That seemed for light and gladness born,
Meant only scornful wreck and scorn,
Hushed harp instead of praise.

Life hath its valleys too,
Where we must walk with vain regret,
With mourning clothed, with wild rain wet,
Toward sunlight hopes that soon must set,
All quenched in pitying dew.

Life hath its harvest moons,
Its tasselled corn and purple-weighted vine:
Its gathered sheaves of grain, the blessed sign
Of plenteous ripening bread and pure rich wine,
Full hearts for harvest tunes.

Life hath its hopes fulfilled:
Its glad fruition, its best answered prayer,
Its sweeter for waiting long, whose holy air,
Indrawn to silent souls, breathes forth its rare
Grand speech by joy distilled.

To the Brethren Scattered abroad in Indiana:

Dearly Beloved, since our late meeting in Argos, I have been having some serious thoughts with regard to our progress, or rather, non-progress in the work of evangelization. I have often asked myself the question, What are we doing, as a people? or what have we done for the last ten or fifteen years towards enlightening the unenlightened? How many new churches have we raised up in the State of Indiana within that period of time? True, we have many good meetings and joyful seasons within that time; with some few additions to some of the old established churches; but we have done very little in the spread of the gospel, and enlightening the ignorant. Nor can we, under the present system of operations, reasonably expect to accomplish anything in that direction. Indeed we have no system of operation at all in Indiana. But if we ever expect to accomplish anything in that direction we will have to fix on some system of finance; for without this we can do nothing. There must be unison of action in order to insure success; and to secure this end we must have means, which only can be ...d by a rigid system of finance. ... told there have been several ... in that direction, and only ... failures. ... of that? Is that ... good, business-like ... financial system should ... in a success? I answer, ... should be remembered that we have never had any system of operation in Indiana with regard to evangelising, and hence our failures are not to be wondered at. I have never known the subscription system to work well in church matters yet, while I have seen it tried quite a number of times.

But I am asked, What plan, then, would you adopt? I answer; first, the Lord wants free-will offerings. He loves a cheerful giver. Whatever any one purposes in his heart to give, according as the Lord has prospered him, that let him give with a willing mind: and God will bless the deed, and good will be the result. But one person alone can do but little in the matter of evangelization; hence the necessity of co-operation in this work. And this at once introduces the startling point, namely, proper church organization. "But," says one, "The Bible says nothing about church organization; and I never want to join myself to any human organization."

Of this class we find some of our ablest speakers to be; who are really going about demolishing all the churches over which they have any influence; and thus instill their idea of non-organization into the minds of the people. And that simply, I presume, for the reason that they, themselves, are not willing to become responsible to any church organization for their conduct. And so they start out away from home to preach where they are not known; because they cannot get a hearing where they are known. And yet these are generally the first to complain, and complain the hardest of their congregations for not getting a better support from their hearers. Oh, consistency, thou art indeed a rare jewel!

So, without any further discussion of this matter, I will proceed to give a few suggestions on church organization. For, although church organizing is not spoken of, directly, in the Bible, yet we do have individual churches, in different localities, addressed, and spoken of in numerous places, and on various occasions, in the New Testament. For which see the following references: Acts xiii. 1; ix. 31; xiv. 23; xv. 3, 4, 22, 41; xvi. 5; xviii. 22; xx. 17; Rom. xvi. 4, 5; 1 Cor. i. 2; iv. 17; vii. 17; xiv. 23; xvi. 1, 19. Phil. iv. 15. Col. iv. 15, 16; Philemon 2; 1 Pet. v. 13. Rev. i. 4, 11; ii. 1, 12, 18; iii. 1, 7, 14.

With such an array of testimonies as the above, (which is but a tithe of what might be adduced), in favor of local churches, I ask, who can, with a clear conscience, say aught against it. I would then suggest that where there are three or more believers in any locality, conveniently enough located to meet together occasionally, let them not long remain in an unorganized state, but let them organize at once, appoint one of their number to be their elder, or overseer, then let them meet regularly, read the Scriptures, talk over the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God and the name of Jesus the Christ, admonish each other, sing and pray, and celebrate the communion on each first day of the week.

Thus making use of the means of grace, they will surely be blessed with grace sufficient to carry them through unto victory. And they will grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth, and their neighbors will take notice of them and join their meetings, and love to participate with them in their enjoyments. And so the church will soon make increase of the body to the edifying of itself in love, as Paul writes to the Church at Ephesus. Eph. iv. 16.

But in order to perfect success, the church must also have a treasury for each member to cast in his or her mite at each meeting, as the Lord may have prospered them through the week. 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Thus the Church will always have the means at hand to defray her home expenses, and have a supply of Bibles and hymn books for the use of the Sunday School, or the Bible class; as well as occasionally send out an evangelist to labor in new fields.

But to carry out this plan more effectually it will be necessary to organize a district, or state conference, in which all the local churches in such territory can be represented by delegates, with a full report of their local labors, at least once a year, and in which conference all the churches may unite their efforts in the work of evangelization.

And now dear brethren, as I may never be permitted to meet with you again in the attitude of a conference, I shall be very happy to hear that you have taken the necessary steps to bring about that most desirable end. If you can do no more at the Plymouth conference, I would suggest that you, at least, appoint a committee to draw up a constitution and by-laws for the organization of such conference.

There need not be any creed, or confession of faith attached to such constitution, and certainly, there can be no reasonable objections brought to bear against such an organization; and in anticipation of the great amount of good which may be accomplished by such an organization, it is hoped that you will not fail to give it your candid and most sincere consideration.

Your humble and unworthy brother, in behalf of the spread and furtherance of the glorious truths of the gospel.

JOSEPH MESSIMORE.

Editor Restitution:

I left home Oct. 29, and returned Nov. 10. I came home almost sick with a very bad cold. I started from home as stated above, stepped on board the train and landed at Greenup, Ill., the same day. Met Bro. J. D. Rawlings waiting with a team to convey me to the place of meeting, which was nine miles from Greenup. We found a very nice house, owned by the Christian order, they call themselves "Campbellites." I spoke to them seven times with good attention, in fact, the least opposition I have met with any where. I would have spoken to them three times more but we were prevented on the account of rain. I promised to return again soon. Several of the men expressed themselves by saying they had been taught to believe the Bible as it was written, and that the old Bible was all fulfilled. When I hear about the old Bible being fulfilled it reminds me of the Prophet Isaiah, lx. 2. "For behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people." From the above place I visited the little band of seven believers south of Greenup, Ill. Preached to them seven times with good attendance. Three were added to their number by being baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. May they walk worthy of that crown of Life that is promised at the appearing of the Lord Jesus, is my prayer.

Bid them farewell and started for Martinsville, arriving there all safe. Met Bro. Sweet and Garver, went to Bro. Sweets for supper, spoke three times in a Union House, built by the neighborhood, held a discussion of four hours with a so-called Christian preacher, but the language he used rather made me doubt there being very much of the spirit of Christ with him. The proposition was, Does the King James translation of the Holy Scriptures teach the total destruction of the earth, he affirming.

What absurd positions the sects will take to carry out their false notions of the future glory of the world. When Jesus comes he will not raise up this goodly land of promise, but the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose, Isaiah xxxv. 1, and the inhabitants shall not say, I am sick, the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity. Isaiah xxxiii. 24. The desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by, and they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden, and the waste and desolate and ruined cities are become fenced, and are inhabited. Ezek. xxxvi. 34, 35. For behold I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. Here we have a plain prophecy concerning a new creation of both heavens and earth. But did God mean that he was going to burn up the present heavens and earth, and replace them by creating new ones, not at all. Let us read on. Referring to this new creation, he adds: But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create, for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people, and the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying. Isaiah lxv. 17, 19. Let us examine the balance of this chapter and we will learn that when the new heavens and earth are created, Jerusalem will be there. Yes, says one, but this Jerusalem is that which shall descend from God out of heaven. Not so, unless you can show that the voice of weeping and the voice of crying have been heard there. No, it is the ancient city whose history is stamped on nearly every page of the Bible, that city which has witnessed the stoning of the Prophets and the killing of those that were sent unto her. That city which shall say, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, when the Lord Jesus shall come to Zion and rebuild the tabernacle of David which is fallen down, and I will build again the ruins thereof. Acts xv. 16. We conclude then that the city will not be melted by fire, but still exist in the new earth. The entire testimony of the Scriptures is, that the earth, in place of being burned is reserved as the future territory of the everlasting kingdom of God.

There is not a promise in all God's Book of any inheritance or reward for the saints of God in the future except upon this earth, consequently the theory that teaches the destruction of the earth must be false or else the promised reward will never be realized. God's covenant with Abraham, Gen. xvii. 7, 8, compels him to preserve the land of Canaan, (intact, untouched, especially by any thing that harms, uninjured, undefiled, left complete. Webster) as the future everlasting possession of the worthy patriarch. It will not do to give him other land. That would be an evasion of the promise. It must be the land he saw and walked on. Therefore that land will not be burned up. How unscriptural the theory that says God is going to totally destroy this earth.

The Savior says, blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth. Matt. v. 5. See also Psalm xxxvii. And, now, Bro. Chaplin, I am truly glad to learn that the Executive Board, sanctio the Editorial management of THE RESTITUTION until the Lord comes, is my prayer. Your Brother waiting for the Kingdom.

The Volcanoes at Work Again.

The Malay Archipelago has again been the scene this year of great volcanic eruptions. It is in this Malayan sea, thickly strewn with the most beautiful of islands, that the volcanic forces of the world have displayed their greatest energy. We have in our own country, in northern California, Oregon, and Washington Territory, a display of volcanic phenomena that is believed to be the most prodigious in the world. The subterranean forces, however, that covered our Western coast regions with immense outpourings of volcanic matter, long ago ceased to find vent on our shores, but are still in active operation throughout the middle Pacific, and especially among the lovely islands of the Malay Archipelago.

In books of travel describing the semi-circular chain of islands where these active volcanoes are found, it is often recorded that a few weeks or months after the writers visited one little place or another it was destroyed by a volcanic outburst, or levelled to the ground by an earthquake. We hear comparatively little of most of these frequently recurring phenomena. Seldom a year passes, however, that the tragedy of Pompeii is not re-enacted in some of these islands; and several times in this century awful outbursts of volcanic fury have occurred like that which about forty years ago overwhelmed an islet south of Java, strewing ashes over land that was 200 miles away from the flaming fountain which shot its torrent of lava, mud, and smoke thousands of feet in the air.

M. Braun and M. Korthals, who were commissioned this year to make a scientific examination of the volcano of Krakatau, and to inquire into the effects of its frightful eruption twenty-seven months ago, say that although the early reports of the disaster were much exaggerated, the reality was sufficiently terrible. Forty thousand residents of Java lost their lives. They were buried under a rain of mud, burned by the hail of cinders, or engulfed under the mountainous waves that accompanied the stupendous outburst.

This year's eruptions in Java have included the chief heights in the chain of volcanoes that extend throughout the island. The outburst at Mount Smeru, in eastern Java, last May, killed more than 500 people, destroyed a wide belt of coffee plantations, and filled deep chasms with lava. More recently the increasing activity of the Merabi volcano, in central Java, has occasioned great anxiety throughout the island. Still later reports from Krakatau announce that new disturbances have become frequent, especially at the old crater, through which issued the torrent of fire that wrought the great catastrophe of 1883.

The despatches from San Francisco announce the arrival on last Thursday afternoon of earthquake waves as large as those observed there after the last great upheaval in Java. It is evident, therefore, that some very recent display of subterranean energy has occurred in this great region of volcanic outbursts and earthquakes.—N. Y. Sun.

The Sea Captain's Story.

"I had a little vessel on the coast. She had four men besides myself. I had my wife and two children on board; the night was stormy, and my brother was to stand watch that night. The seamen prevailed on him to take 'one glass' to help him perform his duties; but being unaccustomed to liquor, he fell asleep, and in the night I awoke to find my vessel a wreck. I took my wife and one of the little ones in my arms and she took the other, and for hours we battled with the cold waves. After hours of suffering, the waves swept my little one from my embrace; then, after more hours of suffering, the waves swept the little one from my wife's arms, and our two little dears were lost to us forever. After more battling with the storm and waves, behold she was cold in death. I made my way to shore, and here I am—my wife, my children, and all my earthly possessions lost—for 'one glass' of rum."—Anvil.

MCDONALD.—At Petaluma, Cal., Sept. 10, 1885, Ralph McDonald, son of Bro. and Sister McDonald of Kemptville, Ont., aged 26 years.

Bro. Ralph was born into this world with an honest principle and amiable disposition, more like a man when a boy, than some are at 50; industrious, prudent, and economical during his youthful days, and on to the day of his death these characteristics were brilliantly displayed, but he was not a tyler. Strictly temperate in all his habits, a pattern for young men who are growing up at the present day.

Bro. Ralph was immersed by the writer into the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, about eight years ago; and from that time to the day of his death he was an ornament to the Church of God.

Five years ago he left his father's for California to secure means, by honest industry, to purchase him a comfortable home, a farm, in Canada. And with the blessing of God upon his own industry, the object was about completed, the farm was bought, and a heavy payment made; and he was expecting to return home in course of a year or two. But death claimed him as victim! "O, how long shall death the tyrant reign?" In his death love... parents have been bereaved of an obedient son, brothers and sisters of a loving brother, the Church of God of a jewel, the world of an honest man, and the writer of a true friend. But he sleeps in the plan of human redemption, therefore his resurrection is sure.

RALPH V. LYON.

WEBSTER.—At her home in Michigan, Nov. 13, 1885, Catherine Webster.

Sister Webster's maiden name was Reeve, she being a sister of Sister Halstead deceased, and Samuel Reeve, with whom the readers of THE RESTITUTION are acquainted through his writings. Sister Webster was born Dec. 6, 1846. She united with the Church of God at Rensselaer, Ind., twelve years ago. She was an earnest Christian woman, and died in full faith of receiving a crown of life when Jesus comes. She sleeps in peace and her life is hid with Christ in God. She was united in marriage with William A. Webster, Feb. 21, 1881. Her husband and a daughter four years old survive her. Her mother and two brothers reside at Rensselaer and at their request the remains were brought here for interment. Words of comfort were spoken by the writer from the text, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." Rev. xiv. 13.]

THE COMING AGE,

—ITS—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. WESTBEE.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting to the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great push made in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. It deals largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand to work in out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Universe ruling Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 400 large pages, bound in cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, DECEMBER 9, 1885. NO. 46.

THE RESTITUTION.

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,
Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the fact "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a firmly belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

"THE SONSHIP," ITS HEIGHT AND DEPTH, AND SIMPLICITY.

"Abraham, the father of all who believe"—has no superior on the plane of natural descent, yet Abraham was met and blessed by Melchizedek—the Priest King! "The less was blessed of the better," Heb. vii. 16. Hence no one by mere natural descent can be above Abraham. However, "Jesus from above—is above all." John i. 31. He is the one personal seed of promise. Gal. iii. 16.

David was exalted and crowned and taken into special covenant relation to God's purpose by Israel—his chosen nation—to constitute "the example and shadow of Heavenly things," Heb. viii. 5.

Yet David, the head of the royal house of Israel, in spirit speaks of his promised Son according to the flesh as his Lord! Psa. cx. 1; Matt. xxii. 42, 45. However neither Solomon, nor any one of his honored royal race,—as natural descendant—could claim that distinction, "a greater than Solomon" was announced.

The Davidic and apostolic Revelation (Psa. lxxxix. and Acts ii. 22, 30; Gal. iv. 4, 21, 31; Heb. x. 12-37) taken together renders the subject plain.

Abraham's royal priest (Heb. v. to viii. is David's Lord; and David's Lord is to attain a still loftier and more extended sphere than has been assigned to either of these worthies! He is "The second Man—The Lord from heaven"! 1 Cor. xv. 45, 47. Thus we have David's Lord, Abraham's "better," and "the second man"—all in Jesus the Christ—Sovereign of the world to come!

Please observe, that the more natural descendant, of Adam, Abraham and David, are each and all of the "Earth earthy"—all subject to death; and therefore no one of them, as such, can escape the common "law of sin and death." Hence each one must be "born again—begotten by the gospel—and have part in the resurrection of the just—or perish!" John i. 12, 13; iii. 3, 16. Therefore, Jesus himself could not have filled the royal prerogatives assigned him—if made after the law of a carnal commandment! There must of necessity be as much more distinction between his birth and that of a believer's begetting to the living hope—of sonship"—as there is in the official sphere to which they are severally called of God. 1 Cor. xii. 12; Eph. iv. 8, 18; Rev. v. 10; xx. 6, 8.

The heir of a prince or peasant does not inherit honors or goods beyond the limits of his paternal possessions.

"The called in Christ" are constituted "sons and daughters" in Christ in order that they may "inherit the kingdom—and be princes in all the earth!"

How much more than must "the son of God" fill the conditions of his divine sonship—The first born among his many brethren!

Please note, "Adam was altogether of God, by creation (and with Eve, the inheritor of earth), Abraham's "better" or superior who pronounced God's blessing on him; and David's promised Son (and yet his Lord) were all of God!

Now, "what saith the Scriptures" "The seed of the woman shall" bruise the serpent's head."

"When the fullness of the time was come God sent forth his Son (not Joseph's) made of a woman—made not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life—who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens!" Heb. vii. 16, 26.

Here the issue rests. The terms that set forth the sonship of Jesus, distinguish his birth from "the law of a carnal" order; and make it "separate from sinners!" Thus all these facts confirm "the record God has given of his Son!" John v. 10, 12; Matt. i. Mark i. Luke i. John i. It is affirmed 77 times, John xiv., by the terms Father, Son, etc.

These are the facts touching the [illegible] and sonship of Jesus, the Christ; [illegible] some assume that here is one thing hard for the Lord!"—that he was [illegible] "after the law" of ordinary human life; and that they do well to assail his "record" as "the Son of God!" But what will they do, by joining the Jews who crucified him because of his claim to be "the Son of God," John x. 32, 36; Mark xiv. 61, 62; Matt. xvi. 63, 66.

Surely these men have nothing to gain by their misbelief, and the dreadful doom of those Jews, should admonish them, 1 Cor. x. 11; Luke xix. 41, 44.

"Jesus came to his own—as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God—who were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God." John i. 11, 13.

This one text should suffice to determine the truth of Jesus' miraculous birth and sonship. Observe! it contains a triple-triune-declaration, that natural descent even from David, or Abraham, does not avail to secure divine sonship. Therefore, it did not, could not, avail to secure the transcendent sonship of David's Lord! The doctrine of Jesus' divine begettal is as absolute as that of the Christian's renewing, being born again, of incorruptible seed the word of God! It belongs to "the regeneration." Matt. xix. 28. The flesh profiteth nothing. The old man, Joseph etc., is put off! Hence, Jesus must be "the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

It is on this line that the many sons—being brought to glory—are begotten again to a lively hope; that they also may partake of the divine nature, be joint heirs and reign with him.

These primary Scriptures disclose the daring departure of the Josephite from the first principles of all truth! He will hold God (whom he brings with his first begotten into the world, for the angels to worship) to adhere to Joseph's natural son, "the old man" nature in the line of "carnal commandment" for the Jewish priesthood and princes; and so not "separate from sinners." Thus he assumes that God has "set forth" Joseph's son as his own, and under false pretenses, has imposed so far on human credulity!

We read of "a deceived heart (that) hath turned him aside, Isa. xliv. 20, when they know God they glorified not as God."

But let him own that "The gospel is of God; that the first promise, Gen. iii. 15; and the terms of the first record of Jesus' birth, Gal. iv. 4; involved miracle—that the entire intermediate history of Abrahamic promise, was unfolded by unnumbered miracles—and that Jesus' coming was inaugurated by "signs and wonders and gifts of the Holy Ghost." Acts ii. 22. Then he may see that "the angel message, to Mary, the angel anthem, the prophetic spirit to Zacharias, Simeon and John the Baptist, the Divine life of Christ, his wondrous death, and his more wondrous resurrection, ascension and dispensation of grace, all are of God! all in character and on the upper grade of "the Regeneis—all things new!" Matt. xix. 28; Rev. xxi. 1, 5. Explanations to unbelief are waived; as the wildest delusion of anti-Christ may lurk in the idolatry of self; when "I don't believe" overrides both reason and revelation to the contrary!

God's presence and purpose in Christ take precedence of all questions touching the filling up of "the record that God has given of his Son."

Lovingly for truth.

More Faulty Terminology and what it Leads up to; Can a Stream Rise Higher than its Source?

How familiar we all are with the supposed Scriptural illustration of the Christian race as given in the first of Heb. xii., where the preacher tells us, and we might naturally infer from the reading in the C. V. and the R. V., that our course is compared to the runner in the Roman Hippodrome, or in the arena of the old Olympic or Pythian games, the encompassing semi-circular banks of seats as they rise one above the other in the background, occupied by an eagerly interested and sympathetic gazing multitude or "cloud of witnesses," saints and martyrs gone before us to glory, who have already run their race successfully and been crowned with the unanthino meed of immortality. Now there could not perhaps be a better passage selected in the whole range of Scriptural mistranslation than this to illustrate the danger of a wrong terminology. The word translated "witnesses" here, and allowed to stand in the R. V. as it has so long in the C. V. unchallenged even by the scholarship of the clergy, is our word for "martyr." We have merely Anglicised the Greek word martus. This word in the Greek means "one who testifies" by word or act or both, or a "witness" in the sense of one who gives testimony, not in the sense of one who sees something. Unfortunately for the unlearned we in English use the word "witness" though, in the two distinct senses of giving testimony and seeing or looking at something. This fact should have put the translators and revisers on their guard against such an ambiguous and misleading translation; and the error is only explainable on the ground of their being utterly misled themselves and blinded by the fundamental false teaching of a "phantastic" theology. According to their phantastic hypothesis of heaven, earth is the Christian athletic's amphitheatre, heaven the spectacular auditorium from which God, angels and the redeemed saints "gone to glory" look down with thrilling interest upon those of their brethren who are still running the race for victory and the crown. Time, the allotted period of the dramatic spectacle, the close of such individual struggle the signal for the award or condemnation.

The dangerous fascination of this sort of teaching lies in the fact that Satan has mixed, and adroitly too, so much of truth with so much of error. But see how the first little trifling (you may think) variation from the truth, or a culpable indulgence in ambiguity, which in its practical result amounts to the same thing, leads to other tampering with the text and the plain meaning of the author. Let me retranslate the passage and the last two verses of the preceding chapter, which give the argument leading up to this conclusion introduced by "therefore."

HEBREWS XI. 39, 40.

39. And these all having been attested through their faith, did not realize (receive C. V. and R. V.) the promise,

40. God having looked forward ("provided" C. V. and R. V.) to something more efficient ("better" C. V. and R. V.) for us, that they might not be perfected (i. e. receive their spiritual bodies and be made holy) without ("apart from") us.

HEBREWS XII.

1. Therefore, we also have so great a cloud of testifiers (or martyrs) lying around (keimenon) us, let us lay aside every hinderance (weight C. V. and R. V.) and the sin that most easily besets us, (so easily C. V. and R. V.) and with patient endurance (patience C. V. and R. V.) run the contest (agona any contest for the mastery, but rendered "race" C. and R. V.) lying before us, (set before C. and R. V.)

2. Looking away unto Jesus, the leader (author C. and R. V.) and perfecter (the one who gives a perfect example of faith, also having a Levitical typical, deeper significance, under which type the high priest was a returning or chief initiator into the "mysteries" of God) of our faith, who for the joy that lay before him (that was set C. and R. V.) patiently endured (same word as in first verse) shame, and having despised shame, hath sat down at the right hand of the throne of God.

Now let us return and see what the argument of the 11th chapter is which is summed up in the last verse of the chapter. The first verse of this chapter opens with a definition of faith as a fundamental principle of all Christian character. Then the statement is made that in this "hypostasis" or real state of mind and heart, "the elders" "received testimony," or were attested, or were legally assured by God while yet alive that they were acceptable and satisfactory to him. This statement backed up by "a full call" of the more notable recorded instances, with the personal history of each and all, of which the reader is presumed to be thoroughly familiar. Moreover some of the more striking personal experiences attending God's attestation of these heroic martyrs, given by way of illustration, and finally the conclusion, above referred to, drawn, namely that these, though all attested, had not realized (another legal term) the promise. Why? Because they were dead. They had all died in the hope of a resurrection, "the first-fruits" of which was "the Christ." This is clearly brought out in the 35th verse of this chapter. Now turn to 1 Cor. xv. and read the order and time of this resurrection here spoken of, 23d verse, Christ a first-fruits; thereafter those who are Christ's at his coming; and thereafter the rest (or the complement, or the complete number.) The only question here in this passage as to the when is, whether "his coming" refers to his first or second coming, and this question is definitely settled by the use of the same phrase elsewhere, and the general teaching of the Scriptures. For instance Christ's own words on this subject as given by Matt. xvii. 20, and the context.

According to the argument thus far, these attested "martyrs" (or witnesses) are dead and have not "realized" under their covenant with God. Moreover, next in order, a good and sufficient reason is given us why this is so, and why they have not; namely, because God looked forward in his beneficence to something more efficient for us (all?) than this partial perfection could, from the very nature of his plan and purpose bring.

We have now reached the "therefore" drawn from this general argument and conclusion. Will it do now to make these "dead" "attested" "martyrs"—living, gazing, interested spectators of the church militant on earth? I think not, and to the extent of my ability I would humbly, but zealously and most earnestly protest against this apostate teaching.

What then is this "eternal life" that we are exhorted to strive after but "life from the dead." "Buried with him (the Christ) we rise to walk in newness of life." Renewed first by "the renewing of our minds," and finally by the renewing of our bodies. But remember the exhortation and significant teaching of the parable of "the wine and the wineskins." When God "renews" there is no "patchwork" about it. He never talks about making over our old souls. "Whoever is in Christ is a new creation" (or more literally a new creative process, or in a process of new creation, ktisis is the word, not ktisma. The first is the process the last the result of the process, or the "creation.")

Let us not try to simplify or make God's work easy for him, by keeping man's soul alive when he passes through death, so that God will only have to fit the old body upon it again, a heathen conception, or at most make only a body for the "saved soul."

Remember that he is the One "who speaks of things that are not as though they were," and who bespeaks life even by the word of his ability, "with whom indeed all things are possible."

In Memoriam.

It becomes our painful duty to record the death of our much beloved Sister, Mrs. Kate E. Webster, Nov. 8th, at the age of thirty-eight, of that dread disease, consumption. She was taken to Rensselaer, Indiana, her former home, for interment, where she now sleeps beside her dear father. She leaves a husband and one child, to suffer their irreparable loss, also a dear aged mother, on whom the stroke will fall heavily—one sister and five brothers, together with many brethren and sisters in Christ who share the sad affliction. She was a sister of our dear companion who now sleeps, was a member of the congregation at Rensselaer, having yielded a hearty obedience to the blessed gospel, in the year 1870, from which she never wavered in confidence or deed or walk.

Beloved by all who knew her, for her kind and gentle nature, especially endeared to those of the Household of Faith, who were acquainted with her, for her noble Christian virtues, and Christ-like spirit.

"If the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by (or on account of) his spirit that dwelleth in you. Therefore brethren, we are debtors not to the flesh to live after the flesh."

May we all share in that quickening into the life immortal.

Editor Restitution:

I seat myself once more to write a few lines to the dear old RESTITUTION, and to remit after several months delay, for which I am ashamed; but if you will permit me, I would like to offer a few words in way of excuse. I lost my companion one year ago last July, by the ruthless hand of death, leaving me with four children to care for, the youngest not quite two years old, since which time it seems there is no end to expenses. Although I would have just as well remitted before this as now, but have had so very much to occupy my time and mind, and at the present time my little daughter Laura is laying sick with that dreadful disease Diphtheria. After being three hundred miles from home to stay with her oldest sister while my house was broken up, she returned home again and was taken down in three days, since which time my present companion or myself have been by her side for eight days, but thank God she seems now to be slowly recovering. If this should meet with notice from my old acquaintances, I should be glad to get a word from them, or any brother or sister if they would do me the favor.

I prize THE RESTITUTION above all other papers, and feel to sympathize with the Editor and Agent in the perplexities with which they have to meet. I take great pleasure in reading the letters and reports from different parts of the world, and wish so very much that some of the traveling preaching brethren could call this way and hold a series of meetings, and try to awaken some of the blinded people.

Selections.

Paul's Comfort to the Bereaved.—1 Thess. iv. 13-18.

"Nay, sorrow not, your loved one is not lost, but gone before." "Your friend is not dead, but is even now in the presence of God, singing His high praises." "The spirit of your lost friend is near to Christ rejoicing in his love, and glad to be free from the burden of this mortal body." "We only want the wings of faith to see the saints and to discern the brightness of their glory." "Those whom we have loved and lost are waiting for us in the glory-world, watching our footsteps here below, and if they could speak to us, they would restore our selfish sorrows." "God has a niche in heaven wherein to hold our idols." Thus modern theology comforts those who are sorrowing over the ravages of death, and exquisite poetry and the sweetest music have alike lent their aid to portray the glories of the soul, freed from the burden of this mortal body.

Not that, however, did the great Apostle of the Gentiles comfort the saints in Thessalonica who were mourning the loss of beloved friends. Those Thessalonian Christians were looking for the Lord from heaven, fully believing that he would return in their day; and yet while she watching, some of them died! How terrible the calamity! These would not be able to see the Lord when he should come, for they were dead! We marvel not that Paul bade them sorrow not as those that had no hope; but why, oh why? did he not console them with the thought that those beloved friends had gone before them into the presence of Christ? that they were even then enjoying felicity? How their unselfish minds would have rejoiced had he thus instructed them; how they themselves would have hailed the approach of the angel of death; why did he not thus comfort them? We think the answer is not far to seek. Doubtless he would have told them these things had they been true; but Paul evidently knew nothing of the conscious bliss of the departed souls, and therefore the words of consolation which he writes are widely different from those we so generally hear. What does he tell these Thessalonian mourners? He says their brethren sleep. It seems to me that perfectly healthy sleep is totally unconscious. True we dream, but is not that most likely when we are disturbed and only partially asleep? This seems evident from the fact that when the mind is free from care and sorrow, and the body perfectly healthy, we do not dream at all." So Paul's illustration seems to teach the very fact that Solomon expressed so forcibly, "The dead know not anything."

But though themselves unconscious, these sleeping saints are not forgotten, for they sleep in Jesus. While they lived Christ lived in them, and they in him; their life was "hid with Christ in God;" it is so still, for nothing, not even death, "can separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." How sweet the consolation. They sleep in Jesus. The tired child lies down in its mother's arms and falls peacefully asleep. No anxious fear disturbs him, no apprehension of sorrow to come holds his eyes waking. The arms of love are about him, and he knows that he is safe. So the Christian, often very weary (for life is not the flowery path some poets tell us), lies down in the arms of infinite love, and without a fear, sleeps sweetly. He has committed all things concerning him to Christ's care, and his last conscious words may be, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." And while he sleeps Christ watches. These sleeping saints are his, and the enemy may not touch them. No mother looks half so lovingly upon her sleeping children as Christ looks upon his brethren who have closed their eyes upon this mortal dying world. And at the proper moment they shall wake. Yes; the glorious morning will dawn, and with its first streak of light, the dead in Christ shall rise, not disembodied spirits, seeking a new sphere, unclothed and strange, but perfect men, clothed with immortality, and radiant with glory, shall rise to meet their Lord, their Head, their Life. Then we who are alive, changed, too, like them, this mortal having put on immortality, shall be caught up with them, and so we shall be for ever with the Lord. "Comfort one another with these words." Ay, beloved Paul, we will. We will cast aside the rhapsodies of theologians and poets, and betake ourselves to the more sure words of holy writ; albeit, conscious that we must, in so doing, sacrifice many a cherished fancy of years gone by, and give up many a hymn and sacred song, whose words, from old associations, seem almost inspired. Such sacrifices, however, always meet a rich reward. The heathen of old gave up the mysteries of their religion, and accepted the simple Gospel of Christ, and God unfolded to them, in change, his mystery, and taught them things that had been hid in his all-loving heart for years and for generations. Oh, wondrous recompense! And we give up a fancy, a myth, a vision, (very beautiful, however), and receive in return a truth and a promise that make our hearts leap for joy, and our hearts thrill with holy ecstasies, a truth which, while it requires us to exercise the keenest faith in the mighty power of God to fulfill his gracious purposes, yet does not require us to lay aside our reason and believe in spirits singing without lip or tongue, and playing upon golden harps without the hands to hold them. We cannot rejoice when we see the young, the beautiful cut down in their beauty, nor the strong, vigorous man stopped in the midst of a glorious work, but while we sorrow as we must, and should, we may remember the inspired teaching, and "sorrow not as those that have no hope." Some of us have searched the New Testament very carefully, to see if there were any glimpses given of the Heaven of popular theology and of the saints previous to our Lord's return. We cannot find them, and we think, nay, we are sure, that when Paul wished to comfort his brethren in their sore trouble, he would not have passed over the fact that their loved ones were then in the very place where, most of all, they would desire to be, had it been a fact, and not a fable. No! they sleep in Jesus, and when the Lord returns He will bring them with him.

TRAINING OF CHILDREN.

There is a branch of useful training which cannot be too heedfully regarded: I mean, the education that children give themselves. Their observation is ever alive and awake to the circumstances which pass around them; and, from the circumstances thus observed, they are continually drawing their own conclusions. These observations and conclusions have a powerful influence in forming the characters of youth. What is imparted in the way of direct instruction they are apt to consider as official; they receive it often with downright suspicion; generally, perhaps, with a sort of undefined qualification and reserve. It is otherwise with what children discover for themselves. As matter of self-acquisition, this is treasured up and reasoned upon; it penetrates the mind and influences the conduct beyond all the formal lectures that ever were delivered. Whether it be for good, or whether it be for evil, the education of the child is principally derived from its own observation of the actions, the words, the voice, the looks of those with whom it lives. The first is unquestionably holy and since the last is so, it is impossible, surely, that the friends of youth can be too circumspect in that youthful presence, to every the least appearance of evil. This great moral truth was keenly felt, and powerfully inculcated, even in the heathen world. But the reverence for youth of Christian parents ought to reach immeasurably further. It is not enough that they set no bad example; it is indispensable that they show forth a good one. It is not enough that they seem virtuous; it is indispensable that they be so!

The Christian parent ought to be a living exemplification of Christianity. His house, his habits, his family, his associates, his pursuits, his recreations, ought all to be so regulated as to evince that religion is, indeed, the parent of order, the inspirer of good sense, the well spring of good humor, the teacher of good manners, and the perennial source of happiness and peace. Accustomed to live and breathe in such a holy atmosphere, it is morally impossible that a child can materially go wrong. And this, in the highest sense of the word, is incomparably the most valuable branch of a Christian education.—Rev. Jabb.

Exegetical.

"Upon this Rock."

Among Protestants there are three views as to the application of these words, "Upon this Rock I will build my church."—Math. xvi. 18. (1) That by the rock the Lord meant himself; (2) that he meant the confession which Peter had just made of his Messiahship; this is the fundamental truth which lies at the foundation of the whole spiritual structure; (3) that he meant the person of Peter, not, indeed, so as to confer on him any official supremacy, but simply indicating priority in the work of beginning or establishing his Church. Thus the words had their fulfillment in the fact that Peter was the first preacher of the gospel, both to the circumcision and the uncircumcision. The first of these views accords with fact. The Lord Jesus is the foundation, the only foundation of his Church (1 Cor. iii. 11). The view accords with the grammatical construction of the words. The word petra in this form is repeatedly applied to our Lord, and to him only, never to the apostles, as in 1 Cor. x. 4; Rom. ix. 33; 1 Peter ii. 7. The promised security of the Church is also in favor of this view: the Church of Christ founded on the Rock of Ages is safe; this could not follow from the declaration if it referred to the power of Peter, for he was a fallible man.—Dr. James Brown.

LET us all determine to do something to enlarge the subscription list of our paper before 1886 is numbered with the gone-by years.

SOME letters and requests from different correspondents will receive our early attention. Remember that editing THE RESTITUTION weekly, in addition to our domestic cares, and the calls of our ministry to our different congregations, is no inconsiderable task for one in his 77th year.

AMONG the best denominational papers that come to our office are the New York Independent and the New York Observer. We prize them both so highly that a choice between the two would be difficult. Should any of our readers desire an excellent, literary, scientific, and general news journal, containing also many religious articles to which our brethren would take no particular exception, we can recommend both the above named papers. They are infinitely more worthy of patronage than many papers now taken by some of our readers. Write to the respective offices for specimen numbers and terms.

WE wish our correspondents would select practical subjects, and write in a kind conciliatory style, shunning all harsh irreverent expressions and comparisons. The great questions of Ontology, Soteriology and Eschatology are now undergoing such an investigation as they have never received in any former period of the world's history. Christ's second coming, conditional immortality, and the renovation of this, our world, are the great questions of our age. Men of eminent abilities and of high standing in the denominational organizations of these days are contrasting the doctrines of creeds with inspired Bible teaching, and, in consequence, abandoning views that have been unchallenged for generations. Let us present the truth in love, and God will bless us in so doing, and bless the truth in its influence on the minds of others. God was kind and long-suffering to us in our errors, and let us be kind and forbearing toward others who have erred through human teaching.

LIKE the lull in the storm, has been the status of affairs between the warring Principalities in European Turkey since our last issue. A real settlement of the existing questions and disagreements seems as remote as ever. The suspicion that the Greater Powers, Russia and Austria, have been exerting a covert influence seems to be confirmed by the development of events. Appearances are deceptive. Ultimate designs are not disclosed by the hollow protestations of the false actors, whose only aim is to divert attention from their insidious ulterior purposes. To be read by our readers in this connection we clip the following from the Philadelphia Press, and refer them to our News Column: "Eastern Roumelia remains true to her Bulgarian allegiance, and will not recognize the Turkish Commission sent with true Oriental 'aplomb' to administer affairs at Philippopolis. A meeting of citizens, where the Bishop and Russian agent were present, refused to discuss the subject of the 'status quo ante' at all. The Russian agent withdrew in apparent disgust, but this may be only a ruse. It is certain Turkey will have to reconquer Roumelia to regain it, and then the great danger remains, namely, the spilling of Christian blood by the Turk. Turkish military activity continues, and troops have gone to the Greek frontier."

From the Author, J. H. Hastings, A. M., we have received a copy of his last work "The Unspeakable Gift." While we reserve a fuller and more complete notice of this truly able work for next week, we will give our readers two from the many notices of deserved commendation. One is from the Methodist Recorder of Philadelphia: "The author of this volume is a thoughtful, scholarly and reverent writer, and the author of quite a number of volumes. His position is, that eternal life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ. He holds that it was God's original purpose to give immortality to man, and that he might have been exempt from death had he never sinned, and that it is still his purpose to immortalize him—but not in sin and misery—but only by a restoration to holiness. While those who believe in Christ shall become immortal, those who reject him, he holds, will lose this boon, and perish forevermore to be. The author presents his view with considerable clearness and force." The other is from the Christian Standard, Pittsburgh: "The aim of the work is to convince the reader that the unsaved will be blotted out in the future, and that a continued conscious existence, will be given only to those who are saved. He is a pleasant writer, and shows no mean ability in arranging his arguments in defence of his positions. Indeed, we know of no book in advocacy of the same views that makes a more plausible showing on that side of the question."

JERUSALEM.

Under this heading, according to an article copied into THE RESTITUTION, the capital of God's soon coming kingdom is described as being in a sad condition. This account being accepted as true, then are the words of Solomon strictly applicable: "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick, but when the desire cometh it is a tree of life." We admit that we were not prepared for quite so sad a state of things as the writer makes out, yet we hope (though deferred) for a better state of things.

Question. Will the great work to be done in restoring Israel and the Jews and their land to the glory described by God's holy prophets, be an act of physical omnipotence, or will man have a part to perform in so grand and noble a work? We say both; man will not be an idle spectator in a work so grand and sublime, yet it will be a distinct and separate work from the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the righteous out from among the dead, and the changing of the righteous living. That will be an act of omnipotence. Man performs his part by complying with the provisions of the gospel of the kingdom, which are plain and easy. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, he that believeth and is baptised shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be condemned!" To give the exact and precise time and order in which this great and magnificent and sublime work of restoring all things spoken of by the mouth of all God's holy prophets since the world began, is an undertaking that our ability and pen cannot perform. Taking Scripture, the unerring word of God, as a sure guide to enlighten, to counsel, to make us wise unto salvation through faith in the name of Jesus the Christ, how shamefully and distressing ignorant, is the great mass of the Protestant world, to say nothing of the poor heathen, of God's great plan of restitution or of salvation by and through his dear and well-beloved Son, in the great scheme of redemption and restitution. Do the sects and denominations believe that Jerusalem, in the land of Palestine, will be cleansed from all the effects of the curse, made grand and glorious, and become the capital of the kingdom of God? which kingdom will be under the whole heavens, and which will be given to the people of the saints of the Most High God, and that they are to possess it forever, even forever and ever? God has made man upright, but he has sought out many inventions with the devil's help and the help of the papacy. At the head of the list is the immortality of the human soul. "Thou shalt not surely die." How intelligent Protestants can teach this lie of the devil and the papacy, is a mystery we cannot solve.

The next on the list is that blasphemous, God-dishonoring and soul-destroying papal dogma of a state of endless sin and suffering in a lake of fire and brimstone to all eternity. This caps the climax. We pity the ignorance and folly in departing from God's holy word of truth, and touching the lies of the papacy and the fables of poor fallen humanity. Without faith it is impossible to please God; for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him. Faith in God, the eternal Father, in his Son Jesus the Christ, the Savior of sinful men, and in the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, are essential in order to please God. Faith in the utterances of God's holy prophets, and in the words of Christ and his apostles are of equal value, and especially those relating to the great work of redemption and restitution, and particularly the land of Palestine which is now trodded down, desolate and forsaken. Genuine evangelical faith in the accomplishment of God's will and purpose will greatly praise, honor, and glorify him and his dear Son Jesus the Christ. Do we doubt these essential truths of divine revelation? Remember he that doubteth is condemned. God made man upright but he has sought out many inventions. Says the infidel, do you suppose we are going to believe your statement? and you a little handful, so few in number a child may write them; the great mass of the Protestant world don't believe any such thing. Can't help it, this was the cry raised against God's dear Son when he performed his astonishing miracles while in the days of his sojourn among men. Skeptic! he is coming again, and that coming is nigh, even at the door. Coming events cast their shadows before them. His coming again was the declaration to the two men in shining apparel who said, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus whom ye have seen go up into heaven shall so come again in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven. Our faith honors God by laying hold of this blessed announcement of the two angels in shining apparel. He is coming again; the same literal glorified Son of God, to reign in glory on the earth, and with him all his redeemed, immortalized brethren,—made so by a resurrection out from among the dead ones, or changing the living saints at his coming, from mortal to immortality. Thus will they ever be with the Lord; blessed, sweet, heavenly association. Amen and amen.

Go ye into all the world, preach the gospel (the good news of the kingdom of God,) he that believeth and is baptised shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned (or condemned). This Scripture is plain and positive, it means just what it says. They are the Master's own words. The meaning of the word baptize, is to dip, to immerse, to cover up, to be buried in the likeness of Christ's death. If we be planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be in the likeness of his resurrection. Buried with Christ by baptism into death like as Christ was raised up by the glory (or power) of the Father, so should we walk in newness of life. These Scriptures we have in part quoted are from Paul, the great Apostle of the Gentiles. These with many others go to confirm the truth of the great Leader who taught and spake as never man spake and taught. The beauty of all is, he set us the example by being baptised in the Jordan by John the Immerser. How shamefully has this ordinance been ignored and abused; this was the work of the man of sin, the son of perdition, whom the Lord is to destory by the brightness of his coming, with the spirit of his mouth. The sects to a great extent are alike guilty. They too have adopted that flimsy counterfeit of sprinkling or ranticing, calling it baptism, all flesh have corrupted God's ways.

A few reflections and we close. On reading Selah Merrill's account of the condition of Jerusalem and its surroundings, sorrow and depression came over me, but I soon recovered. Faith came to my assistance and I repeated and adopted the words of the poet:

> Faith, mighty faith the promise sees,
> And looks to God alone;
> Laughs at impossibilities,
> And cries, it shall be done.

We could say with Job, Though he slay me yet will I trust in him! Our next sad reflection was over the Protestant world, they having forsaken the truth of divine revelation, and trusted in the fables of men, hence those dreadful heathen dogmas, the immortality of the soul, and an endless state of sin and suffering, with many other things not taught in God's blessed Bible.

I turn over the leaf and read, Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God. Blessed are the meek, for they shall 'inherit the earth,' and delight themselves in the abundance of peace. I give you my creed, it is short and comprehensive:

Deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God.

NEWELL HOPE.

CURRENT HISTORY.

BURMAH AND ITS CAPITAL.

The war with Burmah does not attract very much attention, though it will result in the addition of a large province, hitherto called an empire, to British India. Independent Burmah has an area of one hundred and ninety thousand square miles, and, with those Shan states which pay tribute to it, her empire extends over two hundred and fifteen thousand square miles, equal to the Eastern States as far as Cincinnatti and Washington. The provinces of Arakan, taken by the British in 1826, and that of Pegu, taken in 1853, deprived it of nearly one hundred thousand square miles of territory and of all communication with the sea. Although not as fertile as the low-lying Provinces of Pegu or British Burmah, which, under British rule, has become prosperous and progressive, it has a rich soil, well watered by four great rivers, chief of which, the Irrawaddy, is the fifth or sixth largest river in the world. Rice, wheat, maize, beans, sugar, cocoa, tea, cotton and indigo are produced in large quantities with little labor. The teak forests are second only to those of Pegu and all Indian timbers flourish. Almost all the precious metals, including gold and silver, besides the useful ones—iron, tin, copper and lead, are found in paying quantities. Its marble and jades are among the finest obtainable, and its sapphire and ruby beds are very rich. Coal it possesses, only in little patches, but petroleum boils up from artesian wells, and is exported to England.

The people are of an Indo-Chinese race, being short, active, well proportioned, light in color, and considering the insecurity of individual property, are very industrious. Their manufactures of cotton, iron, copper, wood, paper and lacquerware are quite extensive. Their language, which is related closely to that of China, is soft and flexible and their literature is considerable, it being Indian in its character. Buddhism is the religion of the people. The form of government is pure despotism "tempered by assassination." A future revolution with bloodshed is an inevitable accompaniment of the accession of a king. The only exception was in the case of King Thobaw, who came to the throne through the influence of the first Queen, to whose daughter he was married. King Thebaw made up for the bloodless character of his ascent to the throne in 1878 by having an awful massacre carried out in his presence a year later, when the news of the defeat of the British in Zululand at Isandula, led him to believe that he could do so without interference on the part of the Indian Government. He almost exterminated every branch of the royal family, with the exception of his own mother-in-law and wife. Over ninety were literally butchered in his presence. One prince was dogged to death, another was tortured until he became insane, and then flung into a burial-ditch among the bodies of the other victims. The month of another was filled with gunpowder, which was exploded. Pregnant princesses were slain in the most horrible manner before the eyes of their husbands, and the young daughter of a prince who fled to British territory, and is still alive, was headed over to eight soldiers who, after gratifying their brutality, flung their insensible victim into the trench with the writhing bodies of other victims. The massacre lasted over three days, when the drunken, half-insane young demon appeared to be satiated with horrors. The British Resident, Mr. Shaw, remonstrated with the King, but he was allowed to remain and died shortly afterwards, when every mark of respect was paid to his funeral. Colonel Brown, who succeeded him as British Resident, left a few months later, when the King put to death twelve or thirteen persons suspected of being adherents of one of the exiled princes. During the last five years there has been no British resident, and relations between Burmah and British India have been strained to the utmost. They suddenly snapped when the King, some months ago, relying upon a secret treaty with agents of France, confiscated the property of a British commercial company, Mandalay, the golden city, has not long enjoyed the distinction of being the capital of Burmah. Ava, Munchobo, Pegu, Amarapoora, have successively been the capital since 1740, and Mandalay became the capital only 1857 when Pegu was lost. Mandalay, though some miles from the river, can be seen from it. The houses in the suburbs are frail structures of bamboo framework, and mat covering, with grass or palm-thatched roofs, the floors of which are raised above the ground by piles to guard against inundation. In the principal streets the majority of the houses are of brick, which, in some cases are nailed to tree timbers. The outside is plastered with lime and mud. The shops are only two stories high, but there are Chinese. Temples and monasteries are thickly scattered about the whole city. The palace of the king and double walls of brick, but the many fantastic roofs are overlaid or washed with gilt, so that it presents a gorgeous appearance, and is called the Golden Palace. The city is a mile square, and is enclosed within lofty and thick walls of bricks, which are not, however, held together by mortar. A broad and deep moat, filled with clear water, runs parallel with the walls. There are two gates on each side of the city, which are reached by a large wooden bridge over the moat. The army consists of about ten thousand men, almost destitute of discipline, but brave and active. They are armed mostly with Schneider rifles of the original pattern. There is little artillery, and no cavalry.—N. Y. Witness.

ITALIAN TOWNS.

Fermo is a beautiful town upon a mountain four miles from the Adriatic. From the Cathedral square, on the highest point of the city, seventy-two towns and cities may be seen; nearly all on the summits or sides of the Apennine peaks. Here is a statue of Giacomo Leopardi—the famous poet who was, however, not born in Tuscany, as some have lately said, but at Recanate, one of these neighboring towns, and there also a statue has been erected to his memory. Fermo has many beautiful old palaces of the fifteenth century, one of them belonging to the Countess Gigliucci—Clara Novello, the once famous singer. It has also remains of ancient Roman and mediæval architecture and sculpture and to the charms of art are added the exquisite views of the Adriatic and Apennines. But the evangelical religion has not yet penetrated to this beautiful city, except by means of colporteurs, and there is no church. Processions in honor of the Madonna frequently parade the streets, preceded by a brass band, accompanied by the noise and smoke of fire-crackers and small cannon, and followed in the evening by fireworks. I saw one of these processions on a Sunday, which is the favorite day. The Madonna, seated in a large gilt arm-chair and dressed in blue, was borne on a platform supported by men through the town, rows of kneeling men and women bending their heads low as it passed through the smoke of incense and gunpowder. Yet the people are not all so enslaved, for when lately all the New Testaments that a colporteur was selling on the public square were brought and burned by a priest, the inhabitants crowded around the colporteur on his return next day with more and bought them all.

At Chieti, near the Adriatic, and farther south, I saw four brothers of some priestly society, dressed in long white robes, with blue cowls and capes, out on the road watching a glass case, about two feet square, in which was the arm bone of Saint Rosalie. The arm, no longer round, or fair, or graceful, was expected to work the miracle of bringing rain to Chieti, and as it was about the time for autumn rains the miracle was probably wrought.

But the crowning scene of paganism and idolatry was at Loreto, on the Adriatic, where the "Holy House" of Jerusalem where Christ was born, supposed to have been borne by angels through the air and deposited on this hill, is sacred. Long before reaching the magnificent temple built around and over the "Santa Casa," the incense on the streets of rosaries, crowns, garlands, and pictures proclaims that you are approaching this "temple of Diana of the Ephesians." Should a second Paul preach there the Gospel in its simplicity, what an uproar would be created among those venders of articles of religion who assail the traveler in Italian, in French, or in English, and are determined to sell their wares! A splendid square, built up on three sides with Bishop's palaces, on the fourth by the front of the temple, is ornamented by a fountain and statues. The church within is in a continual festival. All day long and every day it is open to the crowds of contadini, who flock there from all the surrounding country, and generally make this their wedding journey. Priests in their magnificent robes say mass at several altars in the morning, and the air is filled with the heavy fragrance of swinging censers. The rough, black stones, and low, jagged walls of the supposed "Santa Casa" are hidden by a tabernacle of white marble, designed by Bramante, and adorned by sculptures and bas-reliefs of the first Italian artists. The interior, lighted by many silver lamps, is constantly filled with people on their knees, adoring the stones and a black image of the Virgin and Child that is literally covered with sparkling diamonds. Around the old house and its magnificent marble covering is a ledge or steps, around which the devout adorers have dragged themselves on their knees until the white marble is worn away in two deep lines. When the peasants leave the church they go out in companies, backward, step by step, reciting prayers, and looking upwards to the shrine where they have just paid their devotions—not to God, for he is forgotten; but to stones and images. Before leaving the building they often kneel near the door and kiss the dirty brick floor. The treasure of Loreto, consisting of jewels and other valuables, has been given chiefly to by kings and queens, and is worth $250,000 without counting the artistic value.

But although this trade is yet flourishing, all the inhabitants, even of Loreto, do not believe in it. A Catholic lady who lives in a beautiful villa on the hill near, said to me: "This is paganism. I cannot pray in that church;" and the hotel-keeper said: "In 1860 the Church of the Santa Casa was filled with wounded and dying soldiers of the Papal army, when it was defeated by the Italians." The battle which received the name of Castel Fidardo, was was really the battle of Loreto, and was fought on the plain a mile distant. It was a just retribution that this stronghold of Popery should be the very place of its defeat. At that battle the reign of the Pope over the Marche was destroyed, and he was driven to Rome, of which also ten years later, he was deprived.—Sept. Bompiani, New York Observer.

The Irrepressible Conflict.

The grog-shop is a two edged sword and cuts both ways at once. It is a rotating machine for the snaring of souls. It catches our young men and boys before they reach the church or Sabbath-school—while they are on their way—and never reach its doors, or else it catches them as they return, and more or neutralizes, the blessed lessons there imparted. Between the two there is the old "irrepressible conflict" over again. It is war to the knife, and knife to the hilt, and only one can win. And in this warfare we of Christ's army are outnumbered. There are twelve saloons to every church, and twelve barkeepers to every minister. The church opens its doors two or three days in the week. The saloon grinds on and on with its mill of destruction all the days of every week, all the months of every year. That we are outnumbered is not all. We are outgeneraled as well. The people of the rum-shop propose in their hearts not only to mar and neutralize, but to obliterate and displace the lessons of church and Sunday-school. They have their series of lessons, with which our international series cannot at all compete.

They have carefully studied the tastes, tendencies and preferences of boys and young men, their natural and innocent taste for variety, fondness for amusement, preference for young company, and they pander to all these in ways that take hold upon death.—Frances E. Willard.

CONGRATULATION.—To Delia.

"God bless you," were the only words my lips could say,
As I took your hand and kissed you on your solemn wedding day;
I had tried to frame some speech of smoothly sounding words,
Treasure full of sweetness like the trill of spring-time birds:
But the thoughts would die away as off as they arose,
And "God bless you," take their place, whatever thing I chose.
And so I think God's watchful love that speech of mine controlled,
For all and more than I'd have said, that simple prayer did hold,
Most tender wish of human hearts, its sunshine and its gold!

If he but bless, all else is thine, of peace and bliss together.
The smallest rifts and greenest fields and calm and cloudless weather;
And e'en thy troubles less will be, thy griefs less hard to bear,
If o'er the clouded way he watch with tender, pitying care,
I'm glad my Father chose for me, the words he gave were best!
I'll still repeat that prayer for thee, and leave to him the rest,
Sure that his hand will lead, my own dear footer-child,
Beyond the tempest-storms of life, and ocean, surging wild
To mansions where the ransomed walk all pure and undefiled.

The Building up of the Spiritual Temple of the Lord in the Latter Days.

When the Lord Jesus Christ was upon the earth he was in the habit of making use of illustrations drawn from natural, and sometimes from artificial, objects, as vehicles for the conveyance of spiritual truth. These parables or comparisons were generally of a homely character, and therefore the better suited to the capacities and attainments of his disciples, who were chiefly chosen from the least refined and most illiterate of mankind, 1 Cor. i. 27. It was almost impossible to misunderstand the abstract meaning of them, but their spiritual application could only be appreciated by those who had "ears to hear." On this principle it may be useful to make a comparison in reference to a great work that was commenced at the day of Pentecost, and which has been going on ever since, with more or less activity and success, in the face of what would be considered insuperable obstacles to the light of human wisdom. This work is the formation of the church of Christ, which I propose to consider under the comparison of a Holy Temple, as it is written in 1 Corinthians iii. 16, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God?" and in 1 Peter ii. 5, "Ye also are built up a spiritual house." Of this great house, in which there are a variety of vessels of different value, 2 Timothy ii. 20, every true believer in the Lord Jesus Christ forms a constituent part, and is also called upon to assist in its erection, Mark xiii. 34; Jude 20.

Supposing in the daily occurrences of this life a great work were entered upon, such as the construction of a complicated edifice, or of an extensive railway, or of a first-class ship, which necessitated the employment of a large number of workmen, it is obvious that the successful completion of the work would in a great measure depend upon the skill and diligence of the workmen employed, assuming that they were under proper surveillance. If the men were well acquainted with the nature of the work, and the principles of its construction, the work would go on prosperously, and still more so if they had a personal interest in it, such as might be the case if the work were that of a joint-stock company, and they were share-holders in it; but if on the other hand they were unskilled or indifferent, or indolent, self-willed, and concealed, not only would the completion of the work be delayed, but a great deal of what was done would have to be altered or set aside.

Let us now apply this comparison to the building up of the Church of Christ, but it should be remarked that these kind of parables do not always (to use a familiar phrase) "run on all fours," though they may contain all that is necessary for illustration. In doing this we shall find much assistance and instruction from the prophet Haggai, who was directed by the Lord to reprove his people for the manner in which they were rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem, to point out the cause of their failure, and to give them wholesome counsel. They had made great efforts to very little purpose, and had neglected the work assigned to them through attending to their own personal interests, and were called to "consider their ways." In this record of their proceedings, if we have not a completely parallel case with the work now in progress, of building up the Church, we have sufficient in common with it, to glean instruction and right feeling concerning the work required of us, and for which we shall have to render an account.

It is remembered that the nation of Israel, who were still looked upon by the Lord as his own people, notwithstanding their grievous sins and departures from God's ways and laws, and their following after their own idols, and their joining affinity with the Lord's enemies, were allowed to return from their captivity in Babylon, by the rivers of which they had sat down and wept when they remembered Zion (Ps. cxxxvii. 1), and whither they had been driven by the just judgment of their offended God, and were also directed to rebuild the temple of the Lord at Jerusalem with the ostensible view of preparing for the advent of the promised Messiah, who was coming to fulfil all that was predicted in the Word of God concerning Him. In doing this, although great efforts were made, yet they were "blown upon" by the Lord, because of their inveterate habit of walking after their own ways and seeking their own aggradizement independent of God. The prophet in addition to the encouragement he was directed to give to the Lord's people, by the promise that the Lord's Spirit should remain among them, was directed to prophesy of the time when "the desire of all nations" should come, and "the kingdoms of the heathen be overthrown." Notwithstanding the cruel treatment that the Lord Jesus received at the hands of his own people when he did come, described as "the wounds he received in the house of his friends" Zech. xiii. 6, he was still anxious to gather them together, but they "would not," Luke xiii. 34, and in consequence of his rejection a new order of things was instituted. It is interesting and instructive to trace the motive power by which God's merciful purposes towards mankind are apparently frustrated, but only to be taken up again with increased power and blessing. Some such a process is intimated in a French saying, "Il recule pour mieux sauter." The prevailing evil that brings about the calamities of God's judgments, both as regards nations and individuals, is self-exaltation in some form or other, and rejection of God's ways. Thus, in the attempt made to build the Tower of Babel, the motive was not, as has been supposed, to afford a safe refuge in the event of another deluge, but for men to "make themselves a name," Gen. xi. 4. Then in the time of Samuel, when the children of Israel, weary of the rule of Jehovah, desired a king, God's direct testimony to Samuel was that he himself had been rejected by them and not Samuel, 1 Samuel viii. 7 and x. 19. Afterwards, in the course of events, the rejection of the Lord Jesus Christ took place. This is clearly pointed out in one of the parables of the talents, Luke xix. 14; and the Jews, to fill up the measure of their iniquity, resisted the energising action of the Holy Ghost at the day of Pentecost, as testified by Stephen, Acts vii. 51. In the new order of things there is no intention whatever of setting aside God's promises to Israel as regards their national privileges, and their leading position among the nations of the earth. They are only postponed until the formation of the Church of Christ is completed, so that the present dispensation may be compared to what is known as a parenthesis in the narration of events. To revert to the prophet Haggai and the application of his prophecy to the present crisis in the history of the Church, it may readily be perceived that the result of the labors of the professing Church, in regard to the gathering out from the world a people for God, is by no means commensurate with the amount of the efforts made. As in the time of that prophet much is sown and little brought in, and the same exhortation is now needed, "Consider your ways." In so doing it will not be difficult to find out why the Lord has blown upon it," Haggai i. 9. The people of Israel were much in the same position as regards the first advent of the Messiah as the professing Church of the present day is with regard to the second advent. They interpreted the word of God concerning it according to their own inclinations, which were in favor of "smooth things," Isaiah xxx. 10, and expected to enter into all its glorious results without passing through the discipline necessary to fit them for it. So it is at the present time. Multitudes of nominal Christians who have only "the form of godliness, denying its power," 2 Timothy iii. 5, as well as probably a large majority of true believers, have mistaken the plain teachings of God's Word. They nullify the repeated commands of Christ and his apostles to "come out from the world" and be separate, and by joining affinity with the world, place themselves in a false position. The heavenly standing of the Church has gradually deteriorated ever since the alliance she made with the Roman Emperor, Constantine; and she is now walking by sight and not by faith, 2 Cor. v. 7. Hence all the gorgeous edifices for worship, multiplying everywhere, and the resumption of fulfilled typical ceremonies so far as they relate to the dresses of the priests, together with the eagerly sought for standing and position in the world, something after the ways of the Pharisees who loved to be called Rabbi, and who were severely reprobated by the Lord Jesus for their unwarranted assumptions, Matt. xxiii. All this ministering to the flesh is not only prevalent in the State churches, but it obtains more or less though not so ostensibly among the various bodies of Nonconformists. Not only is there introduced, through the wiles of Satan, another Gospel which is not another, Galatians i. 7; as regards doctrine, but also another interpretation, which is not another, of Christ's directions for the walk and conversation of the Christian.

The conversion of the world and the extension of Christ's kingdom on earth are very commonly talked about, and spasmodic efforts are made for the purpose of bringing them about; but when it is taken into account that the Church is not commissioned to attempt, or accomplish either one or the other, no wonder such efforts are not successful. With regard to the first of these two wonderful events, which are in a great measure interwoven, God in his own time, and by his own appointed means, will accomplish them.

It may be remarked here that a very superficial acquaintance with the Scriptural truths revealing the particulars of unfulfilled prophecy will show that other predicted events must have the precedence, such as the restoration and conversion of both Judah and Israel, and the destruction of the Lord's enemies now under the mysterious and unseen guidance of Satan. With regard to the extension of Christ's kingdom on earth, Christ gave no such command to his disciples. What he ordered to be done was to preach the Gospel to all nations as a witness, with the celestial purpose of the formation of his Church out from "every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation," Rev. v. 9. He distinctly repudiated the notion that his kingdom was of the world, and therefore there cannot be any extension of what has not yet commenced. True that in the fore-ordained and declared purposes of God, the kingdoms of this world, now under the spell of Satan, will eventually become "the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ," Rev. xi. 15, and shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High," Daniel vii. 26, but not whilst the Church is in the process of formation. Taking then into consideration the foregoing remarks, the only safe condition of the Lord's people in these evil times, is to take heed of the prophet's words, "Consider your ways."—By Henry Heymont, in Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman.

Sheol and the Revised Version of the Old Testament.

One of the most important words in the Old Testament is the Hebrew word sheol. It occurs very frequently, and refers, all allow, to the state of the dead.

Any one acquainted with religious controversy, knows what a great amount of discussion there has been, and continues to be, upon this state. While to us, who are ever losing those dear to us, the subject must be ever one of the deepest interest. It is therefore well that all English readers of the Old Testament should be able to judge from their English translation what the Bible really teaches upon the subject.

As it is by no means the case that all students of Scripture are agreed upon the meaning of the word sheol, we think that it should be treated by revisers and translators in one of the two following ways: They should either leave the word always untranslated, or should translate it always by the Greek word Hades, which is the invariable translation of it in the Septuagint, and which is in the opinion of all, an equivalent.

With either of these ways we should be satisfied. According to the first of them, the English reader, for whose benefit all English versions are designed, would know how often and where this word was used; he would have no sense of it forced on him by a translation which might possibly be incorrect; he would see for himself all that Scripture said about sheol, and would be perfectly qualified to draw for himself a sound conclusion as to what Scripture meant by it, and which of different meanings attached to it was most agreeable to the mind of God.

We should be perhaps even more satisfied if the second way were taken, and sheol were invariably translated by the word hades. In the first place, many think a translation preferable to the original word itself, which no doubt it is in most cases. Again, sheol is always translated by hades in the Septuagint, which is no small recommendation. Again, we have the inspired approval of the New Testament for this translation; for the Apostle Peter twice, in an inspired discourse, translates sheol by hades (Acts ii. 27, 31). If neither of these two ways be adopted, we, at all events, contend that, as sheol always means one and the same thing, it should always be translated by one and the same word; or, at least, if by different words, then by words of the same sense in the common understanding of the English readers.

The most confusing and improper mode of treating this important word, would be by translating it by words of different senses. In the first place, this would prevent the mere English reader from knowing how often and where sheol was spoken of; and even if sheol were inserted in the margin, this would not, in many cases, draw sufficient intelligent attention. While to English readers, aware that sheol was intended, the use of words of differing or opposing senses would convey the idea, that the revisers or translators thought that it had different meanings in different places. This is most injurious, for no one can maintain, with any show of reason, that sheol in the Old Testament has any but one and the same uniform meaning.

Now here is a grave error in the Authorised Version of the Old Testament. It translates sheol by three different words, "the grave," "the pit," and "hell." What is the effect? It is one or the other of the following, to very many English readers. To some it would seem as though there were three different words in Hebrew for the three expressions, and so they would be prevented from comparing together all the places where sheol occurs, and thus arriving in the only true way at its sense. To other English readers, or should translate it always by the Greek word Hades, which is the invariable translation of it in the Septuagint, and which is in the opinion of all, an equivalent. sheol was different words, "the grave," "the pit," and "hell." What is the effect? It is one or the other of the following, to very many English readers. To some it would seem as though there were three different words in Hebrew for the three expressions, and so they would be prevented from comparing together all the places where sheol occurs, and thus arriving in the only true way at its sense. To other English readers, aware that all three words were put for sheol, it would appear as though the translators of the Authorised Version of 1611, considered sheol to have two or three different, or opposing senses.

Let us consider the words, "grave" and "hell." Every one understands what is meant by "the grave." Webster defines it as "an excavation in the earth, as a place of burial." But when people come to the word "hell," as a meaning for sheol, do they attach to it this meaning? A few perhaps may know the original German sense of "hell" as equivalent to the "grave," but they are comparatively few. The vast majority understand "hell" as the place of those condemned in the final judgment, and so it is explained in the best English dictionaries. And hence those varying translations lead the ordinary English reader to the erroneous idea, that the Authorised Version attaches two most opposite senses to a word, sheol, which has certainly but one sense. A similar confusion arises from the use of the term "pit" as a translation for sheol.

Now what has the "Revised Version" of 1885 done to end these misunderstandings? The revisers might have left the word sheol untranslated. No one could fairly fault this. It could lead to no mistakes. Every one, with common care, could see what the Bible taught about sheol. Or, they might have adopted the Septuagint translation, and given us "hades." There could be no mistake and no misleading here. Every one could examine the various places where hades occurred, and see what the Old Testament taught about it, and see how far it coincided with or differed from the Greek idea of hades. What have they done? Neither of the above! On the contrary, they have, in one most important respect, added to the confusion of the Authorised Version. The latter was satisfied with giving us three translations of sheol. Its revisers have retained these three, and have in the "poetical parts" "most commonly" left sheol untranslated, so that we have what we may call four renderings instead of three.

What is the effect of this? It has the evil effects which we have seen to spring from the variety of renderings in the Authorised Version, and adds to them other and very serious ones. To these latter we will now refer.

From the Preface of the Revised Version our readers will learn, that while sheol is often left untranslated in the "poetical writings," it is sometimes translated even in them (Preface viii.). It seems very strange that when our revisers saw their way to leave sheol in general untranslated in the poetical writings, they did not also see their way to leave it always untranslated in them. But so it is, and what will frequently be the effect? It will be that many readers, aware of this difference, will suppose that the revisers thought that sheol had different senses in different places of the "poetical writings." That is a very natural inference. What else indeed could be the meaning of giving different renderings to the word in works of the same poetical character?

But there is another similar effect. In the "poetical writings," sheol is "most commonly" left untranslated. In the historical narratives, it is always translated. What inference would many readers draw from this? They would suppose that in the judgment of the revisers, sheol had, generally at least, a different meaning in the prose and poetical writings of the Old Testament. For such an opinion, we assert that there is not the smallest ground; but, most undoubtedly, the revisers would, by their treatment of the word, lead many of their readers to suppose that was their idea.

We are, then, most dissatisfied with the manner in which our revisers have treated the very important word sheol. In our opinion, it adds strongly to the objection felt by many to put the "Revised Version" in the place of the "Authorised Version". We contend that one or other of two ways of treating this word should commend itself to all, viz., either to leave it always untranslated, or always to translate it by the Greek word hades.—Henry Constable, in Rainbow.

[The foregoing "Concordance to Hades" can scarcely fail to be useful to those who wish to judge for themselves what the Bible itself teaches concerning Hades. Here the reader has all the passages in which Hades is mentioned by either of its names; and if he will consider the several contexts wherein the word is found, and bring to bear on the subject any side-lights supplied by related topics, it may safely be said that he will have before him all the evidence available for judgment, and will be in an advantageous position for drawing his own conclusions. It is not pretended that the subject is without difficulty. It may not be easy to trace through all the passages a single consistent view, nor to suggest a theory which shall do justice to all the evidence. But, meanwhile, here is a convenient and solid basis for mutual study. If any of our readers should be pleased to suggest briefly how to harmonise and clear up the various passages above given, their communications shall receive respectful attention, and be inserted in the Rainbow, if judged worthy. It is only needful to add that the general wording of the passages is from the Revised Bible, except only that, instead of its various renderings of "sheol," hades has been uniformly inserted, the readings of both A. V. & R. V., being in all cases given in parenthesis for comparison.—Ed. Rainbow.]

THE SIXTH VIAL.

"And the sixth angel poured out his vial on the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared."

The drying up of a river is a gradual process. The river may be passable before all the water is quite gone. So, if the drying up of the river Euphrates refers to the waning of the Crescent, and the continued decrease of Turkish power and territory, so the obstacles that stand in the way of the fulfilment of God's promises may be gone, while Turkey has nominal hold of the land of the Jews.

The downfall of ancient Babylon was accomplished by the drying up of the bed of the river Euphrates. The besieging army constructed a new channel for the waters of the Euphrates, turned the stream off from the city, and so dried up its old bed. The conquering army got possession by marching along the old bed of the river that they had dried up. The incident is laid hold of by the prophet in the book of Revelation to show that "the drying up of the river" is clearing the way for that hour when "Great Babylon" shall come in "remembrance before God." It is during the time of the Sixth Vial, it is said, "Behold, I come as a thief." We see the reiterated proofs of God's hand in the demolition of Turkish power. One province after another, one territory after another is wrenched from the Sultan's grasp in spite of every alliance and every treaty. The great powers combine to secure the integrity of that empire, only to show how utterly unable they are to hinder the fulfilment of God's word.

Surely no age has been so often warned as this age has! Every fresh movement in the East makes the purpose more distinct, and the impending crisis more inevitable. The world is suddenly startled by each step in the incessant decline of Turkish power; men are struck for a moment by the inexplicable repetition of the same drying up of the river, then they fall back and think it has come to nothing. No doubt there may be a little calm between the very last warning and the final act, so that there may be more danger in the moment when it seems calm than when the warning is ringing in our ears.

The world's day of probation is timed to the fraction of a second. One time ran out (fourteen generations) from the time of Abraham to David; another from David to the captivity; another time, from the captivity to the birth of Christ. Our time is the last of this dispensation, and how far gone it, indeed, must be! We are near the time of the first resurrection; there is expectation in the air, and sudden surprises are looked for now, and felt to be the characteristic of the age we live in. The time of the dead is at hand that they should be judged. Their long, silent sleep is fast drawing to its close. We are nearing the break of eternal day. The kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of God and of Christ. There will no longer be Bismarcks and German Emperors, and Czars of Russia, but the Lord will reign from pole to pole.

In this stirring age the active interference of God is becoming more solemnly apparent. Statesmen are but his servants, whether they intend to be or not. The evidence of a secret guiding hand grows stronger with every event. The approaching footstep of the Judge grows louder and more unmistakable. The path by which Turkey goes down (and so clears the road for the restoration of the Jews to their own land) and the power that shall give the finishing blow, are all predetermined. Just because Turkey holds Palestine, and the time is at hand for the restoration of the Jews, is Turkey suffering these divine judgments. Palestine is situated (with a view to the position it is to hold in the Millennium) just at the corner of three continents, and the Mediterranean Sea was formed to make a way for the western nations to reach its shores.

Soon the mystery of God shall be finished.....and, the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his saints gloriously. The Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and thy God thy glory.—The (London) Christian.

Darkness is covering the earth, and gross darkness the people of the earth; but light is sown for the righteous, and the glorious day is dawning to the watching ones. The day-star is seen only by the watchers, not the sleeping multitude. Lord help us to be faithful in sounding the warning.

THE END IS NEAR. 2 Tim. 3, 13.

Clouds of darkness gathering o'er us,
Awful things with them bear;
Scenes of misery spread before us—
Death, and pestilence, and war—
All in one loud, piercing chorus,
Tell us that the end is near.

Hearts of men within them failing
For the coming woes they fear,
All their efforts unavailing—
No propitious signs appear;
Sin increasing, crime prevailing,
Tell us that the end is near.

Selfishness in all abounding,
Gold the idol everywhere,
Worshipped by a beat confounding
Gold for all that's good and fair;
Crowds the mammon god surrounding,
Tell us that the end is near.

Lawlessness so widely spreading,
Void of reverence now, or fear;
Sacred things beneath it treading,
Stamped with God's own signature;
Never once his vengeance dreading,
Tell us that the end is near.

War, that baneful curse of nations,
Running on its dread career,
While the mass its destinies
Listless, or applauding, hear;
War, with its abominations,
Tell us that the end is near.

Saints of God, all still hoping,
Faithful to the name they bear,
For the coming Savior waiting,
To be caught up in the air,
Hence their rest and blessing darling,
Tell us that the end is near.

Sinner, would'st thou in the glory
Of that cloudless morning rise?
Would'st thou have this hope before thee—
Wear the crown saints than will wear?
Up, believe redemption's story,
Look to Christ! the end is near.

Let not earth, thy thoughts engrossing,
Cheat thee of that portion fair!
Look to Christ, on him reposing,
Thou shalt happy be, nor fear.
Secure haste! for day is closing—
Look to Christ, the end is near!

POLITICAL PROBLEMS.

How will Russia (Gog) reach the mountains of Israel? The great battle of Jehovah with Gog is on the mountains of Israel. By what route is he brought there?

The location of the conflict is clear. Ezekiel says, Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, thou, and all thy bands, and the people that (is) with thee: I will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort, and (to) the beasts of the field to be devoured. Thou shalt fall upon the open field: for I have spoken (it), saith the Lord God. So will I make my holy name known in the midst of my people. Israel. Ezek. xxxviii. 40; xxxix. 4, 5, 7. Read the entire chapters.

These points will appear: 1. Gog is the great enemy of Jehovah, and of his people, the Jews. 2. Gog, at one time, seems to be carrying out his own independent plans; at another period, to be under the perfect control of Jehovah, as the horse is subjected to the will of his rider. 3. At one time he is drawn back, at another led forward, as if two wills were conflicting—Gog purposes one thing: Jehovah quite another. Gog is bent on taking the direct and most speedy route eastward, while Jehovah has appointed another; Gog wants a spoil—East, wherever he can find it—in China, India, or Israel (in the future.) Jehovah purposes to execute judgment on him before his national throne in the land of Israel. 4. That this conflict and victory are still future. 5. That the crowning victory over Gog is after the return of Israel, subsequent to their union, conversion, and the establishment of their nationality.

There are three routes to the East now claiming special notice: a. The southern, through Egypt; b. the middle, by way of Constantinople; c. the northern, by way of the Volga, Caspian Sea, and Afghanistan. The route which the Russian autocrat would be expected to take, and which is principally through his own territory, is the great northern highway. This eastern road is principally Russian. If the northern route had been continued east, on the latitude of the mouth of the river Atrek, through Turkestan, it would then be Russian almost in the entire distance, and would suit the idea of his being crowned king of Central Asia. Its defection through Merv, Herat, and Cabool, uncovers the ultimate design of the northern bear, the crown of Southern Asia.

Since the days of Peter the Great, Russia has had aspirations toward the south. She has aimed at the conquest of the old imperial belt, containing the territory of the four universal kingdoms of the metallic image. Peter's will (if genuine) foreshadows Russian aspirations and national policy to the present time. The following is worthy of special notice. The will says: "Take every possible means of gaining Constantinople and the Indies, (for he who rules there will be the true sovereign of the world;).... Advance to the Indies which are the great depot of the world. Once there we can do without the gold of England." For more than eight hundred years, Russia has been looking toward Constantinople. At this moment her eyes are against that city, and also for the conquest of the East Indies.

By what routes is she moving? By the northern route direct to the Indies, and indirectly, by opening the middle highway to move through the prostrate Ottoman empire, by way of Anatolia, Syria, Persia and Beloochistan. Such are evidently her present secret plans.

The war now commenced in southeastern Europe, between Servia and Bulgaria, has a world-wide bearing. Russia, having in view the conquest of the Ottoman, and the absorption of its European and Asiatic territory, is, therefore, opposed to a confederacy of small kingdoms between the Danube and Constantinople. The Autocrat is working for dissolution, but against any new independent national combination: being well aware that such a political organization, drawing ultimately into itself, all the countries to the immediate vicinity of Constantinople, would, perhaps, forever, shut against her the middle and direct passage to the Orient.

It must also be evident to Russia, that it is the interest and policy of western Europe to favor such a combination, since Russian aggression, is, by the Gothic nations, and Anglo-Saxons of the north-west, well understood.

Western Europe will never submit to Russian occupation of Constantinople, unless it becomes a fatal necessity. They would as soon vacate their thrones; for it would give to Russia the Ottoman empire, and ultimately, the East and universal empire. Such results cannot be since they would be subversive of God's purposes as declared to his holy Seers.

The overthrow of the Ottoman power by Russia, would defeat God's purpose relative to the Hebrew family, Judah and Israel. Let Palestine become Russian (Gog) territory, and what would become of Jewish colonization and future nationality? It is very evident that to these movements, Russian policy is hostile. Being the acknowledged head of the Greek Church, the Jew would not be allowed any national favor; they as pilgrims, might be allowed to visit their own native land, and wail at the ruins of their ancient city, (Jerusalem), but their nationality would be chained to the hopeless sepulchre of an endless sleep.

God, in his most holy purposes, has allowed the Turk to hold Constantinople, the gate of the middle highway to the Orient, since 1453. He still allows that empire to hold back the Russian Gog, his "ancient enemy". And that power must hold the position till England and her helper, the United States, can fully secure Egypt and the land of Israel. In this great western national syndicate, may be reckoned Germany, France, and Italy. Austria's interest being identical with that of Russia, viz., to take her share of the territory of Ottoman Europe, south of her, while Russia absorbs the territory south of her present boundaries, including Constantinople. The states, as defined by the Berlin treaty, will secure south-eastern Europe from being absorbed by Russia and Austria, To this policy the four western powers, England, Germany, France and Italy must adhere. Their national interests require it; and the purposes of Jehovah develop the same line of ultimate action.

England must protect Ottoman Europe against the southern movements of the northern despot. Against the southern aggressions of the king of the north (the Russian Gog) the British empire (the king of the south) must oppose her entire military resources, whether in India, Egypt, or Ottoman Europe. Remove Turkey in Europe and Asia, and what protection has England to throw around her East Indian Empire?

The Ottoman empire is at present, her Chinese wall against her northern enemy. Remove that wall, or at any point let the Russian scale it, and that "Tempest" of the north would rush down upon her, throwing over her eastern possessions the ice mantle of the frozen pole. England, if she intends to be true to her own interest, is bound to protect Ottoman Europe. In no wise can she allow the Russian monarch to conquer and hold the Turkish Capital.

In case of such an event what would become of the European balance of power policy? In what would rest the security of any other European nation? What power could long defend, Germany and Austria against the despot of the north? And when they should fall, France and Italy would be her next victims. And after the subjection of the continental nations, the British empire would be her certain prey.

The Gothic nations of Western Europe understand their national interests too well to allow the "Crescent" to be pulled and torn into shreds by the northern "Bear." As soon might a combatant, when exposed to an enemy's darts, throw down his shield, as the western nations of Europe to allow the Turkish Empire to fall.

Why should the Ottoman Sultan be termed the "Sick Man," while she commands Jehovah's arm? Will the God of Abraham, allow Gog, his ancient enemy, to shut his people from a holy national union, on the mountains of Israel? God rules the nations now as when Nebuchadnezzar fell from his palace, in great Babylon which "he had built," to the condition of a beast in a pasture field.

The military strength of the Sultan, must be a matter of surprise to many who have represented him without any power—in the last stages of national consumption.

What are his forces mustering in, and for, the Balkans? A writer thus speaks: "Turkey's war preparations, nevertheless, continue night and day, and have now assumed unprecedented magnitude. The total forces in the field is 370,000 men, of all arms, in five corps d' armee, three of which are on the frontiers of the Balkan states and two on the Greek frontiers. The total number of men raised exceeds 600,000, of whom 180,000 are reserves, doing garrison duty. Preparations for another 100,000 men are being pushed forward at the same rate." Where is the Russian or Austrian army now ready to drive back this mighty power, at this moment ready for the conflict?

Before Russia and Austria can march their armies to the scene of action, England, with her fleet will be guarding Constantinople, and will have her base line at Gallipolis and her armies marching northward to meet the foe, while Germany, France and Italy will be moving their forces eastward to the theater of national strife.

If Russia reaches, conquers, and holds Constantinople, it will be through seas of the blood of the Gothic and Anglo-Saxon races. The proud head, imperial, of the Slavonian family in whose veins flows Norman blood, can never force his way through the middle gate, on to the mountains of Israel. He must descend from Central Asia, pass the Euphrates at the head of the forces marshaled under the subordinate kings of the East.

By the study of the prophecies compared with history we are enabled to follow the foot-prints of Jehovah as he walks among the nations. Can ye not discern the signs of the times? Ye can forecast physical changes in the heavens, because your own selfish interests are promoted by your familiarity with such knowledge, but God may thunder in the moral and political heavens, and you exclaim, "All things continue as from the beginning."

J. P. WEETHEE.

Selections.

"DISTINGUISH THE PERIODS."

The ancients had a saying, remarked a late and eloquent writer, "Distinguite tempora at concordabunt Scripturæ," "Distinguish the periods, and the Scripture will harmonize." The Jew had so fastened his attention on one portion of the prophecies, that he saw but one period—the glorious period of the Messiah's reign; and the church had for centuries so fixed its attention on one part of the prophecies only, that it saw but one period—the coming of the Messiah to be crucified. Jewish prejudices arose from partial attention to the prophecies, and Christian prejudices have arisen from partial attention to the prophecies. It should be our privilege to distinguish the periods; and while we maintain, as Christians, the literal fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy of the virgin's child, and the birth at Bethlehem as foretold by Micah, and therefore that the Messiah has come, we ought to maintain also, with the Jews, the literal interpretation of Isaiah's prophecy, that the Messiah shall reign at Jerusalem, and the prophecy of Micah that Jerusalem shall be the chief of the nations, and therein to believe with the Jews that the Messiah shall come. He has come, and he shall come. Surely this was the real nature and genius of what the angels said to the disciples, as you may read in Acts i. The disciples in astonishment saw their Divine Master carried up into the air from them, and disappearing in the clouds; and, while they were looking up in amazement, two angels appeared, and said, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven."

What was the cause? Have you ever asked yourselves, what the cause of the amazing astonishment of the disciples? Not the more physical miracle: they were too much accustomed to the physical miracles of their Master to be surprised at that merely, and to make us suppose that to have been the cause of their astonishment. How does what the angels said afterwards address itself to that "Ye men of Galilee why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner, as ye have seen him go into heaven." Was that calculated to abate their astonishment at the miracle which had taken place? Nay, but it was to assert another miracle.

How then shall we interpret the incident? What was the basis and ground of their astonishment? I think it very plain and instructive.

They had learned unmistakably that Jesus was the Messiah; they were present when they heard Peter's confession, and the remarkable approbation which was expressed of it by the Lord Jesus; they knew then that he was the Messiah, the one who was to come, and they expected great things for their nation; they knew that a number of the prophecies, still unfulfilled, were connected with the Messiah's name. They were looking for them; and when he was taken from them and put to death, their expectations were dashed to the ground. When however they saw him again after the resurrection, their expectations revived, and they said, "Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Wilt thou finish it all now? And when he had given them an answer, not indeed to reject their idea that the kingdom would be restored, but only to tell them the time was not for them to know—when he had done this, he was suddenly taken up from among them, and they were left in amazement. What were they ready to say within their own minds and hearts?

After all is he not the Messiah? Is it possible that we were wrong? And if he be, how can he have gone away, leaving so much undone that was predicted of the Messiah? He has done enough to assure us that he is the Messiah? He has fulfilled some prophecies; at his word the deaf man heard; at his word the tongue of the dumb man sang; at his word the lame man leaped for joy; at his word the dead has come to life. He must be the Messiah, and yet he is gone! No kingdom restored to Israel! No reigning at Jerusalem!

There was ground for astonishment, and in that state of astonishment the angels addressed them—

Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven, as if he had left undone what had been promised. Do you imagine that all is to be done at one time? "Distinguish the periods." He is gone it is true, but he is not gone forever—"That same Jesus whom you have seen go, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Hence the kingdom will yet come. As to what will be the order of events, the several steps towards its formation are—

First. The Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people which shall be left. Isa. xi. 11. Note: they have never yet been restored a "second time." He shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth, Isa. xi. 12. Note again, they were never in the four corners of the earth until the time of their dispersion. And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord (Amos ix. 15). This obviously is not yet. The planting of them in still future, when it shall be said, The King of Israel, even the Lord is in the midst of thee: thou shalt not see evil any more: Zeph. iii. 15. Who can read Ezek. xxxvii. and not see that Israel's return will be a literal return?

Thus saith the Lord God; Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen (nations), whether they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land: and I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel: and one King shall be King to them all, and they shall be no more two nations. Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions: but I will save them out of all their dwelling places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so shall they be my people, and I will be their God .... Moreover I will make a covenant of peace with them; ... and I will set my sanctuary in the midst of them forevermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Ezek. xxxvii. 27.

Thus Jerusalem will be in the midst of their land, and the land in the midst of the nations, and the Lord will be in the midst of Jerusalem, the great centre, and Ruler of all, forming one divine empire. This has been the expectation of the Jews from the first, and this is the teaching of the Word of God.

Wonderful to a simple student of the Word that such an one as Macaulay should have said, as if it were something strange, The Christian believes, as well as the Jews, that at some future period the present order of things will come to an end. Nay, many Christians believe that the Messiah will reign visibly over a kingdom on the earth. The number of people who will hold it is much greater than the number of Jews residing in England, many of them distinguished by rank, ability, etc. They expect that the kingdoms of the earth will be swallowed up in one divine empire.—J. Denham Smith, in Watchman.

If we will only have patience with God's leading, he will always show us the way as fast as we are really ready to go on. The trouble of most of us is that we want to see the path through to the end before we take the first step. We want to know before we start how we are to come out. But this is not God's way for us. A man who is traveling in a dark night on a country road does not have the whole way lighted at once by the lantern he carries. It shows him only one step; but as he takes that the lantern is borne forward, and another step is lighted, and then another, until in the end the whole way has been illuminated, and he is safe at his destination. God's word, as a guiding light, is a lamp unto our feet, not a sun flooding a hemisphere. In the dark night it will always show us the next step; then when we have taken that, it will show us another; and thus on, till it brings us out into the full, clear sunlight of the coming day. We need to learn well the lesson of patience, if we would have God guide us. Many of us cannot wait for him, but insist on running on faster than he leads, and then we wonder why there is no light on the path, and we complain, and are discouraged because we stumble so often. If we stay back with the lantern, it will be all right with us in our journeying.

THE COMING AGE, —OR—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. Weethee.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among intelligent people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the colors are emerging: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraph and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

The Coming Age is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years, involving the full study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. Officials fiercely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the Coming Age, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also points out that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great unseen Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Uncomprehensible Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 500 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $2.00. Send to this office for this work.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, DECEMBER 16, 1885. NO. 47.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR, payable in advance. Three and a half dollars at the end of the year.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

The Restitution advocates the full "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the Immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous; and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, Repentance, and Immersion as pre-requisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

To the Church of God in Christ Jesus Greeting.

"Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened, and heard it; and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my special treasure." Mal. iii. 16, 17.

This text, though seeming to have a especial reference to Israel and Judah, is surely not without import to us, who, in this Gentile age, claim to have been grafted into spiritual Israel by faith in the true vine—the Christ of God.

The communion and fellowship of the saints is one of the richest blessings to be enjoyed during our earthly pilgrimage. For, as the hungry system longs for that which will appease hunger, so doth the thirsty soul long for that spiritual fellowship to be experienced only when united prayer and testimony ascend as sweet incense the Most High.

Continued feebleness of body and consequent weariness of mind induced me to yield to the wish of my husband and friends at home, and accept the kindly invitation of the faithful in Ogle county, Illinois, to visit them a while, and see if change and rest would not in some measure restore that most desirable of all earthly blessings—health.

Oct. 29th I left home, St. Joseph, Mo., for Forreston, Ill., and next day was met at the depot by Bro. William Ellis, editor of the Christian Lamp, of England, who escorted me to his temporary home, where I found Sister Ellis awaiting me, and who, in true Christian courtesy, ministered to my temporal wants. I had never before met with those who call themselves Christadelphians. But I very soon learned that "where the spirit of Christ is, there is liberty," and soon we were engaged, heart and soul, conversing on the things of the kingdom and the name of Jesus Christ. There are not many of that body in Forreston, but quite a goodly congregation within a circuit of ten miles. There is, however, a goodly number of Adventists who have a hall and a regular pastor. Some of them attend the Christadelphian meetings, which are held from house to house. There are many points of difference which keep them separate. This fact is to be deplored, inasmuch as they both profess to take the same book as their standard of faith and practice, and to ignore alike all man-made creeds, and too, in unity there is strength even to the pulling down of the strongholds of the power of darkness.

I met with the Christadelphians three consecutive First days, and with them united in the breaking of bread in memory of our absent Lord's return. Preceding the memorial supper, as also after that service, we were edified by remarks of some brother on a portion of the written Word. Prayer and praise had each their appropriate place in the service. When it ended, all present joined in general conversation on some Bible theme, and those not living too far away enjoyed this social religious intercourse for hours. Like the early disciples, they eat their bread from house to house, all partaking of dinner wherever the meeting happens to be.

Brother Ellis has long been a preacher of the Word, and though I do not endorse all his positions on Scriptural doctrines, I gladly and heartily commend him as a faithful servant of the Most High. He is a deep thinker, and brings forth many gems of truth from the divine treasury. As a disputant he is patient and logical, and no doubt his labors will continue to bear fruit unto eternal life. The week before I went there he assisted four to put on the name of Christ in baptism. He occupies the Advent hall every Sunday evening—not, however, under their auspices, but in contending for the faith as he sees it.

Although as a body of believers they seem to dwell together in harmony, yet I found amongst them quite a difference in faith on various points. All, however, emphatically acknowledge the divine Sonship of Christ, the necessity of baptism, as well as many other points of doctrine commonly received by those who profess to have come out of Babylon.

I found some who very warmly advocated mortal resurrection and others who, on this subject, were in doubt, while others freely admitted that they could find no Scripture to bear out the thought of a necessity for each one to plead his own case before the judgment seat in mortal body, inasmuch as He before whom all things are naked and open—known before the beginning—is to be the judge; and He seeks not to justify Himself in the eyes of mortal man.

To my own mind there is not a passage in the entire Book that clearly sets forth such a doctrine, while we find very many texts that plainly teach the very opposite. 1 Cor. xv. 42 ought to settle this entire question. "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." Here all must at once see that the pronoun it, refers to the man dead, as its antecedent—and that corruption means a corruptible condition. Then we must admit that the dead are laid away in the ground (as the seed is put into the ground when it is sown) in a corruptible condition, and it is brought out of the ground—not in the same condition, i. e., corruptible—but the very opposite, "in incorruption." The simple fact is here stated and as such we should accept it; and not try to explain the incomprehensible works of the All Wise. They who attempt to do so are seeking to be wise above what is written, nor can they explain that which the written Word merely asserts as a fact, like the divine begottal of Jesus, we cannot explain—we are not required to do so. Only to believe. So it is in this subject of redemption. Paul is simply showing to the Corinthians that those who were put into the ground in a corruptible condition, are brought out of it in the very opposite state.

I found also some difference of faith on the Christ and the work of redemption. Some holding to the thought that the prophesy of Zacharias, Luke i 68, was fulfilled in the divine conception—that by the power of the Highest taking hold of the flesh of Mary—the flesh of Jesus was thus redeemed from the sin of Adam, etc. This view I cannot accept. As I now see the teaching of the Word; it shows that God visited His people when the Christ was begotten of Spirit, and He redeemed the Christ when he led him out of the death state, and in so doing opened the way for us to escape out of the bondage of death and corruption. To redeem is, in a Scriptural sense, to lead out of, not to bring back. To "redeem my soul from the power of death," is to lead it out of the bondage of death, as also to "ransom from the power of the grave," is to free from, not to pay a forfeit or a purchase price for that which is liberated.

The doctrine of substitution and representation, as now generally understood by Bible readers, was also talked of at different times, and I trust not altogether in vain. That Christ became the substitute for the tree of life, in the promise, Gen. iii. 15, and so represented the only source of immortal life to our race, seems not clearly understood by some. Yet when due attention has been given to this theme and the whole scheme of redemption studied out on a faithful Bible basis, no doubt this sublime truth will appear in all clearness and harmony with the entire spirit of the Word.

Although greatly refreshed by spiritual association with these dear brethren and sisters who freely gave to me the hand of fellowship, as a member of the body of Christ, and much improved in health during my three week's sojourn among them, time admonished me to return to my home and other duties. So we spoke the word farewell, hoping to renew our acquaintance, if not before, in the kingdom of God.

At Brookfield, Mo., is directly on the way, I took a stop-off ticket and visited Bro. Smith Babcock and his wife, who have been residents of that town for some years. There are some others of the faith there. Bro. S. expressed a desire that if any who are found in the faith should journey that way they would be pleased to have them tarry awhile.

Your Sister in hope of Life,
CARRIE WILLIAMS.

"The Record God has given of His Son."

Let us take this in the light of the record itself. Matt. iii. 17; xvii. 5. Luke iv. 35. "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him."

Let us take it in the light of Jesus' own assertion—"I am the Son of God!" Matt. xxvi. 63, 64; John x. 7, 18, and 30; xiv. 6, 10.

Let us take it in the light of John the Baptist's charge, not to say, "We have Abraham to our father," Matt. iii. 7; for neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children—the children of the flesh (as such) are not the children of God? Rom. ix. 7, 8.

Let us take it in the light of David's personal descendants. There Solomon, his successor, the most distinguished of them all, pronounced his loftiest attainments "vanity of vanities!" David himself sang of the child of Promise, as the "Lord!" Psa. cx 1; Acts ii. 27, 36; David as prophet spake (not of Solomon or Joseph or any natural fatherhood, but) of the resurrection of Christ.

This Jesus, hath God raised up; whereof we all are witnesses; and being at the right hand of God exalted (as David says) and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now (at Pentecost) see and hear!" —Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord (as David said) and Christ!

To sum up this, please observe, that as Abraham's and David's immediate sons were excluded, it follows of course that no one more remote than Ishmael or Solomon by natural fatherhood could fill the prophecy.

Nay, further, to exclude all more fleshly fatherhood, we have the triune assertion, that even the adopted Sonship to us, is "born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God!" This seals the special exclusion of David's and Abraham's personal fatherhood, as noted above, and leaves no room for any form of fatherhood here except that "of God" by "the woman" in the first promise, Gen. iii. 15; and in the final "record," Matt. i., Luke i., Gal. iv. 4; 1 John v. 9, 12.

Note. As "the Son of God" we have the "Greater than Solomon"! Nay more, we have "David's Lord—the second man—The Lord from heaven." Again. "The only begotten of the Father" is of right the head and heir of all things in the regeneration—"better than the angels"—"better" than Abraham—the head of the body, the church—and of all principality and power in this age and that to come; Matt. xxii. 42, 45; 1 Cor. xv. 47; Col. i. 18; ii. 10; Heb. vii. 7, 26; Eph. i. 21.

Surely our erring brethren (making Joseph his father) began and have gone on, as all error is maintained, by ignoring these primary statements of God from heaven, of Jesus, himself and his proper Lordship, and heirship over all.

They vainly try to uproot "the vine," of which believers "are the branches."

They leave God out of this and have no consistent introduction to the gospel age, the angel errand, or the angel anthem!—no reason for the return of the Prophetic Spirit, or "the Revelation of Jesus as God's Salvation!" Luke ii. 30, 31: no occasion for the enquiring of the wise men from the East, as to the birth of "the King of the Jews." Nay further, they have no propriety for John's baptism and his wondrous announcement, "Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world."

"In the love of the Spirit" brethren I beseech you to ponder our text, and these concurring Scriptures; with the position in which you put yourselves, by your unbelief, and conflict, with this wide range of revelation!—Abraham's better, David's Lord!

Nothing can be gained by opposition to the Bible view of "Jesus the Christ, the Son of the living God."

As God and angels, prophets and apostles, spare no terms in exaltation of him, how idle and perilous the opposite course must be! Rev. xxii. 18, 19. Reverently in honor of him.

The Schoolmarm's Story.

A frosty chill was in the air—
How plainly I remember;
The bright Autumnal fires had paled,
Save here and there an ember;
The sky looked hard, the hills were bare,
And three were tokens everywhere
That it had come—November.

I locked the time-worn school-house door,
The village seat of learning,
Across the smooth, well-trodden path
My homeward footsteps turning.
My heart a troubled question bore,
And in my mind as oft before,
A vexing thought was burning.

"Why is it up-hill all the way?"
Thus ran my meditations;
The lessons had gone wrong that day.
And I had lost my patience,
"Is there no way to soften care,
Aye make it easier to bear
Life's sorrows and vexations?"

As from my path way in the woods
A fallen tree was lying,
On this there sat two little girls,
And one of them was crying.
I heard her sob "And if I could,
I'd get my lesson awful good,
But what's the use of trying?"

And as the little hooded head
Sank on the other's shoulder,
The little weeper sought the arms
That opened to enfold her.
Against the young heart kind and true
She nestled close, and neither knew
That I was a beholder.

And then I heard—oh! ne'er was known
Such judgment without malice;
Nor quicker counsel ever heard
In Senate, house, or palace!
"I should have failed there, I am sure;
Don't be discouraged! try once more.
And I will help you, Alice."

"And I will help you." This is how
To soften care and grieving;
Life is made easier to bear
By helping and by giving.
Here was the answer I had sought,
And I the teacher, being taught
The secret of true living.

If "I will help you" were the rule,
How changed beyond all measure
Life would become! Each heavy load
Would be a golden treasure;
Pain and vexation be forgot;
Hope would prevail in every lot,
And life be only pleasure.

The Rescue.

Four little children were playing together near some water, when one of them fell in, and would have been drowned, had not his brother jumped in after him and pulled him out. An other brother helped to carry him home, and their little sister followed them. A little while after, their father, who had heard what had taken place, called them into his study, that he might reward them as they deserved. He then asked the first, "What did you do when you saw your brother drowning?"

"I rushed in after him and brought him out."

"You did well; here is your reward."

"And what did you do?" turning to the second.

"I helped to carry him home."

"That was right; here is your reward."

"And what did you do, when you saw your brother sicking?" speaking to the latter, being a little girl three years old.

"I prayed, papa."

"Well, that was all you could do; here is a book for you, too."

A Good Character.

Young man, one of the first things you have to consider is to build up a character. Allow us to tell you one thing about it, which we have learned from observation. It must be built like a pyramid, to be firm and lasting—broad at the base. Then the foundation must be good, or even a pyramid would crack and fall to pieces. Get a reputation from early boyhood for truth, honesty and industry, obedience to parents and teachers, and above all, piety. By and by your character will be as firm as a pyramid; a host of calumniators could not overthrow it. But if youth and early life is past, to build a character on such a beginning, would be almost as difficult as to build and poise a pyramid on its apex.

The Blind Girl.

A little girl had been attacked with sudden pain in the head, which ended in blindness. She was taken to an eminent oculist, who pronounced her incurable. She wished to know what the doctor had said about her state, and her mother told her.

"What, mother!" exclaimed the child, "am I never more to see the sun, nor the beautiful fields, nor you, my dear mother, nor my father? Oh! how shall I bear it?" She wrung her hands and wept bitterly. Nothing seemed to yield her the slightest comfort till her mother, taking a pocket Bible from the table, placed it in her hands.

"What is this, mother?" inquired the disconsolate little girl.

"It is the Bible, my child."

Immediately a score of its most consolatory passages presented themselves to her mind. She paused, turned her poor, benighted eyeballs toward the ceiling, while an angelic expression played on her countenance; and then, as if filled with the Holy Spirit, breathed forth in an impassioned but scarcely audible whisper, "Thy will be done upon earth as it is in heaven."

Garfield and the Bible.

Early in May, 1852, a strolling lecturer named Joseph Treat, came to Hiram. He was a miniature edition of the Bob Ingersoll style of philosophers; he had less brains, but this want was more than balanced by his impudence and egotism. He had read Paine's "Age of Reason," probably a few chapters of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," and the works of Andrew Jackson Davis. Thus armed and equipped, like Goliath of Gath, he went about the country defying the armies of the living God; boasting of his power to overthrow Christianity and bring discredit upon all its adherents. Of course, many of the students turned out to hear him. At the close of each speech he was accustomed to challenge any one in the audience to answer him, but for several evenings no one accepted his challenge. But one night we prevailed upon Professor Mungell to answer him. But we all felt that he was not fitted for such an encounter. The professor was a splendid Kentucky gentleman, conscientious, cultured, earnest, honest, reverent and sincere; he was not the man to deal with a braggart, who could swagger and amuse the unthinking and raise a laugh at the holiest principles of truth without compunction and without a blush. So finally we prevailed upon Mr. Garfield to agree to avail himself of the first opportunity to give the fellow such a drubbing as we all knew he could do. The opportunity soon came. Very many of the students were present, as all were expecting the encounter.

I do not think Mr. Treat had any intimation of what was to come. He made a most venomous attack upon the Bible, and charged all who believed in it with the grossest credulity. He boasted of the superiority of unbelievers over the superstitious multitude who received as true the fables of a savage age, and used all his powers of ridicule against all who accepted the teachings of the Scriptures. He also attacked the reliability of the translations of the Scriptures, showing that the Bible was written in Hebrew and Greek, and affirming that it had been translated to suit the notions of designing and dishonest priests, and was wholly unreliable either as history or revelation. He closed with his usual challenge to any one to answer his indictment.

Mr. Garfield arose and said that he had listened with great attention to the gentleman's speech; and hardly knew what to say in answer, but he would like to ask him one question. Would he be so kind as to tell the audience what was the present participle of the verb to be, in Greek, or in other words, the Greek word to correspond with the English word "being"? Mr. Treat made no answer, and Mr. Garfield repeated his question and challenged him to answer, but the poor man did not know. Then, turning to the audience, he asked them what they thought of a man traveling over the country criticising the work of the world's great scholars when he did not know the very first thing the school-boy learned in his Greek grammar. He took pains to explain to the audience that he did not reproach the gentleman because he had no knowledge of the Greek, but because he sought to overthrow the Christian faith; and dethrone the Christian's God, while passing himself off under false colors—pretending to knowledge he did not possess. He showed how the lecturer and such men as he labored only to destroy; they proposed no substitute for the Christian religion; they would rob us of the faith we learned in cradle hymns and at our mother's knee, and leave us without a chart or guide, sailing upon an unknown sea. He then uttered a most impassioned eulogy upon the Bible as the source of civilization; the creed of all the mighty nations; the accepted moral guide of all the grandest men in history; the only light through a dark world to lead a suffering and a sorrowing race to the blessed hills of eternal life and peace.

It is impossible for me to give any idea of his speech or its effect upon his audience. Before he had spoken five minutes he had the sympathy of almost the entire audience, and the applause was constant and deafening, until he began his eloquent eulogy of the sacred volume; then the audience became so orderly and quiet as a religious assembly. He spoke with a readiness and power and eloquence which was perfectly overwhelming. I do not think Mr. Treat ever attempted another speech at Hiram.—Corydon E. Fuller, in Christian Oracle.

Selections.

Prophecy—Its True Value.

What does God intend to do with this world—this great, beautiful, and populous world, the scene of so many miseries, so many mighty acts, so many Divine miracles, and so many and long-continued struggles between the powers of good and evil? Shall it be converted? If so, by what instrumentality, and when?—and that "when?" has come back from every idol temple and lofty mountain in a long and sickly echo....Or does God intend suddenly to destroy the works of his hands, to set fire to the earth, and sweep it to destruction, just at the time when multitudes were beginning to hope that signs of better days were budding forth to gladden the eyes of the nations? Shall the earth—Adam's earth, man's earth, Christ's earth—speedily be seen by startled angels flying in its orbit through the heavens, one vast intensely-heated fire, like a steamship in flames rushing madly through the hissing sea? Such awful questions as these have long engaged the thoughts of devout thinkers, but no satisfactory answer was obtained. Some few men, however, hinted that it might be well to open the books of prophecy, and to try to realize the import of the visions of holy seers. But the habits, prejudices, and theories of churches and pastors were all against that. "Meddle not with prophecy." "It cannot be understood." "Preach the Gospel," "Let prophecy alone." Such were the precepts of our teachers.

Well, but we may ask, what shall we read, if not prophecy? How much Bible will be left to us, if all its predictions be excluded? Does it honor the "Most High" to say that prophecy cannot be understood? Is it not far more likely that He intended us to be made acquainted with leading facts, by presenting them in appropriate language, than that He designed to speak so obscurely, that in effect it should amount to entire silence? Surely He is the revelator, not the concealer. Hath not God revealed them to us by His Spirit, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God? Does not Paul speak of the guilt of the people and rulers of Jerusalem, in not knowing the voices of the prophets which were read every Sabbath day? Does not Peter say that we do well to take heed to the sure word of prophecy, as to a light that shineth in a dark place? Does not John, in his preface to the Apocalypse, say, "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things that are written therein; for the time is at hand?" Was it not by consulting the prophecy of Jeremiah that the captive Daniel understood that the years of the captivity in Babylon were nearly expired? Does not the Prince of the prophets give us signs, and command us to watch them, and lift up our heads when they appear? Are not the children of Issachar celebrated as men who had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do? Is not the testimony of Jesus the spirit of prophecy? Is not the design of prophecy to bear testimony to Him? How should we know that Jesus is the Christ, but by comparing His life, doctrines, deeds, and sufferings with the prophecies that described them so long before? And as to preaching the Gospel, why, you cannot do that faithfully, nay, you cannot do it at all, if you resolve to have nothing to do with prophecy; for the Gospel is itself the fulfillment of one series of prophecies, and the utterance of another; the Gospel is the grandest prophecy in the world—a long, beautiful, and most sublime prediction, embracing heaven and earth in its mighty circumference, and resting not until earth shall be like heaven, and both shall be one in Christ. And, therefore, if we meddle not with prophecy, assuredly it will meddle with us, and the result will not be much to the credit of our discernment or our piety.—The late Dr. Wm. Leask.

Divine Impressions.

The soul is constantly open to impressions in its human intercourse. It is impossible, even should we make the attempt, to shut the door so as not to receive. On this account it is of vast moment that our associates should be chosen with a view to their purity of character. So much depends upon this thought, that no training, either in the home or in the school, can be regarded complete that disregards it.

Especially in the formation of religious character is this view important. New converts should be taught that the influence of those with whom they hold Christian fellowship is constant and powerful. Hence it is that to intimately associated with the devout and sincere is always safe, while to select chosen companionship from backslidden and fault-finding members in the Church is to expose ourselves to the greatest peril.

But there is a higher view to be considered. The soul is born for divine intercourse. In this life, just as really as in the future world, God and the soul may meet in holy intimacy. If we have the capacity of receiving impressions from others in this our human condition, it is no less true in respect to the divine. When the soul dwells in God it occupies a relationship of harmony with him, enjoys a certain identity of fellowship most favorable to growth into his perfect likeness. Absorption into that likeness unconsciously progresses amid the overvarying incidents of our mortal life; his thoughts, will, ways, have been joyfully adopted as our own.

How this is seen in the divine intercourse of prayer! Impressions that come to us while thus engaged are most sacred. There is a strength, a vividness, a holy delight in his communications to our souls at such times that truly dignify prayer above all other privileges. At the mercy-seat we learn of Jesus, hear the voice of Jesus, imbibe the spirit of Jesus. If true to him, these teachings are never afterward to be effaced.

As often as we approach the throne of grace, he will convey to our seeking souls some new instruction as to duty, some added comfort to sustain us in our distress. And all these subsequent revealings of love only serve to intensify more and more the holy impression already made upon us. Thoughts thus inspired by the Holy Spirit while we are engaged in prayer are of infinite value. They come not from self. They are transmitted from the infinite to the finite, from inexhaustible fullness to meet our pressing need, from God's heart to bless that soul which was made in his image. O, then, let us evermore live in close fellowship with him. Let our lives be an unbroken communion, a holy prayer in which our whole nature shall be silently engaged. So may we journey onward toward that higher fellowship, whose eternal union shall only serve to widen more and more our capacities for knowing, loving, and adoring the Father of our spirits, the center of all heavenly intercourse.

By complying strictly with the above, you will save us much annoyance, and your orders will be much more promptly attended to.

LET us all determine to actually do something to aid our beloved paper before the year expires. Would it not be well, in making what are termed Holiday Presents, to present THE RESTITUTION to some friend, or to some poor brother or sister unable to pay. There are numbers of this latter class as we have learned from their communications. Our poorer brethren and sisters, if furnished with the paper in this way, could aid us by showing the papers sent them to others, and thus, in effect, pay for them. No one will ever lose financially by doing something for the cause of truth. Worldly wealth, used for selfish purposes alone, only profits for a little while. "Shrouds have no pockets," and we cannot carry riches into the mysteriously solemn Beyond.

THE SABBATH.

And he said unto them, The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath; therefore the Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath.—Mark ii. 27, 28.

Being Lord of the Sabbath, and the Sabbath being made for man, it was his prerogative to do any work of mercy and compassion for human want and human suffering. This he did while the Jewish law given by Moses was binding. When the law was superseded by the Gospel, it remained his prerogative to enjoin the Sabbath, as an ordinance, with baptism and the Lord's Supper, if he had deemed it best for his disciples; but this he did not do. Neither have his inspired apostles empowered to exact observances for the church by his divine authority. So far from doing this they have never mentioned the Sabbath in their epistles but once, and that is in this language: "Let no man judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a feast day, or a new moon or a sabbath day." Col. ii. 16, R. V. This is claimed only to mean Monthly Sabbaths. So much the worse then; the inspired apostles, on this supposition, have never referred to the weekly Sabbath at all in their epistles. A strange dereliction of duty if it were binding on those under grace as it was on those under the law. Their commission was to preach the Gospel—not the law. We append the following clipping:

In Rev. Edward H. Hall's little book, "First Lessons on the Bible," prepared for the use of Sunday schools, he says: "These (Jewish Sabbath Saturday) rules Jesus refused to obey, and took every opportunity to show that whatever was right on other days was right on the Sabbath. He did many things himself on that day which others thought wicked, and which were certainly against the Jewish Scriptures, and when fault was found with him, said that the Sabbath was to make man holy, not man to make the Sabbath holy."

THE UNSPEAKABLE GIFT.

We intimated last week that we would endeavor to give the book above named a notice in this number that its pages so richly merit: but instead of giving the commendation from our own pen we give one that will more forcibly express what we would like to say than we could possibly do in as few words. The high standing of Mr. White, as an author, gives a commendation from him a worth and weight that praise from an humble source would not have.

Literary Notice, by Rev. Edward White, Pres. of the Congregational Union of England and Wales.

Mr. Pettingell, whose name is familiar to our readers, is perhaps, now that Prof. Hudson, of Cambridge, Mass., is dead, the most accomplished and persistent advocate of the doctrine of Life in Christ, in the United States; and this book is the maturest labor of his pen. He has condensed into this admirable duodecimo, the substance of the whole controversy on immortality during the last thirty years, and exhibited the result in a style of singular clearness, force, and penetration. If we were asked to mention any work, which, while not too elaborate, was yet fitted to satisfy scholars, without being unintelligible to ordinary educated readers, we should certainly fix on this book of Mr. Pettingell's as deserving of this recommendation. The entrance of a single copy of this clear and well printed volume into any congregation would inevitably commence a theological revolution of a wholesome description.....We most heartily commend this volume to our readers, begging them to observe that it is sold in England by Mr. Elliot Stock, of London.

Mr. Pettingell has conferred a service of inestimable value upon the English reading world by this, the crowning labor of his life. It is introduced to the American public by a brief preface from the pen of Mr. Edward White, of London.

Mr. Pettingell shows a wide acquaintance with the literature of the discussion, and his benignant temper is such as to obtain a hearing for his case from all except envenomed "disputers of this world." The "man of God" appears in every page dealing with divine truths in a divine manner.

To this tribute of approbation we append a short extract from the author's preface to the book. He says:—"If my dear Christian brethren who now look upon this doctrine of Eternal Life only through Christ as a dangerous heresy could, by any means, be induced to lay aside their traditional notions long enough to see how perfectly this doctrine agrees with all the plain declarations of Scripture, from first to last, how it relieves the character of God of those fearful aspersions which a heathen philosophy casts upon it, how it magnifies his holy law and makes it honorable; how it exalts and glorifies the Son of God our Savior, who redeemed us from death, and "brought Life and Immortality to light through the Gospel," how it confirms and strengthens and beautifies every doctrine of the evangelical system, and throws a flood of light upon those that have been made obscure and hard to be received; how it stops the mouths of infidels and scoffers, and takes away all their plausible objections to the Bible, and the God of the Bible, and in short, what a relief it brings to the burdened hearts of sincere believers who are wrestling with irrepressible doubts, and trying to see the justice and goodness of God through the dark clouds that a false theodicy has thrown round him; and who do love and trust him, in spite of all their doubts, and would fain commend him to others if they knew how to do it, I am sure they would most joyfully accept of this truth for themselves, and heartily thank me, as not a few have already done, for so persistently urging it upon their attention."

Arrangements have been made by the Business Agent to supply this work from this office. This book is beautifully bound in fine muslin, with back and side title. Price $1.00.

HE DIED POOR!

Who? The owner of two millions who dropped dead in his luxurious library the other day. It was said all over the great city, "He died rich." The words were uttered on Wall Street and in the mansions of Fifth Avenue, and down in the tenements of the poor. There seemed to be only one opinion among his heirs, his attorneys, his agents and his victims. But the recording angel wrote the name of Vanderbilt, in the death record, and over against it he placed the words—"He died poor."

His cold hand goes empty to his grave, for his clasp upon stocks and bonds has loosened. His vast real estates have suddenly decreased to one little lot, which he holds only as a tenant, until he is called therefrom to meet his obligations, before the Judge of all the earth.

No man ever had a better opportunity to make wise investments. "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord, and that which he hath given, will he pay him again." These are the terms of the loan, and the King of earth and heaven becomes security for the debt; but the millionaire sought weaker securities, and they have failed him in his hour of need. He goes out of his palace home with empty hand and scant apparel—out into the cold—with no friend who can help, no means which can bless him. He might have "laid up treasures in heaven." One-half of his estate invested in God's securities would have been gold, and pearls, and precious jewels now.

He gave, to be sure, to the "great charities;" his name was found in the list of "generous millionaires," but no sacrifice ever consecrated the gift. He gave a pittance from his millions, and the "widow's mite" outweighed it all, because it was to her, a loving sacrifice to the dear Master.

His treasures were all of the earth, earthy. His vanity, his pride, his balls and entertainments still live in mocking splendor upon the pages of a few old newspapers. And this is Fame! This the object of a long life! He has not even given his money to the Lord after he is done with it, he has left it to his heirs, and there is enough of it to prepay the fare of every one of them to perdition—enough to furnish wines at dinner, and checks at gambling tables; enough to paralyze heart and brain and hand with idleness and selfishness.

God pity the family who receive such an inheritance. Better, far better, the son of a poor man who has inherited body, brain and muscle; who has received from his father an inheritance of good principles and moral worth. Who is prepared to fight bravely the battle of life, and win the crown at the end of the race. Better, far better a life of poverty, trial and self-denial which is crowned with rest and peace, than a life of selfishness, ease and luxury, which is closed in death and despair. Better the thorns and then the roses—better the sacrifice and then the reward—better the trial and then the peace—better the conflict and then the rest—better the cross and then the crown.

And on the Earth Anguish of Nations. Luke xxi. 21.

This is one of the signs that redemption is at hand. See verse 28. It is one of the signs that the kingdom of God is at hand. Verse 31. Thus it is in the divine order—the kingdom and redemption come together. But if nations are to be in distress there must be a cause for this anguish; if the powers of the heavens are to be shaken there must be a force that does the shaking. The earth is shaken by internal forces, but these forces must first be disturbed or set in motion. Within the powers of the heavens there are forces or elements, and these forces can be set in motion by agitation.

From the apostle James we learn that men would heard up wealth in the last days that would be a source of anguish to them. See the Greek of the text. You heaped up wealth in the last days. Men have piled up riches in all ages, but in the last days wealth is so be a fire that is to consume the flesh of its possessor. In the apostle's vivid words we see both parties brought to view. The rich who is to weep and lament, the laborer whose loud cries enter into the ear of the Lord of armies.

Is it not a fact that the labor question is the question of the hour? The man of this generation says: The producer and distributor are the only parties that create wealth. Life is too short for millions. If men possess millions they have not created, but acquired it from labor. Hence the loud cry of labor against capital. The irrepressible conflict between the poor and the rich. What means this ironclad order known as "Knights of Labor" that is so swiftly binding the masses to its car-wheels? In all the nations it springs up as by magic. Never since the world began has there been such speculation in the staples of life, and never since the doors of creation were opened has there been such an outcry of labor against capital; and this loud cry, says James, enters unto the Lord of armies. The loud cry of wages kept back by fraud. Where else would we expect to find the Judge of all the earth, but on the side of the laborer? These outcries find vent in strikes, and these strikes are but one form of boycotting. But this conflict between labor and wealth is, after all, but a contest between men of this world, who have their portion in this life, as the interests at stake pertain to this life, and the adjustment of the contest belongs to this world. Hence the Lord of armies even now musters-th his forces for the punishment of the oppressors. If the interests involved pertained to the life to come, then the brethren that James exhorts must needs take sides.

Thus we see the four parties brought to view. The men who piled up wealth at the expense of labor, the toilers, the Lord of armies, and the brethren, and the true position of these last named is well defined in the following words: Be patient, therefore, my brethren, until the Lord comes; establish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord is nigh. Stand to one side when the wild waves of strife dash one against the other; do not enter the field of contention, lest you be engulfed by the waves. Your portion is not here; take neutral ground. But when the crisis comes this may be hard to do, and may require a full stock of patience. You may be boycotted to the extent that you can neither buy or sell; but there is one thing that you can do, if need be—you can starve, or be put to death. But you cannot afford to incur God's wrath.

Allow me to sum up the matter thus: The creators of wealth get the smallest portion thereof. Those who produce nothing pile it up and clutch it with a firm hand. He who tills the soil and creates a surplus to feed him who creates implements and fabrics, sees a third party piling up millions by buying this surplus of him and selling it to him who tolls in the shop or factory. Hence the loud cry of labor against capital.

But he looks further, and sees the rich holding the bonds of the powers or nations, and knowing that labor must create wealth to pay the interest on said bonds, he cries out again, and when labor has fully organized its bone, its sinew and its muscle for the crisis, the blow that causes the rich to weep and wail, will send anguish to the heart of the nations. It will shake the powers of the heavens. Upon the earth anguish of nations, the sea and its waves roaring, and men's hearts failing them for fear and looking at the things that are coming on the earth; for the powers of the heavens shall be shaken.

Editor Restitution:

Please find enclosed $2.00 for THE RESTITUTION. We could not think of doing without the paper, as we have taken it for fourteen years, and it is a welcome guest at our home now, as we have very little preaching here of the one faith. I sent for brother J. W. Romine to come here from Augusta, Wis. He gave two discourses in our school house on Sunday, to a very attentive congregation. Then he gave four discourses at the Bell school house, three miles from ours. He also met at Brother Nicholson's on Thursday, all expressing their hope, joining in prayer and singing. We then repaired to the school house, where we had a very good meeting. Brother Romine is a good preacher, and an earnest working Christian. I would like to have him stay here so he could speak to us once a week. He was with us one week and then left for Illinois to work at his trade. We were sorry to have him leave us, but perhaps there will be some way to get him here yet. He ought not to do anything else but proclaim the glad tidings of salvation.

I tried to secure him a place while he was here but could not. I have not given up yet.

The brethren have resolved to try and keep up meetings in the future.

Yours in hope of eternal life.

"Call upon Me and I Will Answer."

Shall we call, and calling, shall we not be heard? Command and promise are linked together. But one "if" can close the tender ear of God. He will answer, but we must call, we must come and he will bend down his ear to hear. Oh dear scattered ones, of the Household of Faith, let one uplifted prayer go up from us all for his blessing. We want to be awake; we want the little flock everywhere to arouse.

"We want them to lift the lamp for others,
That has guided their own glad feet,
To echo afar the coming message,
That has seemed to them so sweet.

He has rejoiced our hearts in bringing some precious ones to the fold. Our prayers have been answered in this, let us pray that others too may come. I have been praying, I am praying still. The God of Israel lives and he will answer me; many precious names are on my lips night and day, and already, some of them have said by the obedience of faith

"We are on the Lord's side
Savior: we are thine!"

I have clapped my hands in joy over these, others are to follow. Follow Christ and keep on praying.

Reformed Judaism.

A National Rabbinical Convention of the Reformed Hebrew Church has just been in session at Allegheny City, Pa. Rev. Dr. Kohler, of New York, who is the leader in the movement, explained its object to be to do away with some of the traditional features of Judaism, such as a national expectation of a return to Palestine. He denounced the rite of circumcision as a relic of barbarism, which had come down from savage Africa, and thought more cheerful forms of worship should be devised.

Such departures among the Jews from their ancient faith are very significant signs of the present drift away from the great verities of divine revelation, going on both in and out of the church. They are signs of that crowning apostasy, in which both Jews and Gentiles shall again combine against the Lord's Anointed. For before Christ is Antichrist. These new doctrines are a repudiation of what Paul declared before Agrippa to be "the hope of the promise which God made to our fathers;" which hope he affirmed, was "that God shall raise the dead," the pledge of which was that he had now raised up his Son, Jesus. The promises to Israel of a future in their own land are connected with the promise to renew the earth under the reign of their Messiah. These are post-resurrection promises. Circumcision was designed to teach them that man's present life was forfeited by sin, and that through severance from this body of sin and death, he might rise again into newness of life. It pointed forward, therefore, to the fulfilment of human hopes and human destiny beyond the grave. The denunciation, therefore, of circumcision as a savage rite by these enlightened (?) Jews shows an utter blindness to the vital truths of the revelation God gave to their fathers, and a complete repudiation of personal and national hopes as connected with the hope of the resurrection of the dead. Accordingly we find, in the resolutions they adopted, that the only Messiah these Hebrews looked for is "the establishment of the kingdom of truth, justice and peace among all men" through the extension of "the modern era of the universal culture of heart and intellect." We find an assertion of their belief that "the soul of man is immortal, grounding this belief on the divine nature of the human spirit," but the idea of any future human embodiment of this immortal life is rejected in those words, "We reject, as an idea not rooted in Judaism, the belief in a bodily resurrection."

Here, we are persuaded, is found the very essence of the Antichrist of the last days, whether as it exists in a Judaistic rejection of a Messiah triumphant over death, or in the Gentile repudiation of the hope of the resurrection of the dead. In both cases, the apostasy culminates in the denial of the fundamental fact of all the Scriptures, both Jewish and Christian, that "God hath raised up his Son Jesus to be both Lord and Christ." —From Words of Reconciliation.

Beareth All Things.

I sat down this morning, as usual, to read my Bible. I had trouble, which whether large or small, filled my mind for the time, and almost unfitted me to take up the mat-bless thirteenth chapter of 1st Corinthians. Still I read it over and over. I came again to the wonderful line: "Beareth all things, endureth all things." I stopped a while at the word "beareth." The commentary told me the original word meant, "Holding in, like a water-tight vessel," and adds, "the charitable man contains himself from giving vent to what selfishness would prompt under personal hardship." Reaching out for the book that would help me ("God be thanked for good books," said Channing), I traced the word in the three other places where it is found in the New Testament. In 1 Cor. ix. 12 Paul says, "We suffer all things, lest we should hinder the gospel of Christ." I did not have to suffer as Paul did, yet it is strengthening to feel I am in his company and fellowship. In 1 Thess. iii. 1-5, he says, "When we could no longer forbear," could no longer cover up or restrain our longings. The "beareth all things" began to have a life-like appearance. I began to think I could hold in, cover up, restrain, keep in a while longer, or a little more. Another commentator, as if to meet my case exactly, put a note to one of these places in these words: "We suffer without speaking or complaining." At times a "bearing man" feels, "I must let somebody know how much I have to bear, and how well I bear it." This may be a high degree of patience, but not the highest. The bearing quietly, the holding in without complaining or railing, this is more like Paul's. I felt stronger as I closed the Book and took up the work of life. May it be so, in some degree, with the reader of these lines.

The Bulgarian War.

Notwithstanding the veil that is still upon the hearts of God's ancient people in reference to his purpose toward them, and the Man whom he hath ordained and raised from the dead to confirm his promises, we, who are Christians, will recall the words of Jesus that "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of all nations until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled," and that, after her long desertion, she shall see him, and say: "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Matt. xxiii. 39. And therefore we cannot but look with interest on these movements of the nations, directed by his hidden hand, which must issue in the overthrow of the Turk's dominion, under which the Holy Land has so long lain desolate. Leading statesmen predict that the war now begun among the European provinces of the empire will probably involve the neighboring nations and all the great Powers, and that it will decide the fate of at least Turkey in Europe. This, in connection with the emigration of large numbers of Jews to Palestine, indicates that "the times of the Gentiles" are nearing their end, and "the set time to favor Zion" approaching. "God is able to graff them in again." And as Paul teaches in the 11th of Romans, the receiving of them will be "life from the dead" not only to themselves but to all mankind. May God hasten the day when there shall be but one Lord in all the earth over both Jew and Gentile, and his name one.—Words of Reconciliation.

Never a Failure.

No true life was ever a failure. It may not have been spent in the performance of what the world esteems great and noble deeds; and, according to the world's estimate, it may not have been a success. But any life spent in the faithful performance of the duties of the position in which God has placed it is a noble life, and will receive from him the highest commendation. It is not the kind of work we are called to do, but the spirit in which we engage in it, and the manner in which we perform it, that gives character and importance to our acts. The meanest service performed in proper spirit for Christ, in his estimation is sublime. Or if, in the providence of God, we are deprived of the privilege of doing, and are called only to suffer, if we patiently endure as seeing him who is invisible, under the discipline of suffering our own characters will be ennobled, our example and influence felt for good, and the sufficiency of divine grace magnified, and life, at last, instead of being a failure, will prove a grand success. We should not regard our position, whatever it may be, as insignificant and unimportant. No position is insignificant in which a man may serve and honor God. Whatever our calling may be, we should regard it as a high calling in Christ Jesus. What we do we should do as unto the Lord. A life spent in his service in any way, is a noble life, and will lead to an exalted end.

Miscellaneous.

The United States Consul at Samoa writes to the San Francisco Merchants' Exchange that "an island never before reported has been thrown up out of the sea about forty miles off the Tonga Islands, bearing toward the Fiji Islands, and in the track of California vessels. The island is two miles long and 250 feet high: and is in latitude 20:28 south, longitude 175:21 west."

Charlotte Wickliffe, colored, died last week, in Louisville, Ky., aged 117. "She has fifteen living children, the oldest nearly a hundred years old, and sixty grand children. She claims to have handed Washington a cup of water at the battle of Yorktown. Her second husband was 112 years old. She was hale and hearty until recently."

The English Weather Bureau has traced the origin and progress of the series of storms which did so much damage in the northern United States and southern Europe last October. Its origin was a typhoon which originated near the Philippines on Sept. 27. It reached California on Oct. 10, struck the Atlantic on the 18th, made little progress until the 25th, when it was augmented by a southern gale, and reached the French coast on the 27th, where it did much mischief. It expired in the Baltic on Nov. 1, having travelled 16,000 miles in thirty-six days. It was the first storm traced so far, day by day.

Crater Lake is thus described in a petition that is being numerously signed in Oregon to make a national reservation of the wonder: "The surface of the lake is 6,300 feet above sea level, and it is about eight miles long and six miles wide. It contains a circular island 800 feet high, on which is found an extinct crater which is ninety feet deep and 475 feet in diameter. In another portion of the lake is found a conical shaped rock, which is perpendicular, and rises to an altitude of 2,200 feet above the water's surface. Other rocks of remarkable form and elevation tower high above the lake. The lake walls are nearly perpendicular, and vary in altitude from 1,000 to 2,000 feet."

The Death Valley of California deserves its name. It is in the county of Inyo, Cal., is 40 miles long by about eight broad, and every portion of it is desert, and about 15 miles of its length seems to be fatal to life. The fatal thing about it is the atmosphere; and the first dangerous quality of the air is intense heat. It is often 125 deg. in the coolest part of the valley. In several places the air is excessively dry. It is said that water cannot be drunk fast enough to overcome the desiccative properties of the air. It is said that birds drop dead while flying across the valley. Its central region has never been traversed by any one who returned to describe it. It lies away below the level of the sea, while its elevated borders, also charged with death, rise from 1,200 to 2,000 feet above the sea. The deepest part is 159 feet below the ocean surface. The fatal character of this trough of death has thus far prevented accurate observation of its climate. No man could live there long enough to collect the facts.

"BE UP AND DOING."

Can any good, oh man accuse,
Through mercy's answered call to you
If, having entered at the gate,
You there in idle dalliance wait?
Or, passing on, but go astray
Across the stiles, in pleasure's way?

Ah, cheating thus yourself, you sin,
And others keep from entering.
For youthful eyes are fixed on you,
Your course they mark, your steps they view;
They fear to follow where you fail,
Begin to doubt, and so lose all.

Be up and at the work again,
Let come what will of grief and pain.
The Master left some work for you,
That never soul beside can do;
And when he comes, you may not dare,
With task undone, to meet him there.

Go pray and toil, and toil and pray,
Till toil shall end in gladsome day;
Follow the Master, he will then,
Make you glad fishermen of men,
They, share of joy shall be your own,
When Christ shall sit on David's throne.

THE GOLDEN CANDLESTICK.

There were no windows in the Tabernacle. It was a wooden erection, about 45 feet long by 15 broad, enterred from the east, and divided by a thick curtain into two chambers of unequal size. But there were no windows in it. What would be thought of an architect who would design, or a builder who would construct a house, and leave no opening for light? Either that he was very careless or very incompetent. Had God forgotten? No one can think so. Was there a defect in the plan, or a mistake in the execution? By no means. What could then be the meaning of it?

Once before, God had planned a house, it was built according to his instructions, and when the ark floated on the top of the waters it was seen that Noah had put a window in it, through which the sun shone. But the sun never shone within the tabernacle.

Did God, then, love darkness rather than light? By no means. "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." Moses was told to make everything according to the pattern of things in the heavens which he saw. Was it dark in heaven in the presence of God? So far from that, Moses' face shone so brightly when he came down from the Mount, that the people could not look upon him. The 104th Psalm describes the Almighty—"Who coverest Thyself with light as with a garment;" and Paul speaks of him as "dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto." For special purposes and on particular occasions God placed an impenetratable veil of darkness between his glorious presence and human vision. Thus the 97th Psalm says—"clouds and darkness are round about him;" and Solomon declared—"The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness." One reason given for this is that God did not wish the people to make any image or likeness of him, and therefore they "saw no manner of similitude" when he spake to them "out of the midst of the fire." Deut. iv. 15, 16.

But was the tabernacle dark? No, it was never dark. Although the sun's rays could not penetrate there, it was always light in the outer house. Of the inner house—where only one man entered, and only once a year—"the glory of God did light it," as it shall do the New Jerusalem.

But the outer house, where God was to be approached and worshipped daily, was always supplied with light, and I wish to say a little about the means God appointed for lighting the holy place. It was a Candlestick. Four points may be noticed in regard to it. (1). The Material. (2). The Workmanship. (3). the Light. (4). The Provision for its Maintenance.

1. The Material of the Candlestick.—It was made of gold. "Thou shalt make a candlestick of pure gold," Ex. xxv. 31; etc. Only the finest and most valuable of all metals was to be used. Nothing inferior was to be admitted; no dross, no alloy. Only the incorruptible, incombustible metal, which should not be tarnished by exposure, or injured by light or heat, either from itself or from without.

2. The Workmanship of the Candlestick.—It was to be fashioned by beaten work. "Of beaten work shall the candlestick be made." It was to be hammered into shape. Not cast into a mould and formed all at once, but gradually perfected by a succession of blows. Further, it was not to be plain work; but decorated and beautified; fruit and flower designs being used in the ornamentation. Not rough or coarse in finish; but polished by the best skill, shining throughout, and reflecting the light at every point. Again, it was to be made according to a model. Moses was not to cut and carve the material into any shape he pleased; he was not to consult his own taste or fancy; but the design was fully explained. A centre stem about 5ve feet high, with three branches on either side opposite each other, and a lamp placed on the top of the stem and each branch—seven in all. The command was very plain and very stringent. "All of it shall be one beaten work of pure gold." "Look that thou make them after their pattern which was shown thee in the mount." God doubtless had a purpose in specifying all details, minute though they were, helping to make up that "shadow of good things to come" referred to in the Hebrews, but this cannot be entered into here.

3. The Light of the Candlestick.—This was to be furnished by fresh vegetable oil. "Thou shalt command the children of Israel, that they bring thee pure oil olive beaten for the light, to cause the lamp to burn always." Ex. xxvii. 20. Like the gold, the oil was to be pure, and it was also to be beaten or switched, that it might be soft and clear to burn brightly and steadily. Moreover, it was to be dressed daily, so that no impurities might gather or remain; and none but the high priest, or his sons, might attend to the light. It was to be always burning, so that the officiating priests might see how to perform their sacred duties. Ex. xxx. 7, 8; Lev. xxiv. 1, 4.

4. The Provision for its Maintenance.—This was to be from the voluntary contributions of the people, both men and women. "Take ye from among you an offering unto the Lord; whosoever is of a willing heart, let him bring it, an offering of the Lord, gold, ....and oil for the light. ....And they came both men and women." Ex. xxxv. It was not a tax despotically imposed, and grudgingly given; but a hearty, spontaneous gift. So free and abundant was the offering, that it had to be checked. Those in charge reported—"The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work which the Lord commanded to make. And Moses gave commandment, and they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, saying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary. So the people were restrained from bringing; for the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much." Happy people! whose first love was so full and prompt and generous. Blessed light! the outcome of such instituted love. Alas! that that love should have waxed cold, and that the only relic of that lampstand now is its figure traced on an old stone, raised in triumph by the heathen nation who dispersed the people, destroyed their city, and extinguished the light of the house of God.

But there are other candlesticks mentioned in Scripture with which we have a closer connection. When John was in the isle of Patmos, he heard a trumpet-sounding voice, and looking round to see the speaker, he saw seven golden candlesticks. These were explained to be symbolical of seven churches, Rev. i. 20; and I understand the figure seven to be representative also. The seven messages, no doubt, applied in the first instance to the churches named, and existing when the apostle wrote; but they have unquestionably a wider application. Every message has this postscript:—"He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." This is noteworthy. It is not said simply—"Let every member of the church at Ephesus, etc., hear what the Spirit says to you." But every Christian, whatever his locality or speech, who comes within range or hearing of those letters, is invited to listen. There are promises and threatenings here addressed to certain specified churches, but they are intended for all servants of Christ who are in similar positions. Let us try to take from this vision some of the instruction which it is fitted to convey, and observe some resemblances between the thing symbolized by the Apocalyptic candlestick and the lampstand of the Tabernacle.

Retaining our previous order we notice—

(1). The Material.—In both cases it was the same gold; pure gold. The church is to be composed of the best, most precious material among men, purified from dross. Nothing but this will suffice for the structure of those who are to be God's lights in the world. Not only must it be pure, but indestructible and incorruptible; able to withstand persecution and trial, opposition and neglect, and to come through the furnace of tribulation undimmed in lustre, unstained in character. Because the church of Laodicea was lacking in this strength of faith and fortitude of zeal, the Spirit's warning words were:—"I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich." Only that which has been refined, then, in the Christian character, and which will endure; which will neither tarnish nor diminish; is fit to stand for a light in the temple which God is now building up of those who, among the Gentiles, fear his name.

(2). Workmanship.—Here again the requirements under the law and in the church are identical. Perfection is to be reached, not by the momentary act of casting in a mould once for all, but by a gradual process which, in the case of the believers, as a time of preparation, embraces the present life. Christ himself—the true light of the world—learned obedience by the things which he suffered, and was made perfect through these sufferings. He is the pattern also after which we are to be fashioned. "Until Christ be formed in you," is one way in which the apostle puts it. We are to adorn his doctrine, and "the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit" is one of the graces commended. There must be more than mere confession, there must be a living practice. The Divine model is far from being "nothing but leaves." Fruit as well as flower is necessary; a patient continuance in well-doing must testify that the confession of the lips is the unfeigned determination of the heart. There must be a constant garnishing of the Christian character with the sevenfold graces of virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and love. These are added through much tribulation and many trials, that the purifying of our faith may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing. Their possession makes us neither idle nor unfruitful now, but to abound in the things that are lovely and of good report. Such richly adorned ones shall never fail, but shall shed their light from every point; and in the great day of the Lamb shall shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars for ever and ever.

(3). The Light.—"The fire shall be ever burning upon the altar; it shall never go out." Lev. vi. 13. It is exceedingly probable that the lamps on the candlestick were lighted from the altar, which burned with a fire that came "out from before the Lord," Lev. ix. 24; and the two sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, were consumed by the very flame which they dishonored when they "offered strange fire before the Lord." No other source, at any rate, is indicated, so that the light which illuminated the house of God in old times was not of human origin, but was lit at the sacred flame kindled by the God of heaven. Neither is the light of the Church of man's production—"The Lamb is the light thereof." "I am the Light of the world" is his own testimony and more especially does He give light to them who are his own house. He is the Word made flesh, the living embodiment of that Word which is a light to the feet and a lamp to the path; that sure word of prophecy whereunto we do well that we take heed as unto a light that shineth in a dark place. The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy, its very essence—to him gave all the prophets witness, he is, as it were, the central light, of which all the others were but scintillations—the true light which, coming into the world, lighteth every man. How many have erred by giving heed to false lights, by using that "strange fire" found in traditions of the fathers, theology of creeds, and teaching of sects. Of his own will begat he us with the Word of truth, not with wisdom of men; and his word and spirit form the only light now given to believers for guidance, until he comes back in power and beauty as the bright and morning Star, that his glory may be fully seen and shared by all who are worthy to be changed into his likeness.

Just as the tabernacle lamps were daily trimmed and replenished, so we need constant supplies of heavenly light. We cannot take enough at one time to serve all future need. "Give us for the day our daily bread," applies as forcibly and necessarily to the wants of our inner man as to those of our physical frame; and they that come oftenest to the Divine storehouse, to him who giveth to all liberally, without upbraiding, will show most fully that they have been illuminated by him who is the "Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

(4). The Provision for the Maintenance of the Light.—Under the law, this was the free will offering of the people, and the Church of God will only preserve its light now by the use of the same means. The first work of the Israelites was to give so readily and bountifully, that they gave more than enough, and had to be restrained. The church at Ephesus was warned that it had left its first love, and if it did not repent and do the first works, its candlestick would be removed out of its place. What a sad humiliation! That a church which had been shining only Jerusalem with the fulness of the Gentiles, they will then come "with songs of everlasting joy upon their heads."—New York Observer.

A desire has been expressed, on the part of one of our readers, to have THE RESTITUTION give some account from time to time of the way and manner in which the Sacred Scriptures have been translated from the original tongues into the more modern languages. This subject has been presented, to quite an extent, to the readers of the New York Observer within the last year or two. With due acknowledgement we have transferred several of these articles from that excellent paper to the columns of THE RESTITUTION.

For the current number of our paper we give another interesting article from the same Journal—The First American Bible—which was printed in the Indian language, and which, it is said, only one individual now living, can read.

The First American Bible.

Dr. Wendell Prime's articles in your columns on the first Latin Bibles having excited a good deal of interest, I propose to supplement those bibliographical papers by an account of the First American Bible, or Eliot's Indian Bible.

John Eliot, born at Nasing, Essex, England, in 1604, emigrated to Boston, Massachusetts, in 1631, acquired the language of the Indians, and engaged with great zeal in the work of their conversion to Christianity, in which he was so successful that he became known by the title of "The Apostle of the North American Indians." "The Apostle—and truly I know not who, since Peter and Paul, better deserves that name." (Edward Everett: Oration at Dorchester, Mass., July 4, 1835.)

Cotton Mather, in his "Magnalia," waxes warm when he attempts to describe the virtues of this excellent man. "Having implored the assistance and acceptance of that God whose blessed word has told us 'The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance,' I am attempting to write the life of a righteous person, concerning whom all things but the meanness of the writer invite the reader to expect nothing save what is truly extraordinary. It is the life of one who has better and greater things to be affirmed of him than could ever be reported concerning any of those famous men which have been celebrated by the pens of a Plutarch, a Pliny, Laertius, a Nuncpius, or in any Pagan histories. It is the life of one whose character might very agreeably be looked for among the collections of a Dorotheus, or the orations of a Nazianzen; or is worthy, at least, of nothing less than the exquisite style of a Melchior Adam to eternize it."

The following collation and comments are taken from "An Essay towards an Indian Bibliography. Being a Catalogue of Books relating to the History, Antiquities, Languages, Customs, Religion, Wars, Literature, and Origin of the American Indians, in the Library of Thomas W. Field. With Bibliographical and Historical Notes, and Synopses of the Contents of some of the Works least known. New York, 1873. 8vo.

"The | Holy Bible: | containing the | Old Testament | and the New, | Translated into the | Indian Language | and | Ordered to be printed by the Commissioners of the United Colonies | in New England. | At the Charge, and with the Consent of the | Corporation in England | For the Propagation of the Gospel amongst the Indians | in New England. | Cambridge: | Printed by Samuel Green and Marmaduke Johnson. | MDCLXIII.

"The collation of this memorable work of the Apostle Eliot is rendered much more difficult by the entire absence of pagination, and the variations made apparently by the translator himself. A few copies, sold by Thomas to have been not more than twenty, were sent to England, with a dedication to King Charles of two leaves. Others have an English title in place of the Indian, and a few have both. A perfect copy may be deemed to consist of the following named contents: Title 1 leaf | Contents 1 leaf | Text A to M. m. m. m. in fours, or 416 for the Old Testament. Title of the New Testament: Wusku | Wuttestamentum, | Nul-lordunnum | Jesus Christ. |

"Nuppoquohwususeonum. | Cambridge: Printed by Samuel Green and Marmaduke Johnson. | MDCLXI. 1 leaf. Verso blank. Text: Matthew to the end of Luke, signatures A2 to reverse of L4. John to Revelations, As to reverse of Xx8 all in fours. Psalms.

"V Vame Ketoohomeankatoo homson gash | David, signatures I1 to N. in fours. Noowomoo (Catechism) 1 leaf. Total leaves of New Testament, Psalms, and Catechism, 178, or 594 leaves for the complete work.

"It will be seen that the New Testament was printed two years previous to the other portion of the Scriptures. Not the least of the many features of interest which concentrate in this volume are the statements of undoubted authorities, that Eliot was engaged for ten years in its translation; that it was the first Bible printed in America; that a large portion of the composition in the printing of the second edition, at least, was performed by Indian James; and that the work was three years in passing through the press. But it exists for us like some vast monolith erected by a race which has passed away. Every individual who could speak or understand the divine words in that tongue perished a century ago. It remained for a scholar of our generation, Mr. J. Hammond Trumbull, to revive this extinct language, and he has found in its study something more than the mere gratification of literary curiosity. The edition of fifteen hundred copies recommended to be printed by the Corporation was exhausted in twenty years. Even the two hundred copies of the New Testament, strongly bound in leather for the immediate use of the Indians, were probably worn out. Accordingly, in 1680 another edition of two thousand of the New Testament was printed, and in 1685 the same number of the Old Testament. The second edition is complete with 607 leaves, the Old Testament containing 425; the New Testament 181; Psalms and Catechism 51 leaves. Eliot did not receive from the Pilgrim fathers that aid in his great work which he had a right to demand. The funds raised in England for Christianising the Indians were diverted from that purpose by the Puritan authorities; and it was not until peremptory orders from the Corporation compelled them to restore them that he found them available for his designs.

"Although this work was considered so exceedingly rare a few years since that it was asserted that but three copies were known to exist, the zeal of American bibliophilists has brought to light in this country no less than twenty-three copies of the first edition. They are distributed in the libraries of the following named gentlemen: Hon. Henry C. Murphy, Brooklyn, L. I., 2; Mr. T. W. Field, Brooklyn, L. I., 1; Mr. John H. King (deceased), Jamaica, L. I., 1; Mr. John G. Gardiner, Gardiners, L. I., 1; Long Island Historical Society (very imperfect) L. I., 1; Mr. James Lenox, New York, 2; Mr. William Menzies, New York, 1; Mr. Edward Everett (deceased), Boston, 1; Mr. George Brinley, Hartford, 1: Mr. J. Hammond Trumbull, Hartford, 1; Mr. John Carter Brown, Providence, 1; Mr. George Livermore (deceased), Cambridge, 1; Harvard University, 1; American Antiquarian Society, 1; Boston Athenæum, 1; Massachusetts Historical Society, 1; Brown University, 1; Congregational church, Newport, 1; Logenian Library, Philadelphia, 1; American Phil. Society, Philadelphia, 1.

"Notwithstanding this considerable number of known copies in this country, in addition to at least nine in Europe, the price of each successive copy offered for sale has been greatly augmented above the last. The copy belonging to Mr. John A. Rice had been bought for £100 in 1853, but was sold in 1869 for $1,050. Twenty years since Mr. Murphy bought one of these copies in London for twenty shillings, and in 1870 Mr. Quaritch [Quaritch] sold another for £254, or nearly two thousand dollars of the United States currency of that date." Pp. 119, 120. The value of a copy in good order of the first edition, 1663, of Eliot's Indian Bible is about $1,200.

"Mr. Eliot translated the Bible into a dialect of what is called the Mohegan tongue, a language spoken by all the New England Indians, essentially the same, but varied by different dialects among the several tribes. By Eliot and others it was called the Massachusetts language." (Dr. Conyers Francis's Life of Eliot in Spark's Library of American Biography, Vol. V., p. 280.)

"We asked him [John Eliot] for an Indian Bible. He said in the late Indian war all the Bibles and Testaments were carried away, and burnt or destroyed, so that he had not been able to save any for himself, but a new edition was in press, which he hoped would be much better than the first one, though that was not to be despised. We inquired whether any part of the old or new edition could be obtained by purchase, and whether there was any grammar of this language in English. Whereupon he went and brought us the Old Testament, and also the New Testament, made up with some sheets of the new edition, so that we had the Old and New Testaments complete. He also brought us two or three small specimens of the grammar. We asked him what we should pay him for them; but he desired nothing. We presented him our Declaratis in Latin." (Journal of a Voyage to New York, etc., in 1679-80, by Jasper Dankers and Peter Sluyter, translated by Henry C. Murphy, Brooklyn, 1867, 8vo., p. 388.)

"He [John Eliot] presented me with twelve Indian Bibles and desired me to bring one of them over to Dr. Annesley; as also with twelve speeches of Converted Indians, which himself had published." (John Dutton: Life and Errors, Com. 1818, Vol. I.)

Dr. Livingston was not well informed respecting the Indian Bible. Referring to his father-in-law's translation of the Bible into one of the African tongues he remarks:

"It would certainly be no cause for congratulation if the Bechuana Bible seemed as all likely to meet the fate of Eliot's Choctaw version, a specimen of which may be seen in the library of one of the American colleges, as God's Word in a language which no living tongue can articulate, nor living mortal understand." (Dr. Livingstone: Travels and Researches in South Africa, Com. 1857, 8vo, p. 115.)

The largest collection of the Eliot Bibles is in the Lenox Library, New York, where there are three, copies of the first edition, 1663; two copies of second edition, 1685, and the New Testament, 1661; also the following works of Eliot: "Indian Grammar," 1666; "Communion of Churches," 1665; "The Harmony of the Gospels." 1678; "A brief Answer to a small Book written by John Norcot against Infant Baptisme," 1678; "Dying Speeches of Several Indians," 168—, and an autograph letter of John Eliot (this last one of a number of valuable presents from Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, LL. D., of Boston).—S. Austin Allibone, LL. D., in New York Observer.

Job's Country.

"The whole book of Job seems to have been chiefly written and placed in the inspired volume in order to show the value of natural history and its power on the human heart. I cannot pass by it without pointing out the evidences of the beauty of the country that Job inhabited. Observe, first, it was an arable country. 'The oxen were plowing, and the asses were feeding beside them.' It was a pastoral country; his abundance, besides camels and asses, was 7000 sheep. It was a mountain country, fed by streams descending from them. 'My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away: which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid: what time they wax warm they vanish: when it is hot they are consumed out of their place.' Again 'If I wash myself with snow water, and make my hands never so clean.' Again, 'Drought and heat consume the snow-water.' It was a rocky country, with forests and verdure rooted in the rocks. 'His branch sprouteth forth in the garden; his roots are wrapped about the heap, and seeth the place of stones.' Again, 'thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field.' It was a place visited, like the valleys of Switzerland, by convulsions and falls of mountains. 'Surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of its place.' 'The waters wear the stones; thou washest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth.' 'He removeth the mountains and they know not; He overturneth them in his anger.' 'He putteth forth his hand upon the rock: he overturneth the mountains by the roots: he cutteth out rivers among the rocks.' I have not time to go further into this: but you see Job's country was full of pleasant brooks and rivers, rushing among the rocks, of all other sweet and noble elements of landscape. The magnificent allusions to natural scenery throughout the book are therefore calculated to touch the heart to the end of time."—John Ruskin.

The great decision of eternity rests upon the results of faith carried into action. The word of joy and blessing with which the Master shall gladden the hearts of his children is, not "Well thought," or "Well said," but "Well done." A faith that is worth having is worth shaping into words; and a faith that is worth confessing is worth translating into acts. "Whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."

PALESTINE.

O sacred land! o'er vale and hill
Sweet voices seem to echo still;
Thy mountains rise, thy rivers flow,
Replete with tales of long ago.

And o'er the outline of thy sand,
The waves, tossed by the passing breeze,
Foreshadow this moment, as of yore,
Break with sweet music on the shore.

The blessed book of gospel grace
Was molded on thy furrowed face;
Thy rugged lineaments compare
With every line recorded there.

Thy roads were trod, thy streamlets cold
Were quaffed by holy men of old;
Their deeds and days were numbered here
With every warning, every prayer.

Here was the Savior's humble birth;
And, in his mansion here on earth,
He trod on foot from place to place,
The sick to heal, the poor to bless.

The garden's gloom and agony
And all the scenes of Calvary
Do still a hallowed lustre shed,
That time and change can never fade.

And never tale of other land,
Nor fiction strange, nor poet grand,
Can move the hearts of young or old
Like that sweet story simply told.

Arab and Turk, each babbling tongue
Of rude barbarism, Gentile throng,
Know little of the dust they tread,
That round them lie the mighty dead.

For many a patriarch, many a seer,
Hold still their silent resting here,
And wait the illustrious day that brings
The coming of the King of kings.

O wasted land! one charge for thee,
The whole creation waits to see,
When change and strife and war shall cease,
And nature in eternal peace.

Popery and Paganism.

The following extracts from an old paper, will show the pagan origin of several Papal rites and customs, and many others of them may be traced to the same source:

THE SUPREMACY OF THE POPE.

The high priest, or Pontifex Maximus, of old Rome, possessed the greatest authority and dignity in the republic, and, according to the expressed statements of Cicero and Livy, was considered arbitor and judge of all things, civil as well as sacred, human as well as divine; all other priests were subject to him; he was chosen from the college of Pontifices, just as the Pope is chosen from the order of cardinals and he retained his office for life.

THE BURNING OF LIGHTS ON ALTARS.

Every one, in the slightest degree acquainted with Popish countries, knows that this practice is to be seen everywhere and at all times, and the perpetual lamps and candles of heathen antiquity are likewise constantly referred to by such authors as Pliny, Cicero, Virgil, etc. The primitive Christians were accustomed to expose the absurdity of this practice. How little did they think that it would be adopted by their own descendants! "They light up their candles to God," says Lactantius, "as if he lived in the dark;" but do they not deserve to rank as madmen who offer lamps to the Author and Giver of Light?"

VOTIVE OFFERINGS.

These, too, it is well known, are to be seen suspended everywhere before the shrine of the Virgin and the saints, either pictures of cures wrought through the instrumentality of saints, or small waxed models of legs, arms, hands, feet, horses, oxen, etc., as the case may be. They are exact copies of heathen originals, to be seen at this very hour in the British Museum, and in the cabinets of lovers of antiquity. No one ancient heathen custom is so frequently mentioned.

INCENSE.

In all the old sculptures of heathen sacrifice, may be seen a boy, in a sacred habit, attending the priest in his white garment with a small box of incense for the altar, just in the same manner as the priest of the Church of Rome is attended at this very day. With such fortitude did the first Christian martyrs oppose the use of incense, that a mode of trying and convicting them was merely to throw a grain of it into the censer, or on the altar, and upon their refusal to do so their lives were forfeited.

CANONIZATION.

The ancient priests found it necessary to persuade the people that certain individuals, many of whom, as for instance, the Cæsars, had been monsters of iniquity, were honored by the especial favor of heaven, and worthy to be placed among the gods themselves. In consequence of which their public deification took place, with every circumstance calculated to impose upon a gross and idolatrous people.—In order, however, to the validity of the ceremony, it was necessary for some duly attested miracle to be performed as an intimation of the favor and will of heaven. How closely this Pagan original has been copied by the institution of certain individuals by modern Rome, and not without the machinery of miracles likewise, it is almost needless to remark. Nor are the character of many thus canonized, of a much higher moral standard than their heathen prototypes.

HOLY WATER.

The aquantiaram of the Romans was a vase of holy water, placed by the heathens at the entrance to their temples, wherewith to sprinkle themselves. And it is remarkable that the Jesuit Lascrda, in a note on Virgil, (Æn. 6, 230,) himself observes, "Hence was derived the custom of our holy church to provide purifying or holy water at the entrance of the churches." The early fathers speak of it as a custom purely heathenish, and condemn it as impious and detestable.

PILGRIMAGES.

The ancients believed, as indeed many modern pagans do in the present day, that some places were more holy than others; that visiting such places was highly meritorious, that it tended to satisfy Divine justice, and to obtain the favor of heaven; pilgrimages to such spots were constantly an essential part of their religion.

PROCESSIONS.

"By the establishment," says Plutarch, "of supplications and processions to the gods, which inspire reverence while they amuse the spectators, and by pretended miracles and Divine appearances, he (Numa) reduced the fierce spirits of his subjects under the power of superstition."—(Plutarch, in Numa Pompilius.) The following is a description of one of the religious processions by Apuleius:—"The chief magistrate used frequently to assist, in his robes of ceremony, attended by priests in white vestments, with wax candles in their hands, carrying upon a pageant, or throne, the images of their gods, dressed out in their best clothes; these were followed by the chief youths, in white linen vestments, singing in honor of the god whose festival they were celebrating, accompanied by crowds of persons of the same religion, with flambeaux or wax candles in their hands." Can any one read this passage without being reminded of pageantry to be witnessed every day in such countries as Italy, Spain, and Portugal?

LYING WONDERS.

The wiser heathen no more believed in the truth of their prodigies, than do the modern priests of Rome give credit to the legends to be met with in their Martyrologies, Lives of the Saints, etc.; but, exactly like their successors, they defended them as "pious frauds," to which it was necessary to resort, in "order to keep up the devotion of the people.

Rome boasts of antiquity, and it may be conceded to her, but it is antiquity of a more remote and darker age than that to which she lays so authoritative a claim.—Her doctrines and her practices may well shun the light, for they savor of a period ere yet the Sun of Righteousness had arisen upon this benighted world. To dispel such darkness was the first object of his appearing.

AN UNHOLY ALLIANCE.

A disastrous mistake was made by the Church early in her history, and repeated again and again in spite of warnings and punishments. She has failed to keep herself from the World-Power. She has watched the struggles of potentates and politicians, and her sympathies have been given to one or the other party in every combat. She has also at times rendered her assistance, receiving in return worldly protection, wealth, and honor. She has displayed her power, and it has been recognized and courted by worldly men for their own purposes. An alliance has been made, and the Church has been deceived, her purity stained, her spirituality lowered, and her power weakened. The cause has chiefly been in every age that she has forgotten that the world is passing away, and that her Lord may come at any moment to summon her to meet him in the air. The effect of the Church's policy in clinging to the World-Power, has been stupendous indeed! She has fastened herself on to what is doomed to destruction.

She has been like a piece of moss clinging to a loose boulder which the roaring torrent shall presently hurl down into the abyss beneath, shivering it into a thousand atoms, when she should have clung to the rock from which the relentless waters will loosen nothing. How Satan has striven to deprive the Lord of "His peculiar people!" He died for the Church, and the powers of the air, unable to destroy the Lord of Glory, aimed primarily at the destruction, and, secondarily, at the alienation of the love of those he suffered in order to redeem.

The Christian hope of the Lord's descent into the air for his people was stilled by the god of this age, from the days the apostles slept, down to the present century! Nay, so far from there being "hope," there were actual panics at the thought he was coming! What a sad perversion of the Scriptures! And all owing to the Church having withdrawn her gaze from the personality of the King! Thus at the end of the sixth century, when an opposition Pope had been proclaimed at Constantinople, he was pointed at as the Anti-Christ, and there having been great disasters throughout Christendom, affecting more particularly the property of the Church, a belief arose that the end of the world was at hand. On that occasion Pope Gregory the Great thus expressed himself: "We know from the Word of Almighty God that the end of the present world is now at hand, and that the reign of saints is about to commence. And now that the end of the world is approaching, many things will take place which have not happened before. For there will be atmospheric changes, terrors from heaven, deranged seasons, wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places." There is not a word about the personality of the Lord Jesus in that speech, and even by "saints" he meant a very different thing from what we do.

At the end of the tenth century there was a worse panic. Then it was not the commencement of the reign of the saints that was spoken about, but the end of it. The thousand years were reckoned from the date of the Nativity, and Christ and his saints had been reigning through the apostles, the fathers, and the Church of Rome. Well, if men could believe that they could believe anything! But it was, nevertheless, the logical result of the Church's attempt to assume that the Christian hope had been realized, and to account for the anomalous position Christians had been taking up—ruling when they should have been witnessing against the World-Power. The Church is still making the same mistake of entangling itself with the World-Power. It is not satisfied with praying to God and petitioning the Legislature for its requirements, but it is apostantly threatening administrations with the exercise of a casting vote between parties. Thus "coercion" is still the watchword. Under such a principle Christians became partakers of the deeds of what Christ is coming to destroy.

This coercion is a thing hateful to God. Peter was told to put up his sword. The same admonition then given to Peter is repeated in Rev. xiii. 10, to the saints in the latter days: "He that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword—here is the patience and the faith of the saints." The use of the sword is the coarse form of coercion, perhaps, but the use of the suffrage, the effective weapon in the present day, implies the same principle. But if we want to have a clear understanding of the failures of the Church Corporate, and the principle underlying them, we must examine the epistles to the Churches in Revelation, chapters ii. and iii., which give in symbol the Prophetic History of Christendom, from apostolic times down to the Lord's coming. In the early period the Church was commended for hating the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, Rev. ii. 6, which the Lord also hates. But when the Church in the time of Constantine began to ride upon the World-Power, she is charged with having within her "them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes," and, as if the more strongly to emphasize his condemnation of the doctrine, he repeats the words "which thing I hate." Who or what the Nicolaitanes were is a matter of opinion. But the meaning of the word is clear enough. It is derived from nikao, to conquer, and people, and it would thus appear that those who held this doctrine advocated "the subjugation of the peoples," i. e., a general coercion of political adversaries. Verily were the people beat to the will of the Church Corporate!

The word "Laodicea," on the other hand, means "the people's rights," being derived from laos, "people," and dikē, "right, law." Thus the last stage becomes worse than the first; and the Lord declines to own such a body altogether, casting it from him in utter disgust, Rev. iii. 16. Here, the people are not coerced by the Church, as in the Nicolaitan stage, but they are coercing the Church, and the Church itself is perfectly satisfied with such coercion, even to the extent of giving its own voice to that of the people.

The unholy alliance will be continued until the end. We shall yet see the Church seated on the beast and allied with spiritualism and error of all kinds. She will utterly lose her spirituality, and even those who courted her will cast her off. It is the duty of those whom God has chosen to watch always, to keep clear of the World-Power, and to centre their hopes and their love on him who will soon come to call those who wait for him out of the world—the bride to meet the Bridegroom.—G. Warrand Houghton, Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

Infidelity of our Times.

Under the present phase of infidelity, much is said of God. If frequent repetition of the sacred name could sanctify a cause, theirs would be hallowed indeed. But their God is not our God: not the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; not even a personal God. The more they talk of God, the less they believe in him. In their disguised atheism the term implies the the sum of all things, or the everlasting unfolding process of causes, or the universal reason as existing in all minds! Sometimes, in their glorification of humanity, they utter the Scriptural phrase, "God is man;" but their inward meaning is, that man is God. Man is the object of their adoration. The highest manifestation of God, say they, is in the human mind. This they dishonestly name at times, the incarnation. Never before has the world seen so large a body of infidels, really denying everything like a proper revelation, yet full of great swelling words about the Spirit, the God of history, the union of virtue and beauty, and the excellence of religion.

The infidelity of our age connects itself with freedom and social progress. The cry is, that Christianity is a failure; that the Church has not made men happy;—that whatever good the Bible has accomplished, its work is done, and we must have something better. It is a part of this scheme to glory in humanity as such; to assert the independence and self-sufficiency of man; to defy the creature, and pushing the rights of men to a jacobinical and impracticable extreme, to install lawless freedom in the pulpit. Thus strange as it may seem, philanthropy, unsanctified, may lead unsound minds to unbelief; and there are no more reckless or bitter opponents of Christianity than a number of writers, lecturers and editors, whom we once knew or heard of as ministers of Jesus Christ.

The device of Satan is most apparent in all this. The excesses towards which infidelity drives, are counterfeits and caricatures of the very blessings which we owe to true religion.—For is not Christianity the religion of philanthropy? Does it not teach the common origin and spiritual equality of all men in the sight of God? Does it not seek, and at the safest moment procure, human freedom and social rights? Must it not be named preeminently the system of progress? The press of the day, deeply surrendered to the half religions and mock religions of the time, is ever and anon jeering at the Church and Christianity, as not doing so much for mankind as modern reformers would do, as common property and unmarried alliance would do—hiding from view the fact that whatever philanthropy irrigates in the desert of humanity, is the product of this very church and this very Christianity. They calumniate the mountain springs, and claim all its flowing lakes and rivers as their own.—Dr. Alexander.

The Perfect Wife.

Some years ago after Edmund Burke's first marriage he presented the following eulogium to his wife, of whom it is said to have been a perfect pen-picture. If the sketch embodies a flattering agglomeration of mental and physical perfections difficult of attainment and of undoubted rarity, it may at least be commended to our readers of the male persuasion as portraying the qualities most to be desired in a partner for life.

"She is handsome, but it is beauty not arising from features, from complexion, or from shape. She has all three to a high degree, but it is not by these she touches a heart; it is all that sweetness of temper, benevolence, innocence, and sensibility which a face can express that forms her beauty. She has a face that, just raises your attention at first sight; it grows on you every moment, and you wonder it did no more than raise your attention at first. Her eyes have a mild light, but they are when she pleases; they command, like a good man out of office, not by authority, but by virtue. Her stature is not tall; she is not made to be the admiration of every body, but the happiness of one. She has all the firmness that does not exclude delicacy—she has all the softness that does not imply weakness. Her voice is a note, low music, not formed to rule in public assemblies, but to charm those who can distinguish a company from a crowd; it has this advantage—you must come close to her to hear it. To describe her body describes her mind—one is the transcript of the other; her understanding is not shown in the variety of matters it exerts itself on, but in the goodness of the choice she makes. She does not display it so much in saying or doing striking things as in avoiding such as she ought not to say or do. No person of so few years can know the world better; no person was ever less corrupted by the knowledge. Her politeness flows rather from a natural disposition to oblige than from any rules on the subject, and therefore never fails to strike those who understand good-breeding and those who do not. She has a steady and firm mind, which takes no more from the delicacy of the female character than the solidity of marble does from its polish and luster. She has such virtues as make us value the truly great of our own sex. She has all the winning graces that make us love even the faults we see in the weak and beautiful in hers."

THE COMING AGE.

—1886—

Nature and Proximity.

—By J. P. Westbee.—

This is a religious book of surpassing excellence. It treats with consummate ability, a topic which of late years has commanded the most profound thought of Christian thinkers, and which is exciting in the popular mind, among religious people, a strong and constantly growing interest. Already the masses are enquiring: "What are the signs of his coming?" The great upheavals in the political world, the rapid increase of knowledge, the profound wisdom and immense wealth employed in commercial enterprises, the miracles of modern inventions, railways, telegraphs and the telephone, to which new discoveries are constantly being added—these and many similar tokens, point unmistakably to the fact that we now live in the near approach to a culminating period of the world's history.

THE COMING AGE is the product of laborious research covering a period of more than forty years. Involving careful study and profound thought. It is ably written, and contains many passages of thrilling and absorbing interest. Rich largely in political history, showing in a clear and vigorous style the remarkable manner in which God has fulfilled the predictions of prophecy.

It points out the fallacies of superficial interpretations, and presents instead views consistent alike with Scripture and with reason. It outlines the events of unfulfilled prophecy, and shows that they are near at hand.

In brief it tells us concerning the COMING AGE, whatever can be gleaned from the Inspired Word, supported by the drift of current events. It discloses the wonder-working hand of God in the history of by-gone ages and shows that the same hand is in the present age, is shaping the course of events and forming its history. It also shows that his supreme hand is moulding and fashioning the events of the Age to come, preparatory to the dispensations yet to be. Literature and learning, science and philosophy, art, statesmanship, genius, piety, all are shown to be used by the great Guiding Hand in working out the purposes of divine wisdom and the fiat of the Unconquerable Will. Whoever reads this book will lay it aside with enlarged views of the greatness of the Supreme Majesty and the irresistible power of the Divine Sovereign who guides and governs all.

It contains over 300 large pages, bound in Cloth. Price $4.00. Send to this office for this work.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXXIV. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, DECEMBER 23, 1885. NO. 48.

Communications.

Unless the Trumpet give a Certain Sound, Who shall Prepare Himself for Battle.

A great many very pious people, full of religious sentimentality, think it does not matter very much what they believe for doctrine, or whether they are immersed, in water, or merely sprinkled, so long as they are honest, and think they love God, and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, they will surely be saved, for they think God is too good to turn them away, because they did not believe in a narrow gospel, and submit their bodies to be washed with pure water, by being immersed. They do not think God is so exacting as to require a rigid conformity to his way, but will favor a little when the account is rendered. To all such I would ask, what did our Lord mean when he said, Many will say unto me in that day, In thy name we have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works. But he will say unto them, depart from me, ye that work iniquity, I never knew you. In writing this article my object is to show that God is just and undeviating and exacting, and governed as much by law in the salvation of sinners, as in the control of the universe. Well is it for man that such is the case, or what a Babel of confusion would be introduced into the Kingdom of God. Let us look back and learn the cause of all the existing evils that are in the world. The terrible calamity that overtakes the whole human race, and lays them helpless in the grave. Why is it so. Because man broke the law of God. What wonderful and terrible law was this, that entailed such [illegible] calamity upon the human [illegible]; God created the first human pair, and placed them in a beautiful garden he had planted, wherein grew all kinds of choice fruits, and gave them permission to eat freely of the trees of the garden, all but one, of this they were told not to eat, for if they did they should surely die. They disobeyed, consequently death came upon the human race through the first disobedient pair. If God was careful that the penalty they incurred should be strictly enforced, should we suppose he would be less exacting in his requirements as to what we must do to be saved? As death came into the world through unbelief and disobedience, the promise of life eternal is based upon faith and obedience. It is very evident that unbelief was the cause that led to disobedience on the part of Adam and his wife. They were deceived by the lying sophistry of the Serpent. So sin when it was conceived, in their case brought forth death, and so death passed upon all men. Man was helpless to remedy the evil he had brought on himself, yet he was not beyond help. The merciful Creator himself began to unfold his plan for man's redemption. Such being the case, can it be thought for a moment, that he will save men outside of his own method, we say no. We pass over the time that elapsed from Adam to Abram, for it is in the calling out of Abram, that God laid the foundation of his plan of salvation, and any system of religious teaching that leaves out this important feature of the promise made to Abraham is like building upon sand, it will not stand in the day when every man's works shall be tried, for very important testimony for the Christ is contained in these previous promises, and to be ignorant of them, or to consider they are not essential to a saving faith, is to be looking of that knowledge of the Scriptures which is able to make wise unto salvation through faith in Jesus as the Christ. If we go no farther back than the cross, the teachings of Christ and the apostles, would be an enigma beyond our comprehension.

What would we do where Jesus says Search the Scriptures for they testify of me, or when Paul said they are able to make wise unto salvation, etc. How should we know what he meant when he said for the hope of the promise of God unto the fathers; or for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain. In fact we should not know God, or his Son Jesus the Christ, upon which knowledge eternal life is based and be ignorant of this hope. In fact we should be just where Paul said, it any man be ignorant let him be ignorant. The question for us to consider is, how has God wrought?

Did he not choose the descendants of Abraham, and through them develop his predetermined counsel. Independent of Israel there is no divine knowledge, through them alone has he made known his way, and our Lord himself said salvation is of the Jews, consequently outside of the Jewish Scriptures and Jewish teachers no knowledge of salvation can be obtained. Any candid or right-minded person ought to see how necessary it is for God to arrange some clear and well defined plan of salvation from which he will not deviate, for unless it were so, there would be no certainty in regard to salvation whatever. Without a Thus saith the Lord, there would be nothing to rely upon, he only can offer terms, for the destiny of the race is in his hands. He condemned them to death on account of sin, consequently he only can redeem and he has provided the means of redemption from death.

It has pleased God to constitute Abraham the father of all them that believe. Hence how important a bearing does the promises made to him have in relation to believers. A justifying faith can never be obtained, and leave out the promises made to the fathers. There is no such thing as a Scriptural hope independent of the hope of Israel, and the hope of Israel is the hope of the promises made to the fathers. Yes, but says the objector, did not Jesus say he that believeth the gospel and is baptised shall be saved? We say yes. What is the hope of Israel got to do with the gospel Jesus and the apostles preached? Much every way. In the first place Jesus never preached the gospel but to the Jew, neither did the apostles at first. They preached to those, of whom Paul said in relation to the promises made to the fathers, which the twelve tribes serving God hope to come. In regard to the Christ, he was the hope of Israel, although they rejected Jesus as the Christ; yet nevertheless he was the one hope of the promises, without him there would be neither beginning nor ending, for he is both, and the glorious centre and circumference. Leave him out and everything would be lacking. All the promises of God are Yea and Amen in Christ Jesus. And there is no promise of reward in a future state, unless it receives its fulfillment through him.

The great trouble with man is to get him into exact compliance with God's plan of salvation. We see how crooked he was in the garden of Eden; and he is just as crooked in complying with God's terms to save him. It is only a few honest ones now and then that gladly receive his word and obey it. There was only one in Noah's day, very few in the days of Abraham. Moses was faithful in all his house, but of all that came out of Egypt only two were permitted to enter into the promised land. An evil heart of unbelief in turning from the living God prevented all others from going in.

Paul said they could not enter in because of unbelief. Is there any record in the Bible of God's offering salvation to any, but the servants of Israel, from the time he brought them out of Egypt, to the time when the apostle Paul said to them as recorded in Acts, Seeing ye consider yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. Upon what terms were the Gentiles offered salvation. By being incorporated into the commonwealth of Israel, by becoming an Israelite by adoption and becoming a Jew inwardly.

This could only be done by having their hearts and ears circumcised by hearing and believing the truth. The faith of a true Jew embraced the promises made of God to the fathers. The covenant made with David, and believing in Jesus as the Christ, the promised seed to Abraham and the Son promised to David who should occupy the throne of his father David, and reign over the twelve tribes of Israel. No Gentile could become a Jew, and be ignorant of the Jewish hope, and it is necessary to have this Jewish faith and hope before being baptised, for baptism follows belief, and does not precede it, as some folks would seem to think. The apostle says blindness in part has happened to Israel. What were they blind to? Why the fact that Jesus was the Messiah, otherwise their faith was correct, as Paul affirmed when he said, For the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers unto which the twelve tribes instantly serving God day and night hope to come. This is evident from Paul's own experience. One time he was a zealous persecutor of those who believed in Jesus as the Christ, but when convinced that Jesus was the Messiah promised to Israel he became a zealous Christian, and preached in the synagogue that Jesus was the Christ. Peter also on the day of Pentecost proved to the assembled Jews concerning Jesus whom they had crucified, that he was both Lord and Christ. When they were convinced of this they were baptised in the name of Christ for the remission of sins. We learn from this that the Jewish hope and faith is the only faith and hope that is set before us in the gospel. Search the Scriptures through we can find no other, and to be ignorant of these essentials is to be without God, and without hope in the world. The words of Jesus are in harmony with this statement, when he said to the woman of Samaria, salvation is of the Jews, and man or woman to obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, with the eternal glory must become a Jew inwardly by having their faith and hope, with the full understanding and belief, that Jesus is the Christ, the King of Israel, to all such as have been baptised into his saving name. They become joint heirs with Christ and heirs of God according to the promise made to Abraham, and it is only in this narrow and straight way that eternal life is to be found. Outside of this way marked out by God is the broad road that leadeth to destruction. Yet how few give heed to the warning of Jesus to strive to enter in the straight gate and narrow way. This is an offence to the many who are in the broader and more liberal way. To any who may draw attention to the narrowness of the way, the cry is, O you are so straight-laced you think only your few selves will be saved, and all others will be damned. God is too good to damn every body that does not believe just as you do. We say let God be true though all men be found liars.

JOHN GOODLIFFE.

"Who is on the Lord's Side?"

To be on the Lord's side, one must be on the side of truth, on the side of righteousness, on the side of holiness. Searching the Scriptures, to become acquainted with the way is the first step. There, the learner sees mapped out before him, the geography of a new and heavenly country, where Christ is to be the Supreme Ruler of happy nations, and to have associated with him in its government the saved of all ages and times. He sees Israel and Judah restored, and the desert odorous with flowers. Justice bribed no more. There is no more oppression. Wrong is put down and war is at an end. He likes the country. He wants to go to the city of bright jasper walls and pavements of gold, where he will not be sick and will never die.

He believes that a glorious and mighty God exists, and that what he has read has come from him, and must be true. He searches farther. He finds himself a sinner. He cannot go to that country, all stained with sin. The passport for entrance at the gate is a robe of righteousness, no money will buy it. The labor of his life cannot obtain it. There is but one way; with joy it is opened unto him, Christ as a Savior; through whom only forgiveness of sins and eternal life can be obtained.

He must have that garment, he must have that Savior. But how? The burden of sin is growing heavier; he is sick and faint and terrified with the awfulness of the condemnation hanging over him,—to perish, to be blotted out, to die the second death! He will go anywhere with Jesus, he will do anything, anything, to escape from the penalty of his sins! What does God require? What must we do to be saved? He reads on, oh, joyful words! "Whosoever will may come." Whosoever cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out! "Whosoever believeth in me shall not perish but have everlasting life." "I am the way, the truth, and the life." "I am the door." Christ is the door. He will be safe, if he can get into Christ. He it is, through whom forgiveness is to come: he it is who gave his precious blood to save from sin.

"As many of you as have been baptised into Christ, have put on Christ." "If ye be Christ's ye are Abraham's seed and heirs according to promise." "If we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall also be in the likeness of his resurrection."

Here then is the way. He must enter through Christ, into the family of God. He must become Christ's by being baptised. He must become of Abrahamic seed, by being baptized. The precious boon of forgiveness, must be found there. The robe of righteousness, must be put on there. He must begin the race, by acknowledging Christ as his Lord and God as his Master. He must step over on the Lord's side by doing. God's commandments are imperative. They cannot be shirked nor put aside.

His truth must be believed and his word obeyed. What "I think" and "what you think," has no weight at all in the great question of life and death. If we believe the truth as taught in the Bible, we are on the Lord's side. If we have obeyed from the heart the form of doctrine delivered unto us, we are on the Lord's side. It is better to stand alone on the scaffold and die for truth, than cleave to error, and sit on a throne.

So the untrammelled learner reasons. He will be "on the Lord's side" at all hazards. It was the winning side in the battles of the Israelitish kings; it certainly will be the winning side, in the resurrection morn. It will be to have life and country and home! It will be to claim kindred with the wisest and noblest of earth. It will be to sing the song of the redeemed. His mind is made up. He comes to Jesus saying—

"Just as I am without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
Oh Lamb of God, I come!"

and on the other side of the watery grave he shouts "I am the Lord's!" "I am on the Lord's side now!" And ever on, through joy and grief, through service and trial, on, on, to the end, he lives and acts as one who is the Lord's. Blessed choice, blessed life of holy influences, blessed reward that awaits him in the day of Christ's coming!

"Who is on the Lord's side?" Let him come over and help fight the battles of the Lord. It is time for decision, life and death hang in the balance. Which oh readers, will you have?

A NEW SONG.

"O sing unto the Lord a new song; for He hath done marvelous things; His right hand, and his holy arm, hath gotten Him the victory.

"The Lord hath made known His salvation: His righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the heathen.

"He hath remembered His mercy and His truth toward the house of Israel: all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.

"Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all the earth; make a loud noise, and rejoice, and sing praise.

"Sing unto the Lord with the harp; with the harp, and the voice of a psalm.

"With trumpets, and sound of cornet, make a joyful noise before the Lord, the King.

"Let the sea roar, and the fullness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.

"Let the floods clap their hands: let the hills be joyful together

"Before the Lord: for he cometh to judge the earth: with righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity."

This inspired command will be obeyed in the right time and in the right place.

Five hundred years before Jesus rode into Jerusalem on an ass's colt the prophet said: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion, shout, O daughter of Jerusalem, for thy King cometh unto thee," etc. And at the right time they did rejoice and shout, spreading their garments in the way, and the children catching the spirit sang: "Hosanna to the Son of David." If these had held their peace the very stones would have cried out.

Who will sing this new song?

Probably the one hundred and forty and four thousand seen by the beloved John, standing on the Mount Zion having the Father's name written in their foreheads; the twelve thousand of each of the tribes of the children of Israel of Revelation 7th, who were sealed in their foreheads, and they sang as it were "A new song." This song was written about three thousand years before they sang it. They cannot sing the Lord's song in a strange land; they are on the Mount Zion when they sing it. No man can learn that song but that company, as the song of Miriam and her companions on the shores of the Red Sea, was especially adapted for them.

The ninety-eighth Psalm is intended to be the opening "Song of the Millennial Age." We should remember the age to come is a judgment age and an age of knowledge, when no one shall have need to say to his brother or his neighbor, "Know the Lord for all shall know him from the least to the greatest of them, saith the Lord." "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many, for he shall bear their iniquities."

About forty years since Dr. Walter Clark said in a discourse in the South Church, on the text, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," "It certainly meant that the saving power of Jesus our Lord would reach more than a mere fraction of our race as it had in the past, and this thought is in harmony with the spirit of the Holy Scriptures; "for as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one man shall many be made righteous;" or the living race in the flesh shall feel the effects of Jesus's perfect obedience as much as the living race in the flesh felt the effects of Adam's disobedience."

About fifty years since the news reached Hartford that the Russians had taken the stronghold on the Balkan Mountains, and were marching down on Constantinople. A prominent business man and a prominent member of the South Church said, at the dinner-table, that day "I had rather heard that news than to have known that I had made a thousand dollars." It was then understood by many, as it is now, that the wasting away and downfall of the Turkish Power was a certain harbinger of the millennial age. Then, the news was about forty days from the seat of war. Now, it reaches us in moments of time, traveling, it is said, faster than sound and faster than the light.

Probably Miss. Ellsworth penned the first message Mr. Morse sent over the wires by inspiration as well as from inspiration. The four words were written and spoken thousands of years before she was born: "What hath God wrought."

"Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens, and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Where is that promise and what is that promise?

Isaiah lxv. 17; "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind.

But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create; for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy.

And I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall no more be heard in her, nor the voice of crying" etc.

"Awake, awake; put on thy strength, O Zion; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem....

Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the Lord hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem.

The Lord hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations; and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God."

Acts i. 10, 11: "And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven, as He went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel;

Which also said, 'Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus....shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.'"

Zechariah xiv. 4; "And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east; and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof towards the east and towards the west, and there shall be a very great valley: and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half toward the south."

Psalm cxxv. 1; "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever."

The words of the Apostle Peter: Acts ii. 21: "And he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you.

"Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.

"For Moses truly said unto the fathers, a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you.

"And it shall come to pass that every soul that will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people." CHAS. BOARDMAN.

Occurrences of Hades.

In the article on Hades, copied from the Rainbow into THE RESTITUTION of Dec. 9, I find a list claiming to be "all the occurrences in the Bible of Hades in the Greek." But that list omits two occurrences that throw great light on the meaning, namely, "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." Psa. cxv. 17; and "Unless the Lord had been my help my soul had almost dwelt in silence," Psa. xciv. 17. For "silence" in each of these places, the Greek has Hades. The Hebrew has dumah, in which is, perhaps, the root of "dumb" and "dumbness."

The article from the Rainbow moreover says, "Sheol is always translated by Hades in the Septuagint." But the Septuagint has translated Sheol by the Greek word for death (thanatos) in two places, namely, "The sorrows of hell (thanatos) compassed me about," 2 Sam. xxii. 6; and "Deliver his soul from hell (thanatos)." Prov. xxiii. 14. In one place it has translated Sheol by the Greek word bothros, which is defined by Liddell & Scott as "a pit, any hole dug in the ground." This translation is found in Ezek. xxxii. 21: "Speak to him out of the midst of hell (bothros)." I quote from the VanEss edition of the Septuagint, which I suppose to be the best as it is the one sold by the American Bible Society. Prof. Stuart seems to have used a similar edition, for in speaking of the way in which the Septuagint translators rendered Sheol into Greek, he says (as quoted by Whitmore), "Twice they have rendered the same Hebrew word by the Greek term for death, viz., 2 Sam. xxii. 6; Prov. xxiii. 14; and once by the Greek term for pit, Ezek. xxxii. 21."

Gesenius' Hebrew Lexicon (20th edition) says, with less precision, that in the Septuagint Sheol is translated, "usually hades, once thanatos, 2 Sam. xxii. 6."

I beg leave to make these corrections in no fault-finding disposition, but merely for the sake of greater accuracy in so important a matter.

CHALDEAN TOWERS.

There was a prodigious difference between the architectural triumphs of Egypt and those of Chaldea, apart from generic divergencies of the forms and materials employed by each. The basalts, granites, and green-stones of the Nile were essentially monochromatic, and however rich in their local tones, sober, if not austere in their majestic, and distinguished by their horizontal lines. On the other hand, the lofty, staged towers of the Euphrates valley, huge as they were, and in that respect resembling Egyptian structures, glowed with all splendor of highly colored bricks, the enamelled surfaces of which reflected azure, indigo, red, olive, and other hues of great fullness and beauty, and must have been glorious to behold. The abundant use of these colored enamels on their buildings was characteristic of the Chaldeans, and was well suited to their climate. The violent storms and flood-like rains peculiar to this climate may have suggested the use of impervious coverings to their great buildings. The discovery that these splendid enamels were freely employed in Chaldea is, artistically speaking, one of the best fruits of modern research, and it is ethnographically not less than pictorially important. Archæologically it is hardly less so.

Meanwhile let us quote the statement repeated here from Philostratus's account of Apollonius of Tyana. The sophist founded his description of Babylon on good information, and spoke of a "great brick edifice plated with bronze, which had a dome representing the firmament, and shining with gold and sapphires."

Strabo averred—from hearsay perhaps, but with great exaggeration—that Xerxes overthrew a square pyramid of burnt brick 6084 feet high and the same in diameter. All the writers of antiquity agree in saying that the remains they describe were works of prodigious altitude, much taller than the Gizeh Pyramids. By building these many-storied towers the Chaldeans, so to say, consoled themselves for the absence of mountains in their country, just as the Flemings and Dutch piled lofty spires on lofty towers to overlook their plains. The stages of these square towers of Chaldea were, according to Herodotus, of different colors. The well known restoration by M. Chipiez of these edifices is practicable from a constructional point of view, but the crude development of his idea presented in this book and elsewhere is very hideous, and would have needed much glory of colors and shining metals to make it tolerable even to Chaldean eyes, which seem to have cared little for form or proportion. Color sense in the higher development may have been given to them as a consolation for this defect. With the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks it was otherwise. The Assyrians revelled in beauty of architectural detail, their artists carved stones like so many jewellers at work on gold or silver.—The Athenæum.

THE RESTITUTION

Terms—TWO DOLLARS A YEAR,

Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE RESTITUTION advocates the dual "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

BIBLE STUDIES. NO. II.

The Crucible and the Gold.

Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates? 2 Cor. xiii. 5.

I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich. Rev. iii. 18.

To examine and estimate our piety, our morality, our charity, our obedience and our attainments in all graces that, in combination, make up the personal character, in the phosphorescent light of self-opinion and self-love is one thing, and to have all displayed before God, "in the light of his countenance," is a very different matter. It is the greatest misfortune with us all that we so fail in our self-examination as to not thoroughly know our true selves. In coming to Christ, as repentant believers, we were doubtless prompted by our convictions of sin that was disclosed, in all its deformity, by the light of divine truth. For to us the word of God become "living and active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and quick to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart." Heb. iv. 12. R. V.

To some extent the heart and life were unveiled, and the revelation brought conviction of hidden depths of sin in the heart and turpitude in the life that forced the anxious question—"What shall I do to be saved?" In response to the sweet invitations of the Gospel we repented, we believed, and we were immersed into Christ. Then commenced our existence and our walk in the "New Life." But, alas, how little have we realized the nature and glory of the "heavenly calling." How utterly we have failed to bring home to our innermost consciousness that this "heavenly calling," is to something transcendently and infinitely glorious. Merely being saved from sin, in its present guilt and condemnation to death, is not all that the blessed gospel holds out as the hope of the believer. To wear a crown of glory, to sit with Christ in his throne, to be kings and priests and share with the dear Redeemer in all the eternal royalties of the coming kingdom is the prize of the "high calling" in Christ Jesus. When Christ told the chief priests and elders of the Jews what they had lost as a nationality and said:—"The Kingdom of God shall be taken away from you, and shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof," he did not by these words place the entire nation under the anathema of eternal death, but made the solemn announcement to them that they had forfeited the exclusive right to inherit the royalties of his future Kingdom—a right conditionally promised to them. See Ex. xix. 5, 6.

When they rejected Christ as King they lost the princely priesthood. Hence the necessity of this gospel age and its economy. God's purpose, in this dispensation of his grace, is definitely stated in these words! "Symeon hath rehearsed how first God did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name." Acts xv. 14. R. V. And Peter tells us that believers in Christ and the gospel are predestined to take the princely crowns and priestly mitres that disobedient Israel lost when they rejected the rightful claims of Jesus of Nazareth to the Messiahship when he says: "The stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, and a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient: whereunto also they were appointed. But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light." 1 Pet. ii. 7, 9.

The Bible treats of a "Great Salvation," as well as of Salvation in a lesser degree. We learn that there is a salvation for Israel although, as a nation, they will not inherit the elect royalties of the world to come. Concerning this lesser salvation of Israel the Lord says: "Israel shall be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation: ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end. In the Lord shall all the seed of Israel be justified, and shall glory." Isa. xlv. 17, 25. The language of the apostle is equally explicit: "For I would not brethren, that ye be ignorant of this mystery, lest ye should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, and so all Israel shall be saved, for it is written, There shall come out of Zion the deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." Rom. xi. 25, 26. The expression—"Though the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea a remnant shall be saved," Rom. ix. 27, is true also, as this passage refers to the Great Salvation. The lesser salvation extends even farther: "And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it (the New Jerusalem) and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it," Rev. xxi. 24. In alluding to the salvation of the church, Israel, and the nations, we affirm nothing about its extent, only to say we do not believe in a universal salvation. Now to come to the particular theme with which we set out,—the final ordeal. In assigning future destinies "judgment begins at the house of God." 1 Pet. iv 17. When our Lord shall return it will have already been decided as to who "shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead"—της αναστασεως της εκ νεκρων, the resurrection the one out from dead ones—referring to the one Daniel speaks of "out from among the sleepers in earth-dust." Luke xx. 35, Dan. xii. 2.

To have a part in this, "the first resurrection," "the resurrection of the just," is limited to the "blessed and holy" who will thus live to be priests to God and reign with Christ in the Millennial blessedness. It is this princely priesthood that Peter so earnestly exhorts when he says "gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ—to be holy in all manner of conversion—to pass the time of sojourning here in fear." We are "training for dominion," we are running a race "for a crown of glory that fadeth not away." Our Savior said to the Philadelphian church: "Behold I come quickly: hold that fast that thou hast, that no man take thy crown." Rev. iii. 11. He did not mean you may forfeit your salvation and some one else get your lost boon, but, like disobedient Israel, you may forfeit a Kingship, a princedom, a priesthood. See this principle of royalty illustrated in the case of the apostles. "I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Luke xxii. 29, 3. In the case of others see the parable of the money, where one receives a pound and gains ten, and is placed in rule over ten cities, and, another who had gained five pounds is placed over five cities. Luke xix. 12, 19: and again, "and they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kingdom, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us to our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth." Rev. v. 9, 10.

Now as to the crucible. Our faith is tested by trial as gold is tested in the fire. The objects upon which the Christian faith and hope are fixed are the heavenly inheritance, which is incorruptible, undefiled and fadeless, and the personal salvation of the believer from sin and all its consequences into all the imperishable honors and glories that pertain to God's everlasting Kingdom. Now Peter, relative to this faith, and its testing says: "Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a little while, if need be ye have been put to grief in manifold temptations that the proof of your faith, being more precious than gold that perisheth though it is proved by fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the revelation of Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. i. 6, 7.

From this we learn that the "honor and glory" as the crowning consummation of a finally completed salvation," will be the award of a faith that has been tried as gold is tried to eliminate it from all dross. Again James says: "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he hath been approved, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord promised to them that love him." Jas. i. 12, R. V. Here the crown is conditioned on approval and approval upon the endurance of trial. The difference between being saved and rewarded is plainly indicated by Paul in his teachings, when speaking of the works of faith. "For other foundation can no man lay than that already laid, which is JESUS THE CHRIST.' But on this foundation one man may raise a temple of gold, and silver, and precious marbles; another of wood, hay, and stubble. But in due time each man's work will be made manifest; for the day [of the Lord's coming] will show of what sort it is; because the day will be revealed with fire, and the fire will test each builder's work. He whose building stands unharmed, shall receive payment for his labor; but he whose work is burned down, shall forfeit his reward; yet he shall not himself be destroyed; but shall be saved as one who scarcely escapes through flames." 1 Cor. iii. 11–18. Conybeare & Howson's translation. In the wonderful plan and purpose of God the peerless exaltation of our adorable Redeemer is an issue resulting from humiliation and suffering. "We behold Jesus, who was 'for a little while made lower than the angels' crowned through the suffering of death with glory and honor; that by the free gift of God He might taste death for all men. For it became Him, through whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to consecrate by sufferings the Captain of their salvation." Heb. ii. 9, 10. Con. a How. Also we read: "And having appeared in the guise of men, He abased himself and showed obedience, even unto death, yea, death upon the cross. Wherefore God also exalted Him above measure, and gave Him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus, 'every knee shall bow,' of all who dwell in heaven, in earth, or under the earth, and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Con. a How. It was "for the joy that was set before him" that Jesus endured the cross and despised the shame. This joy was not the joy of being saved but the joy of unparalleled exaltation. To use well our talents results in entering into "the joy of our Lord," which is to share in the royalties of God's Kingdom. Compare Matt. xxv. 21 with Rev. iii. 21. It is through much tribulation we must enter into the Kingdom of God. We must bear the reproach of truth. When this age closes, the door into the royalties of the Kingdom will be shut. Israel will see what has been lost, and mourn, like Esau for the lost inheritance, when it is too late. Zech. xii. 10–14. Christ brought the Kingdom nigh unto them and offered them its royalties in good faith, but they rejected God's Messiah. While a multitude of the nation will be saved into life only a remnant will be elected unto the royal honors of the Great Salvation. The same is true of the churches of the Gospel Age. We are training for dominion. The race took for a crown of glory is along a very narrow path. The disciplining of our probation may be severe, but an everlasting crown is the stake of the victory. The Messenger-Angel proclaiming the gospel of the age-to-come—the aionian gospel—will hold out no crowns in his hands. The blessings of allegiance and true worship, to God is the burden of the Millenial Gospel. Rev. xiv. 6–9. The highest result of obedience in that age, is future life to be awarded in the judgment from the Great White Throne—but no crowns.

Dear brethren and sisters, this is our last communication to you for 1885. Take heed that no man take your crown. While we strictly preach the obedience of faith, once delivered to the saints, as a requisite to the honors of the Kingdom, let us judge nothing as to what may be the extent of salvation "before the time." The Lord rewards and the Lord saves.

CHRISTMAS.

Instead of compiling a longer and more particular history of Christmas from encyclopedias and dictionaries of Christian Antiquities, we give the following which was written for a popular literary Magazine. Our own opinion, however, is that Christ was born about the time of the Autumnal Equinox, or, at least, near the time of the Feast of Tabernacles. The reasons for this conclusion we will not give at this time. In early times the celebration of the Natal day was by no means uniform in the churches located in different countries.
